The single question here is whether the defendants, by selling portions of their 1,000-acre tract to the grantees named in the two deeds above referred to, violated that covenant of the lease whereby they bound themselves, during the continuance of said lease, not to "demise or let any other part of their said premises to be used for like purposes as those herein let to said party of the second part," etc. The contention of the plaintiffs is that, while the defendants were not, under the terms of the lease, foreclosed of the right to sell, during the term and continuance of the lease, any part of their lands not affected by said lease, they nevertheless by said lease bound themselves not to convey or sell any part thereof with the purpose that the same should be used as a hotel, saloon and summer resort, and, as their primary proposition upon this question, they insist that the language of the restrictive clause of the lease, when considered by the light of the uses to which the property leased was to be put, is fairly and reasonably susceptible of that interpretation. In the second place, they say that, even if the language of said clause of the lease is not clear and certain upon that proposition, they were entitled, under their complaint, to show by parol that it was mutually intended and understood by and between the lessee and lessors, at and immediately before the time of the execution of the lease, that the effect of the restrictive covenant was to preclude the defendants from either demising or granting any part or parts of the tract not leased to the plaintiffs to other persons to be by them devoted to the purposes of a hotel and summer resort. In other words, as to the proposition last stated, the plaintiffs claim that, if the lease itself does not disclose the real intention and understanding of the parties thereto as to its scope, they were authorized, under their complaint, so to reform that instrument as that it would conform to such intention and understanding, and that the court erred in not permitting them to do so, or, having allowed them to introduce proof for that purpose, in striking it out and thereupon granting the motion of the defendants for a nonsuit.

We are of the opinion that neither of the propositions above stated and upon which the plaintiffs rely for a reversal of the judgment can legally be sustained.

Printed in the brief of the respondent is the opinion of the learned trial judge upon the question of the scope and effect of the written lease involved here. By the interpretation of the language of the lease and the construction of the whole instrument as therein given, he reaches a result contrary to that contended for by the plaintiffs, and one which, as well for the reasoning leading thereto as otherwise, is satisfactory to us.

[1] We therefore approve and adopt as a part of this opinion the following portions of the opinion filed by the trial judge in this cause:

"The intention of the parties must be gathered from the consideration of the lease and agreement itself, and no extrinsic evidence would be admissible to show their intention, inasmuch as it is fairly expressed in said document.

[2] "Does the word 'demise,' coupled by the disjunctive conjunction 'or' to the word 'let,' preclude defendants' right to convey or sell their property or any part thereof for any or all purposes whatsoever? Plaintiffs say it does restrict them, and defendants say no. The word 'demise,' as will hereafter appear, is the pivotal point upon which the issue turns. It will be observed that the lease is made for one year, with the annual option of renewal for a period of nine years. Plaintiff M. A. Carr, in connection with her hotel, is given certain privileges touching certain specified portions of said 1,000-acre tract; that is to say, she may use the river flowing over the land for boating purposes; she may also use certain roads laid upon said 1,000-acre tract for the recreation and pleasure of guests; take wood therefrom necessary to conduct and run said hotel business; occupy stable room for two horses, and pasturage for four cows. The defendants covenant that they will not defile the grounds or render less attractive the premises let to said plaintiff for hotel purposes (not the balance of their vast estate, however) during the continuance of said lease. It will be noted, too, that the grant or license to use the premises not included within the hotel and clubhouse grounds 'for pleasure walks and recreations' extends only to that part of the estate 'where not inclosed.' There is nothing in the lease that would grant plaintiff this right where said lands are inclosed, or that would hereafter prevent defendants from inclosing so much of the said estate, not specifically included within the hotel and clubhouse grounds, as they may elect.

"A study of the lease would indicate that it was not the intention of the parties to restrict defendants' right to sell or convey any part or portion of their estate by deed absolute for any and all purposes, reserving those privileges expressly excepted.

[3] "It will be noted—and in considering the intention of the parties all words used in the instrument must be given their usual and ordinary effect—that defendants by the lease in question 'doth grant, demise, and let unto the said party of the second part,' etc., the land and rights hereinbefore mentioned. Departing from the clause above quoted, the language of the restrictive clause against defendants is not quite as broad or comprehensive as the language above quoted. The restriction is that they will not 'demise or let any part of their said premises to be used for like purposes as those herein let to the said party of the second part,' etc. The word 'grant,' it would seem, is purposely omitted.

[4] "The word 'demise,' used as a noun, means a lease for a term of years; a conveyance in fee, for life or years; the conveyance of an estate, either in fee or for life or for years, most commonly the latter. As a verb, it means to lease for a term of years. 13 Cyc. 781. As to its primitive meaning, there can be no room for dispute. It was always used in reference to a lease, and the only controversy waged about it was whether it amounted to a covenant for quiet enjoyment. It is true that it has sometimes been held, when the context clearly justified such construction, to mean a conveyance or transfer, but this is not its usual signification. It meant more to the lessee than a mere letting by the landlord, or the mere taking by the lessee generally embraced in the terms 'to lease or to let.'

"Burrill's Law Dictionary is the only standard accessible. It defines demise as follows: 'A conveyance of an estate to another for life, for years, or at will; most commonly, for years—a lease; to convey or create an estate for years or life; to lease.' The usual and operative words in leases: 'Have granted, demised, and to farm let, and by these presents do grant, demise, and to farm let.' For further reference see 1 Bouvier, Law Dictionary; Merchon v. Williams, 63 N. J. Law, 398, 44 Atl. 212; Words and Phrases, under title of 'Demise'; Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, under title of 'Leases'; Cyc., as above cited. See, also, numerous authorities under 'Landlord and Tenant' in this and other states. But whether the term be given its technical or more liberal construction must be determined from an interpretation of the lease, in special instances.

"The annual rental was but $350, and plaintiff M. A. Carr reserved the right annually to exercise her option as a continuing tenant. It would have been an easy matter for the parties to have restricted the sale or conveyance of any portion of the property herein mentioned for hotel or opposition purposes, if they so desired. It would hardly seem reasonable that the owners of a large body of land should have denied themselves the right to dispose of their property for its most advantageous purposes for a mere pittance of $30 a month. It is reasonable that the defendants should covenant so long as they owned said estate not to lease to any one else for similar purposes, but it is hardly reasonable to suppose that they would restrict themselves in the sale of their large estate. And may it not be that said plaintiff insisted upon the right to relinquish said premises at the end of any one year, having in view the contingency of a sale of the entire tract of land? The contract does not in words restrict the defendants from conducting a hotel or hotels.

"This is not a case in which it may be said that the court should construe the instrument most strictly against the party drawing it. Both parties having entered into the lease and contract voluntarily, and having made their own terms and used their own words and phrases, are bound by the ordinary uses or acceptation and meaning of said terms, words and phrases. The court cannot go beyond that which is expressed in said lease and contract. It can only draw from the entire instrument its meaning, and give it such effect as the intention of the parties is therein expressed.

[5] "No presumption in favor of the plaintiff can be indulged as restraint in alienation of realty is not favored by the law. Courts cannot read into contracts terms omitted therefrom, else it would be making a contract not agreeable to the parties thereto. It cannot be that the intention of the parties is different from what the language employed therein may import. As the parties have adopted the word 'demise,' and not the words 'sell,' 'convey,' 'transfer,' or 'grant' or some other similar terms, it will be presumed that by the selection of the word 'demise' they intentionally excluded the others."

But much stress is laid upon the language of the covenant in question, "and that they will not grant similar rights and privileges upon their said premises to any other person as those granted to the said party of the second part herein"; it being urged that the word "grant," as used therein, was so used with the intention of embracing within the operation of the restrictive clause the right to sell other portions of the lands, to be utilized for the purposes of a summer resort, etc. We are unable to coincide with that view of the language referred to.

There is nothing in the restrictive provision of the lease which has the effect of preventing the defendants from exercising the right, during the existence of the lease, to lease other portions of their said lands to other persons, provided that they are not so leased for the purpose of being used by the lessees as a summer resort, etc., in competition with the plaintiffs. The leasing of such lands for such purposes is expressly and clearly prohibited by the language of the first part of the restrictive clause. But, to protect the plaintiffs against any sort of interference with the purposes to which they intended to put the premises demised to them, the defendants further covenanted that, having granted to the plaintiffs certain rights and privileges appropriate and necessary to the full purposes of a summer resort, viz., the right to permit guests of the hotel to use other parts of their lands, where the same are uninclosed, for purposes of recreation and pleasure, the right to the use of the waters of the streams on said lands for boating purposes and other similar easements, enumerated in the lease, they would not, during the continuance of the lease, grant to other persons such (similar) "rights and privileges upon their said premises." This is the natural and the grammatical construction of the clause. The fact that the words "and that" immediately follow the inhibition against the leasing of any other portions of the large tract of land clearly shows that the parties to the lease had in mind two different and distinct propositions when they incorporated into the lease the restrictive provision, to wit: (1) A covenant against demising or leasing other portions of the land for the indicated purposes; (2) a covenant against granting to other persons other rights and privileges in the nature of easements appurtenant to portions of the lands of the defendants other than the demised premises; such rights and privileges being specifically named in the lease.

But the two deeds concerned here contain no provision whereby the grantees therein named are granted the right to or privilege of carrying on a hotel or a saloon or a summer resort; their effect being merely to pass the fee in the lands described therein. Indeed, the right to conduct a hotel and summer resort or to engage in other like occupation is not one that is dependent upon grant. The plaintiff, by the lease, merely acquired an estate for years in the premises described in said lease, but, while the right to maintain on the premises a hotel and summer resort is expressly mentioned as one of the rights of the lessee under the lease, it is a right which, in the absence of any reference thereto in the instrument, would have passed to the lessee as an incident of the estate created by the lease, and which, being personal as to the lessee, she could, under such circumstances, have exercised or not. So it is true as to the grantees of the defendants. The right to maintain a summer resort on their respective premises was not acquired by or through the grants of said premises to them. The fact, if it were a fact, that the defendants might have sold the lands to the grantees with the knowledge that said grantees intended to maintain summer resorts thereon is immaterial, since there is nothing in the lease which prevented the former from selling, and since, furthermore, having bought the lands or acquired title thereto by purchase, as they had the right to do, the grantees were entitled to devote them to any lawful uses. Of course, if there were burdens upon their lands at the time they acquired them, they took the title subject to such burdens, and, while the question does not arise here, it may with no impropriety be remarked that, if they should in any manner impair the integrity or interfere with the right in others to be benefit of such burdens, they alone would obviously be answerable therefor.

[6] We are satisfied that the complaint fails to state a case justifying the revision of the lease under section 3399 of the Civil Code. That section provides:

> "When, through fraud or a mutual mistake of the parties, or a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected, a written contract does not truly express the intention of the parties, it may be revised on the application of a party aggrieved, so as to express that intention, so far as it can be done without prejudice to rights acquired by third persons in good faith and for value."

Nowhere in the complaint is there an allegation that any of the terms of the lease were omitted from the instrument by or through fraud or the mistake of the parties or either of them. Counsel claim, however, that revision of the lease was permissible under certain allegations of the fourth paragraph of the complaint, above quoted. As shown, the important parts of said allegations read:

> "That said covenant [referring to the restrictive provision] * * * was, and the words therein employed and used were, by mutual consent of all the parties thereto, distinctly understood and agreed to mean, and do mean, that defendants should not and would not let, demise or grant to any other person * * * the right or privilege to carry on, conduct, or operate a summer resort, etc., on said larger tract, of one thousand acres, or any part thereof;" that "it was fully understood and agreed by and between the said plaintiffs and defendants, at the time of the making of the said contract, * * *" that by said contract the defendants "covenanted and agreed that they would not, during its continuance, lease, demise, grant, or convey to any person or persons the right to maintain a summer resort, etc., upon any of their said larger tract."

It will readily be noted that the foregoing allegations do not contain a statement that through the mistake of the parties or either of them, or through fraud, the real intention of the parties was not expressed in the written lease, but that they merely involve a construction by the plaintiffs themslves of the language of the lease; that is to say, the plaintiffs thus construe the lease as it was written and executed so as to extend its scope beyond that which its language clearly implies. The mere naked statement that the parties had a certain "understanding" as to the effect of the language of an instrument in writing is only to say that the parties so construe the instrument, while the mere naked statement that by "mutual consent" of the parties thereto the instrument was to have an effect different in material respects from that which its language plainly imports would call for evidence the effect of which would be to vary the terms of the written contract.

To state a case for the revision of a written instrument, under section 3399 of the Civil Code, it is incumbent upon the pleader to show, by direct averment, that, by reason of fraud practiced by one of the parties, or of the mutual mistake of the parties or of a mistake of one of them, which the other at the time knew or suspected, there were thus omitted from the instrument certain material terms and conditions, or, in other words, that the language of the writing failed, for some reason, to express the intention of the parties. The complaint in this case does not, as must readily be perceived upon reading it, measure up to this requirement. Hence the effect of the evidence stricken out by the court would have been to vary or modify the terms of a written instrument and the course taken by the court in striking it out was proper.

After said testimony was stricken from the record, nothing was left to support the claim of the plaintiffs to damages, and there was therefore no other course open to the court but to grant the defendants' motion for a nonsuit.

The judgment is affirmed.

24 Cal. App. 701

PARKINSON BROS. CO. v. FIGEL et al.

(Civ. 1214.)

1. Fraudulent Conveyances (§ 241*) — Assignment of Attached Fund—Right to Sue—Objections—Waiver.

Where, in a suit to determine the ownership of an attached fund, both parties without objection submitted to an inquiry as to the validity of the assignment of the fund by the debtor to cross-complainant, and the court made full findings on such issue without any objection being taken to the evidence touching the alleged fraudulent assignment, an objection that the attaching creditor had no standing to attack the assignment because no judgment had been recovered against the debtor was waived.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraudulent Conveyances, Cent. Dig. §§ 694, 696–726; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 837*) — Issues — Scope of Review.

Where, in a suit to determine the validity of an alleged prior assignment of an attached fund, the assignee consented to a trial of the issue of the validity of the assignment, the attaching creditor, though not having recovered a judgment against his debtor, was entitled to a review on appeal of the question whether the evidence was sufficient to support findings sustaining the assignment.

3. Fraudulent Conveyances (§ 272*)—Assignment — Fraud — Insolvency — Burden of Proof.

In a suit to invalidate an assignment by a debtor of attached funds as fraudulent as against creditors, the burden of establishing the debtor's insolvency at the time of the assignment, as well as the charge of fraud, is on the attaching creditor.

4. FRAUDULENT CONVEYANCES (§ 77*)—ASSIGNMENT TO ATTORNEYS—VALIDITY.

An assignment of claims by a debtor to his attorneys prior to an attachment, to secure the attorneys for services past and future, and to provide funds to settle claims against the debtor, for which both he and an attaching creditor were liable, and to return any surplus to the debtor, which surplus, if any, would be subject to the attachment, was not fraudulent as against creditors.

5. ASSIGNMENTS FOR BENEFIT OF CREDITORS (§ 11*)—VALIDITY—"GENERAL ASSIGNMENT."

Where a debtor, against whom many claims for damages were pending, but who was not insolvent, assigned some, but not all, of his outstanding accounts to his attorney to secure payment for his services past and present, and to use the proceeds to settle such claims, and return the balance, if any, to the assignor, the assignment was not a general one within Civ. Code, § 3449 et seq., relating to assignments for the benefit of creditors, but was valid under sections 3431, 3432, providing that in the absence of fraud every contract of a debtor, though preferring one creditor to another, is valid against all his creditors who have not acquired a lien on the property affected by the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Suit by the Parkinson Bros. Company against Fred H. Figel and the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, cross-defendant, and Will M. Beggs, cross-plaintiff, adverse claimants to a fund seized under an attachment. From a judgment in favor of cross-complainant Beggs the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company appeals. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant. R. C. McComish, E. M. Ray, and A. A. Caldwell, all of San Jose, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The action was brought by plaintiff to have the rights of the several defendants determined to certain money held by plaintiff. It is alleged that plaintiff (herein referred to as Parkinson Company) and defendant Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company (herein referred to as the Cement Company) are corporations; that the Cement Company has commenced an action in the superior court of Santa Clara county against defendant Fred H. Figel, and in said action a writ of attachment has been issued and served by the sheriff of said county upon this plaintiff, with a notice that all goods, etc., in the hands of plaintiff belonging to said Figel are attached; that before the said attachment plaintiff purchased from said Figel certain cement and other building materials, for which plaintiff agreed to pay the sum of $304.20, no part of which has been paid; that said defendant Beggs claims to be entitled to receive said money from this plaintiff by virtue of a valid assignment from said Figel to him. Defendant Beggs filed an answer, denying the averments of the complaint respecting the said action of the Cement Company, and, further answering, by way of cross-complaint alleged: That the said money held by plaintiff belongs to cross-plaintiff; that, prior to the commencement of this action and prior to any claim upon said money by the Cement Company, and after the sale and delivery of said goods to Figel, he, the said Figel, for a valuable consideration, assigned to cross-plaintiff said demand against said Parkinson Company; that the Cement Company claims some interest therein, but without right. The Cement Company filed an amended answer to the cross-answer of Beggs: Denies that plaintiff has in its possession the said sum of $304.20, or any other sum belonging to cross-plaintiff; admits the sale of said goods to plaintiff; denies the assignment of said claim as alleged by cross-plaintiff; alleges that the writ of attachment was issued and served as alleged by plaintiff, and that it has never been released, and, upon information, alleges that it was served prior to any assignment by Figel to Beggs. As a further answer alleges: That prior to the commencement of this action, Figel was indebted to the Cement Company in the sum of about $30,000, for the recovery of which said company had commenced an action in said court; that at said time a writ of attachment was duly issued and was regularly served on said Parkinson Company; that by virtue of said writ the sheriff of said county "levied on all profits, assets, and things of value belonging to or standing in the name of said Fred H. Figel," and the said Cement Company, its agents and attorneys, made diligent search for any property belonging to said Figel, without avail, "except that property levied on by the said sheriff of said county under said writ and upon information alleges that said Figel had no property or assets save such as were levied upon" and certain accounts fraudulently assigned to the said Will M. Beggs, as hereinafter set forth more fully; that the total value of all money, property, assets, and things of value so levied upon, together with the accounts so assigned to said Will M. Beggs, is less than the debt due from said Fred H. Figel to the said Cement Company in the sum of $15,000, and that at the time of said assignment to said Beggs the said Figel was insolvent; that said Beggs is now and at all times herein mentioned he was the attorney of record for the said Figel, and was such attorney at the time of said alleged assignment. It is then alleged that, with intent to defraud the said Cement Company, Figel concealed, so far as he could, all of his assets, and, on information and belief, alleges that said Figel and Beggs conspired together to defraud said Cement Company, in pursuance of which Figel falsely pretended to make an assignment of the amount due from said Parkinson Company, and, furthermore, the said assignment was without consideration, "and was made after the levy of said attachment, and was dated prior thereto, in pursuance of said false and fraudulent conspiracy"; that at said time, in pursuance of said conspiracy, Figel executed assignments to said Beggs amounting to $8,516.20, all of which were made for the said fraudulent purposes. Defendant Figel answered plaintiff's complaint, admitting its averments and alleging that, prior to any levy of attachment, plaintiff was informed by defendant Figel that said account had been assigned to said Beggs.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The court made findings that the averments of the complaint were true; that the sum of $304.20, in possession of the clerk, deposited by plaintiff, belongs to defendant Beggs; that prior to the commencement of this action, and after the sale and delivery of the goods, Figel, "for a valuable consideration, sold, set over, and assigned to Will M. Beggs, the said demand" and the money due thereunder, and that the claim of the Cement Company thereto is without right; that said assignment was made on March 28, 1911, and the said attachment was levied on March 31, 1911; that, prior to the commencement of this action said Cement Company claimed that Figel was indebted to it in the sum of about $30,000, and had commenced suit against him to recover said sum of money, but that Figel had filed a verified answer thereto, denying that he owed said sum, or any other sum, of money to said Cement Company; that at the time said complaint was filed attachment was served on said money in the hands of said Parkinson Company due from said Figel; that under said writ the sheriff levied upon all property, assets, and things of value, belonging to or standing in the name of Figel, but that Figel "did not have, and has not now, any money, property, assets or things of value belonging to him, or standing in his name, other than those levied upon by said writ, and certain accounts assigned to Will M. Beggs," all of which, so levied upon, amounted in value to less than the amount claimed to be due from the said Figel to said Cement Company; that at the time of said assignment Figel was solvent and able to pay his debts in the regular course of business, and that said Beggs is now and at all times in this action mentioned was the regular attorney and counselor of the said Figel; that said Figel "has not in any manner concealed any of his assets or things of value so as to render nugatory any judgment which may be given against him in favor of" the Cement Company, "nor for any other purpose; nor did the said Figel and said Beggs, or either of them, conspire or connive together, or with any other person, to defraud" the said Cement Company, "or at all, nor did the said Figel falsely pretend to make an assignment of the amount due from the said" Parkinson Company "to the said Will M. Beggs, nor did the said Beggs falsely or fraudulently agree to accept, nor did he accept, the said assignment for the purpose of deceiving the said" Cement Company; "but the fact is that there was a good and valuable and valid consideration for the assignment, and it was made before the commencement of the action of" the Cement Company, against Figel, "and was dated on the date it was made, and was, in all respects, a valid and bona fide transaction."

As conclusion of law the court found that defendant and cross-plaintiff Beggs was entitled to recover the money deposited by plaintiff, and rendered judgment accordingly. It is from this judgment defendant, the Cement Company, appeals on bill of exceptions. No motion for new trial was made. The sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is challenged; that there was a good and valuable consideration for said assignment; that the assignment was not fraudulently made; that Figel was solvent at the time he made the assignment; that he made no concealment of his assets; and that neither he nor Beggs conspired to defraud the Cement Company.

The findings support the judgment, and we are only to inquire whether there is sufficient evidence to support the findings.

Appellant presents the following points: (1) That the circumstances all show that the assignment was fraudulent and a mere subterfuge to deprive the Cement Company of the money due it; (2) the assignment for future services was void against creditors; (3) a transfer to a creditor largely in excess of his demand, with an undertaking that the surplus is to be returned to the principal, is fraudulent and void; (4) that the evidence is that Figel assigned the accounts because he thought Beggs could collect them more readily than Figel could, and hence, being for the benefit of the assignor, is void as against creditors; (5) if any part of the assignment is for a consideration which the law does not permit, the whole assignment is void; (6) the assignments, if bona fide at all, are really for the benefit of creditors, and, as such, are void for failure to comply with the Code.

[1] Respondent Beggs makes the point, as conclusive of the controversy, that appellant has no standing in court to attack the conveyance from Figel to Beggs for the reason that it had no judgment, but only an attachment on a disputed claim, against Figel. The question has been many times considered by the courts of this country and not with harmonious results. In an extended note to Ziska v. Ziska, 20 Okl. 634, 95 Pac. 254, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1, many, but by no means all, of the cases are collated. Subject to some exceptions, the rule is undoubtedly as claimed by respondent. 3 Pom. Eq. Juris. § 1415.

The subject was quite fully considered in Aigeltinger v. Einstein, 143 Cal. 609, 77 Pac.

669, 101 Am. St. Rep. 131, and the cases decited by our Supreme Court up to that time (1904) were examined. Among the later cases is that of Lyden v. Spohn-Patrick Co., 155 Cal. 177, 183, 100 Pac. 236, in which the rule is reaffirmed.

[2] It appears, however, that all parties without objection submitted to an inquiry into the validity of the assignment to Beggs, and the court made full findings on the issues. Neither by demurrer to the answer of the Cement Company, alleging fraud, nor by objection to the evidence touching the alleged fraudulent conveyance to Beggs, was the question raised. Under such circumstances, we do not think the respondent Beggs should be permitted to rely solely on the point just discussed, nor need it be definitely decided. Having consented to an examination into the validity of the Figel assignment, appellant is entitled to a review of the question whether the evidence is sufficient to support the findings.

Figel is a dealer in lime, cement, and other building material at San Jose. The Cement Company is a manufacturer of lime and cement, and claimed that Figel was indebted to it in the sum of $30,000 for materials sold to him prior to March 28, 1911. The Cement Company guaranteed the lime against what is called "pitting" or "popping." This lime was for plastering purposes. Witness Dr. L. J. Belknap testified to serious damage suffered by him in using the lime purchased from Figel. Explaining the meaning of the term "popping," he testified:

> "There are little bits that pop out from the size of perhaps the head of a pin up to the size of a quarter, in some cases half an inch, that chip out by something in the slacking."

The effect of this "popping" was such that where it occurred the walls had to be scraped and replastered. A number of persons, who had used this lime, were making claims against Figel for damages, and among them some six or more contractors, amounting to more than $8,000. These claims were brought to the attention of the Cement Company by Figel. There was also a pending controversy about cement sold to the state by Figel, who had brought suit against the state for $5,386.06, and Figel informed the Cement Company that he would expect it to stand back of him in this suit. Figel did not deny that the Cement Company's claim amounted to $30,000, but he wrote them, and said, among other things:

> "I do not now, nor never did, recognize that I owed you this amount of money. You are well aware of the fact that many claims are being made by the contractors here growing out of the popping lime, and I will expect you to make me whole on any loss occasioned from that source."

The evidence shows that these controversies were pending before and at the time the Cement Company commenced its action against Figel, and that Figel was making an honest effort to meet its demands, but was seriously hampered by conditions chargeable, at least in considerable part, to the Cement Company.

Figel believed, and the evidence shows that he was justified in his belief, that it was necessary for him to employ attorneys, and he engaged Messrs. Beggs & McComish. They entered upon their employment and were rendering various services some time before the assignment. There was no definite understanding as to their fees, except that Figel was told the fee in the suit against the state would be at least $1,000 and expenses. Figel had on hand between $1,500, and $2,000, and, in reply to the question why he did not use this money to pay his attorneys, he testified that he needed it to carry on his business and to meet current obligations. He testified that he needed attorneys, not only to look after matters in litigation, but to assist in the collection of outstanding accounts, and that it was to secure his attorneys for their services performed and to be performed that he made the assignment to Mr. Beggs. This assignment embraced a number of claims aggregating $8,516.20, among them the one here involved against plaintiff for $304.20 and one involved in another case for $1,162.71, against Charles R. Parkinson Company, which, by stipulation, is to be considered on the transcript in the present case. Figel was called as a witness by defendant, Cement Company, and it is upon his testimony and upon the cross-examination of Mr. Beggs that the objections now urged to the judgment by appellant are chiefly based. Figel was examined at great length and with much minuteness as to the extent and character of his business, his relations to his assignee, Beggs, and his financial condition at the time of the assignment.

Mr. Beggs testified, on his cross-examination:

> "The consideration for that assignment is for several purposes; primarily to pay me for legal services, me and Mr. McComish for legal services already rendered and to be rendered for him, and costs and expenses of litigation."

He was asked what services he had rendered Figel prior to March 28th, and answered:

> "Considerable. I can't say the exact amount, but very many consultations; a suit had been brought in his favor against the state of California for some $6,000 in round figures, upon which nothing had been paid, for a fee; all of his affairs had been gone into, and they were considerable; had taken up both my time and Mr. McComish's for upwards of a month before this, or more, for quite a long time; I can't say the exact time, but quite a long time, and by this time they were getting very strenuous. Q. At that time did you expect an attachment by the Cowell Company? A. No, sir; not an attachment; we expected a suit but not an attachment."

When asked if he knew whether Figel had any money or property, he answered: "Oh, I knew he had large assets." As to his fee for services he testified:

"At the time of the assignment I did not have an agreement with Mr. Figel for a definite sum as to the amount of fees I was to receive. There was absolutely no definite sum agreed upon. I communicated to him approximately what it would be, about. In the state case that had already been filed, at least a thousand dollars, and whatever the expenses would be in addition to that; and there were a large number of other cases threatened that would be proportionately; the Engstrom Company was threatening to sue Mr. Figel for $4,000 or $5,-000 damages, and there were at least six other people outside of Cowell threatening to litigate certain claims that they had against Mr. Figel for considerable sums of money."

The suits last referred to were for damages caused by using this "popping" lime. He presented a list of the assigned claims and testified that they were all assigned to him on March 28, 1911. Being asked whether the assignment was for future services, he answered that it was not.

"Q. What did he give them to you for? A. For not only the services that I had rendered up to that time, or rather Mr. McComish and I had rendered, and for any other attorneys that would be necessary to employ in any of the litigation that was threatened in several directions and in several places, the expenses of that litigation, and damages that were claimed from various customers of Mr. Figel growing out of popping lime jobs. Q. Why was he turning money over to you to pay for damages that might result from suits brought against him by other people? A. I can't say; that is what was done; these claims had to be paid as soon as they were definitely settled, and I was authorized to settle them, and we proceeded to do so. I have settled some. The claim of the Engstrom Company, which as presented was some $4,000 or $5,000 was settled for between $2,100 and $2,200. What money was paid was money collected out of these assignments. * * * There was a hundred dollars paid to a man named Herman, paid out of money collected on these assignments. Q. What else? A. I think those are the only actual sums of money that I paid out of these collected. There are quite a number that are in dispute, and as soon as the amounts are definitely fixed, they are going to be paid; we are trying to get them down low. Q. Which ones are in dispute? A. Well, there is Dr. Belknap, in East San Jose, who is raising some new claims; there is the First National Bank in this city, raising some very large claims; it runs up into the thousands; there is Dr. Osborne, out at Santa Clara, also raising claims; there are several others that I just don't have in mind now. * * * Q. Well, now when you took these assignments did you agree to pay the damages that people might make for popping? A. The understanding, as I understood it, was this: That out of these moneys as they were collected the costs and expenses of any litigation that Mr. Figel might have should first be paid, including the attorney's fees; the surplus should be used so far as it could be to pay off any judgments for damages, or any claims that might be settled, growing out of these popping lime claims, and the surplus, if any, should be then paid Mr. Figel. Q. Some of these claims, you say, the bank, amounted to thousands of dollars? A. Yes. Q. More money than you got? A. Well, no; not more. I am in hopes that it will be cut down; that is why they have not yet been paid. The First National Bank wants a very large sum of money paid. Q. But supposing you have to pay the First National Bank, what do you get? A. I get mine first. Q. How much do you get first? A. I can tell you after it is collected and after the work is performed? Q. You cannot tell? A. I cannot tell."

It appears from Beggs' testimony that he had collected of these assigned accounts $3,-667.66, and had paid out in settlement of three of the "popping" claims $2,580, leaving in his hands $1,087.66 and the uncollected claims amounting to $4,848.54. Several contractors and others were called as witnesses who had claims for damages, from whose testimony it appears at least problematical whether any surplus will remain to come back to Figel after claims for damages are paid and his attorneys settled with, even if Mr. Beggs should succeed in collecting the balance of the accounts assigned to him, and whatever that balance may be is secured to the Cement Company by its attachment. In fact, except as to what may be the attorney's fees, the Cement Company is getting the benefit of all these assigned claims by the money being used to discharge liabilities for which it is answerable. Figel explained at some length why he found it necessary to employ attorneys, and his explanation seems reasonable. Speaking of the assignment to Beggs, he testified:

"I went through my books, and I picked out those accounts that were kind of long-winded coming in. I did not give them any nice, good accounts because I needed that money to pay your client with, you see [addressing the Cement Company's attorney, interrogator]; I kept paying your client all my ready cash, and I depended upon Mr. Beggs and Mr. McComish to make good on those popping lime jobs. I did not expect them to work for nothing; and that is how I came to make the assignment."

He testified that he had paid the Cement Company $10,000 on its account, reducing it to about $30,000. We cannot undertake to give even an epitome of the succeeding hundred folios of Figel's testimony. He was required to bring his books into court and explain in detail everything pertaining to his accounts and to explain over and over again why he found it necessary to employ attorneys and to assign to Beggs the accounts mentioned. We have failed to discover in his answers and explanations any sound reason for holding that the conclusions reached by the learned trial judge as to the bona fides of the transaction were unsupported by sufficient evidence. Figel made no concealment of what he was doing, but gave notice of the assignment to the several persons concerned before the Cement Company commenced its action. Nor can we say that evidence was wanting to justify the finding that Figel and Beggs did not conspire to defraud the Cement Company. Figel's troubles arose out of defective material purchased from that company, which it had guaranteed, and his efforts to settle the claims arising from its use by Figel's customers was a duty placed upon him the discharge of which the Cement Company should have encouraged rather than retarded.

[3] In its finding that Figel was solvent at the time said assignment was made, the court doubtless took into consideration, as it very properly could, the amount of offsets to the Cement Company's claim which the evidence showed would, in all probability, be successfully urged. Figel testified that he owed no debts except this claim of the Cement Company, and none were disclosed by his books. He had an established business, which had some value, though no price was put upon it. Aside from any good will, he showed visible assets in excess of the amount which would be due the Cement Company after it made good the losses claimed by Figel to be justly chargeable to the Cement Company. The burden of establishing his insolvency at the time of the assignment was on the Cement Company, as was the charge of fraud, and both should have been shown by clear and satisfactory evidence to have warranted a finding favorable to defendant's contention. Although the offsets to the Cement Company's claim were in some degree contingent and uncertain as to their amount, we do not think the trial court would have been justified in disregarding them in order to find Figel insolvent.

[4] It is urged that because the assignee was Figel's attorney and the assignment was for future services it is void against creditors. Some of the services were rendered before the assignment, and the assignor had a right to secure the services rendered and to be rendered. Morrel v. Miller, 28 Or. 354, 43 Pac. 490, 493, 45 Pac. 246; In re Luce, 83 Cal. 303, 23 Pac. 350. Figel's principal object by the assignment was: First, to secure his attorneys for their services, which he had a right to do; and, second, to have the proceeds used to settle the "popping" claims, as to which both Figel and the Cement Company were liable. That any surplus should come to him would be implied had it not been so understood. The fact that Figel thought Beggs a better collector than himself was not the motive for the assignment. Incidentally he may have so thought, but we cannot see that this element in the transaction is of serious consequence.

Nor does it appear to us that any part of the assignment was void, and thus, had it been true, making applicable the rule, if it is the rule, contended for, that the entire assignment is void. Figel could, as we have seen, secure his attorneys, and he had a right to make some provision to settle those harassing "popping" claims. Respondent cannot complain should there be a surplus, for it is secured to respondent by its attachment.

[5] No attempt was made to assign these claims for the benefit of all creditors, nor was there an assignment of all of Figel's property, not even all his outstanding accounts. It was not a general assignment such as in Sabichi v. Chase, 108 Cal. 86,† cited by appellant. At most it was an assignment for the benefit of his attorneys and to pay certain creditors by way of compromising, where possible, their claims for damages. Such an assignment the law permits. In the Matter of Muller v. Kennedy, 118 Cal. 432, 50 Pac. 660; Heath v. Wilson, 139 Cal. 362, 73 Pac. 182. It seems to us that the evidence shows that Figel was proceeding under sections 3431 and 3432 of the Civil Code, if he had the Code in mind at all, and not, as claimed by appellant, under section 3449 et seq., and that the assignment, though preferring a creditor, was therefore valid. See cases last above cited; also, Lawrence v. Neff, 41 Cal. 566, approved in Wood v. Franks, 67 Cal. 32, 7 Pac. 50; Saunderson v. Broadwell, 82 Cal. 132, 23 Pac. 36, and in Heath v. Wilson, supra. See, also, Roberts v. Burr, 135 Cal. 156, 67 Pac. 46; Crane Co. v. Dryer, 9 Cal. App. 290, 98 Pac. 1072.

CHARLES R. PARKINSON CO. v. FIGEL et al. (Civ. 1215.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 4, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; John E. Richards, Judge.

Action by the Charles R. Parkinson Company against Fred H. Figel and Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company, cross-defendant, and Will M. Beggs, cross-complainant. From a judgment awarding a fund in controversy to cross-complainant Beggs, the Henry Cowell Lime & Cement Company appeals. Affirmed.

Mastick & Partridge, of San Francisco, for appellant. Rogers, Bloomingdale & Free and R. C. McComish, all of San Jose, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. By stipulation, this case was to be heard and decided on the same transcript as in the case of Parkinson Bros. Co. against the same parties (No. 1214) 142 Pac. 135, this day decided. Upon the authority of the judgment in that case, the judgment in this case is affirmed.

POLKINGHORN v. RIVERSIDE PORTLAND CEMENT CO. (Civ. 1478.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1031*) — PRESUMPTIONS.

The party proposing the bill of exceptions is only required to set forth those proceedings illustrating the error claimed, and it is for the opposite party to propose any amendments showing that the errors were cured or nonprejudicial; and hence there is no presumption that evidence not included would show errors complained of to be nonprejudicial.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 1059*)—Review—Harmless Error.

In an action for the wrongful death of a servant killed between bins maintained by the master adjacent to railway tracks and a moving car, the exclusion of evidence that a car had struck the bin, offered to show knowledge on the part of the master that accidents were likely, is harmless, in view of an instruction that the master was chargeable with knowledge of any danger owing to the proximity of the bins to the tracks, or the excessive width of the cars; there being no showing that deceased was killed by a car similar to the one which struck the bins.

3. Evidence (§ 471*) — Opinion Evidence — Conclusion of Witness.

A statement by a witness that planks were placed on a bin so that men could go from one part to the other is a statement of facts, and not a conclusion.

4. Evidence (§ 471*)—Opinion Evidence.

A statement by a witness that he never noticed the dust to be thick enough in a certain locality that "you could not see 150 feet" is not a statement of opinion, but must be accepted as a statement of fact concerning his own ability to see in that locality.

5. Appeal and Error (§ 714*) — Review — Questions Presented by the Record.

The denial of instructions cannot be reviewed, where they do not appear in the record outside of the specifications of error.

6. Master and Servant (§ 270*)—Injuries to Servant—Actions—Evidence.

Where the complaint, in an action for the death of a servant, alleged that there was not sufficient space for a human being between the cars and bins adjacent to the tracks, testimony that the witness had stood there is admissible, without a showing that he and deceased were of similar size.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 913–927, 932; Dec. Dig. § 270.*]

7. Master and Servant (§ 295*)—Injuries to Servant—Liability of Master.

Under Civ. Code, § 1970, providing that an employer is not bound to indemnify his employé for injuries occasioned by the ordinary risks of the business, nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer, unless the employer failed to use due care in the selection of the negligent employé, the exception as to negligence of fellow servants does not affect the general provision, that the employer is not liable for injuries occasioned by the risk of the business; hence an instruction as to the ordinary risks of the business, in the terms of the statute, need not include the exception.

8. Trial (§ 295*)—Review—Harmless Error.

The giving of an instruction which alone might have misled the jury is not erroneous, where they could not have been misled by the instructions as a whole.

9. Trial (§ 260*)—Instructions—Refusal.

A refusal of requested instructions covered by those given is not error.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by William H. Polkinghorn, as administrator of Nick Shannas, deceased, against the Riverside Portland Cement Company. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

M. Estudillo and Geo. A. French, both of Riverside, for appellant. Gurney E. Newlin, of Los Angeles, and H. L. Carnahan, of Riverside, for respondent.

JAMES, J. Decision was heretofore made in this cause and a rehearing thereafter granted. The rehearing was ordered because of the contention of appellant that certain of the points relied upon for reversal were not treated of in the opinion. Upon a re-examination of the record and briefs the court is satisfied that the judgment heretofore ordered is the correct one to be entered, and the opinion, as filed on February 26, 1914, is, as to its main text, readopted as follows:

"This action was brought to recover damages occasioned by the death of one Nick Shannas, which was alleged to have been caused through the negligent acts of defendant. Verdict was in favor of the defendant, and plaintiff has appealed from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

"Nick Shannas, the deceased, was employed in July, 1910, as a day laborer at the cement manufacturing plant of defendant. In the carrying on of its business at its factory the defendant made use of a railroad track along which cars were propelled to and fro. Close beside this track in the yard of the factory was a rock crusher and certain rock bins. It was necessary for the convenient handling of the business of defendant that the rock crusher and bins should be placed, and they were so placed, close enough to the railroad track to enable material to be quickly handled to and from the cars and the bins and crusher. On the 27th day of July, in the year mentioned, Shannas was engaged at his work about the plant, when, as was a common occurrence, several cars were backed in upon the railroad track toward the point where the bins and rock crusher were located. As the cars came opposite the structures mentioned, Shannas was caught between a car and the planking and killed. It was alleged that no warning was given of the approach of the cars, and, further, that the rock crusher and planking were negligently located close to the track so as to render the place dangerous and unsafe for the employés to perform the labor required of them.

[1] "Appellant first assigns as error rulings of the court made respecting the admission of testimony. Respondent's counsel suggest that these alleged errors are not the subject of review, for the reason that the bill of exceptions does not purport to contain all of the evidence, and that in such case the presumption will be that the rulings, even though apparently erroneous, may have been rendered nonprejudicial by other evidence introduced, citing Brown v. Casey, 80 Cal. 504, 22 Pac. 257. From the very short opinion rendered in that case it might seem that some color of authority is given to support respondent's point, but reference to an earlier decision of the Supreme Court, as well as to later ones, and also to decisions of the District Courts of Appeal, will clear the question of any doubt and settle it against respondent's contention. The correct rule, as established by those cases, is that the party proposing a bill of exceptions is only required to set forth therein a record of so much of the proceedings as will illustrate the error claimed, and that it is the duty of the opposite party to propose, if he is able to, such amendments as will show that the alleged errors were cured or rendered nonprejudicial. It will not be presumed that if omitted evidence had been supplied a different case would be shown, but the presumption will be that the record does exhibit all matters material to a consideration of the points presented. Abbey Homestead Ass'n v. Willard, 48 Cal. 614; Judson v. Lyford, 84 Cal. 505, 24 Pac. 286; Bedan v. Turney, 99 Cal. 649, 34 Pac. 442; Couson v. Wilson, 2 Cal. App. 181, 83 Pac. 262; Lunnun v. Morris, 7 Cal. App. 710, 95 Pac. 907.

[2] "Error is assigned because the court refused to allow a witness for the plaintiff to answer the following question: 'Do you know of a steel car being run in there on that track at or near the time of the accident, which was so wide that it hit the sides of the timbers?' The announced purpose in the asking of this question was to show knowledge on the part of respondent of the dangerous condition at the place where the accident occurred. The court suggested that the question would be allowed if it was shown that a car of similar dimensions and kind to that used at the time of the accident was being used at any time when a collision happened between a car and the timbers. Appellant failed to qualify the question as suggested, and did not promise to follow up the answer with proof of similar conditions as those which were present at the time of the accident. It may also be noted that in the question asked the time to which the attention of the witness was directed was not fixed as being at or before, but 'at or near' the time of the accident. This might have meant either at, before, or after the accident. But assuming that the time indicated by the question was that pertinent to the case, it does not appear that error was committed. Counsel for appellant in their brief say: 'We contend that it is immaterial whether the car which hit the sides of the bins was of the exact size of the car which killed Nick Shannas or not, if it was a car ordinarily used on standard tracks, for in that case defendant would have knowledge of the proximity of the bins to the track and that there was not enough room betwen the bins and the sides of certain cars ordinarily used on railroads for a man to stand in safety.' The conditions as to the location of the bins and timbers were fixed, and respondent would be presumed to have had knowledge of those conditions as they then existed. There was no contention made that appellant did not have such knowledge, and on this subject the court, at the request of appellant, instructed the jury as follows: 'You are further instructed that in this case the plaintiff is not required to prove that the defendant had actual notice or knowledge of the dangerous condition of the premises, if any, of its tracks or any structures near the same, provided it appears from the evidence that said company in the exercise of ordinary care of inspection and supervision thereof would have discovered such condition.' Under this instruction the jury must have understood that the fixed conditions as to the size and width of cars used, as well as the proximity of the bins and timbers, were matters of which respondent must have had knowledge, for casual observation would have fully disclosed it.

[3] "It was not improper as suggesting a conclusion to allow a witness to say that certain planks were placed 'so the men could go from this half of the bin across there.' The purpose for which the planks were so placed was a matter of fact; as to whether they were sufficient for that purpose, or whether in the exercise of ordinary care for his safety Shannas might have used them, was a question for the jury.

[4] "One witness testified, in describing conditions which might have affected the ability of the deceased to observe his danger: 'I never noticed dust thick enough there that you could not see a distance of 150 feet.' The objection to this answer rests upon very slight foundation. It is argued that because the witness used the personal pronoun in the second person, he was not giving testimony of his own knowledge, but an opinion as to what persons then addressed might have been able to do. The phrase was couched in words of common habit that could not reasonably have been misunderstood by the jury.

[5] "Among the specifications of error are some which set forth that the court refused to give certain instructions asked for by appellant. The text of such instructions does not appear in the record outside of the specifications, and therefore this court has no means of determining the merits of the points made under those assignments."

[6] The particular matters adverted to in the petition for rehearing are now to be considered: It was objected that testimony given by two witnesses, Parker and Kindred, was incompetent. These witnesses testified that they had stood beside the "pit" when cars of similar size and dimensions to that which crushed the Greek passed them without coming in contact with their persons. The point where these witnesses stated they had stood was within 11 to 23 feet from where Shannas was killed and was at the place where Shannas performed his work. Plaintiff had alleged in his complaint that the only outlet from the point where Shannas was engaged in shoveling rock on the morning of the accident "was along the track upon which said cars were approaching; that said rock pile and planking and said rock crusher and pit were so close to the track that there was not space sufficient for a human being to stand between said box cars and the same, and by reason of said facts that said premises were dangerous, inadequate in size, and unsafe to work upon." By this allegation plaintiff asserted that there was not sufficient space for any human being to stand between the cars and any of the structures described, including the "pit." The testimony of the two witnesses mentioned was pertinent as furnishing some evidence in contradiction of the facts alleged and relied upon by plaintiff to show the unsafe condition of the place where Shannas was employed on the day he was killed.

[7] The court gave to the jury the following instruction:

"You are instructed that an employer is not bound or under obligation to indemnify his employés for losses suffered by said employés in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which they are employed; and that if you believe from the evidence that the injuries sustained by said Nick Shannas were sustained in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which he was employed at the time of his injuries, there is no obligation on the part of the defendant to indemnify said Nick Shannas or his heirs at law for the injuries sustained by said Nick Shannas, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

It is contended that this instruction was erroneous in that it did not make a complete statement of certain provisions of section 1970 of the Civil Code. That portion of the instruction which was taken literally from the Code embodied that sentence appearing in the instruction and ending with the semicolon after the word "employed." The omitted part of that portion of the Code section claimed to be important for consideration followed immediately after the portion that was quoted, and is as follows:

"Nor in consequence of the negligence of another person employed by the same employer in the same general business, unless the negligence causing the injury was committed in the performance of a duty the employer owes by law to the employé, or unless the employer has neglected to use ordinary care in the selection of the culpable employé. * * *"

It does not appear that the omitted provisions, as is contended by appellant, are to be taken as in qualification of the general statement that an employer is not liable for damages occurring in consequence of the ordinary risks of the business in which the injured employé is engaged. If this construction be the correct one, then the instruction as given was free from error in that it presented clearly and definitely the one proposition to the jury which is set forth in the opening sentence of the section referred to.

[8] Another instruction is referred to, and is made the subject of the criticism that its statement of the law was prejudicially erroneous. It is numbered 23, and is as follows

"You are instructed that if you believe that the business of working on and about a railroad track is a dangerous and hazardous employment, and if you further believe that the injuries sustained by said Nick Shannas were on account of one of the dangers or hazards ordinarily incidental to such business of working on or about railroad tracks, then your verdict must be for the defendant."

[9] It is first argued that the instruction required the jury, where they formed any belief or opinion that the business of working on or about a railroad track is a dangerous one, the other facts stated concurring, to find in favor of the defendant, and did not tell them that such belief so engendered in their minds must be a reasonable belief and conclusion drawn from the evidence; secondly, that the instruction was erroneous in that it eliminated the application of the "last clear chance doctrine." It is difficult to understand how the jury could have been misled so far as to assume that any conclusion that they might arrive at, whether drawn from the evidence or not, in regard to the dangerous and hazardous character of the business of working on or about a railroad track, or as to the injuries of Shannas having been sustained on account of one of such dangers, would be sufficient to require a verdict in favor of the defendant. The instructions as a whole were quite complete, and when this instruction is considered in connection with the whole charge, it is not misleading in terms or effect. Furthermore, at the request of plaintiff, the jury were fully charged as to the responsibility of defendant to answer in damages if the facts were such as to show a liability under the "last chance doctrine."

The order is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. BOWMAN. (Cr. 232.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 881*)—Obtaining Note by False Pretenses—Special Verdict.

Where defendant was charged with obtaining a note from complainant by false pretenses on which defendant obtained the proceeds by discount, a verdict finding defendant guilty of obtaining the signature of complainant on a certain note by false pretenses, but with no intention to defraud complainant of the amount, was not a valid, special verdict, not being responsive to the charge of "obtaining the note" from complainant as distinguished from his "signature," and in that the finding that he did not intend to deprive complainant of the amount was immaterial, since, if he intended to obtain the note by false representations, the offense was complete, though he might have intended to save complainant harmless from liability to repay the money.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 2089, 2093; Dec. Dig. § 881.*]

2. False Pretenses (§ 4*)—Elements of Offense—Fraud.

One is defrauded of his property when he is induced to part with it by reason of the false or fraudulent pretenses and representations of another, the offense being complete when, by means of such false pretenses, the fraud intended is consummated by the accused obtaining possession of the property sought, so that if the false pretense is among the means by which accused obtained the property, he has committed the full crime as though no other influence was combined therewith.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 893*)—TRIAL—VERDICT—ENTRY.

Where an insufficient verdict is legally declared and entered, it is binding on the court and defendant is entitled to discharge.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 881*)—TRIAL—DEFECTIVE VERDICT—SUBSEQUENT PROCEDURE.

Pen. Code, § 1161, provides that if the jury renders a verdict which is neither general nor special, the court may direct them to reconsider it, and it cannot be recorded until it is rendered in some form, from which it can be clearly understood that the intent of the jury is either to render a general verdict or to find the facts specially and leave the judgment to the court. In a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses the jury returned two verdicts, the first finding defendant guilty of obtaining the signature of complainant to a certain note by false pretenses, but with no intention to defraud complainant of the amount, and the second finding defendant guilty of the crime charged and leaving him to the mercy of the court. Held, that, since the first verdict was neither general nor special and was fatally defective, the court was not required to send the jury back to return a proper verdict, but was justified in rejecting it and receiving the second as the lawful verdict.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 563*)—FALSE PRETENSES—CORPUS DELICTI—EXTRAJUDICIAL STATEMENTS AND ADMISSIONS.

Where, in a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses, the implied findings of the jury did not rest on accused's admissions as testified to by witnesses, but on false statements made by accused as an inducement for the delivery of the note, the rule that the corpus delicti cannot be proved by the extrajudicial statements and admissions of accused was inapplicable.

6. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 49*)—FINDINGS—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses, evidence held to support an implied finding of the jury that accused procured the note by means of a false representation that he had at the time in a local bank bonds of a Chicago bank of the cash value of $3,800, which he would sell and with the proceeds pay the note, and that his offer of shares in a corporation formed by him to operate a drug store, to the maker of the note for his accommodation, formed no part of the inducing cause of the maker's signing the same.

7. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 41*)—OBTAINING NEGOTIABLE PAPER—DEFENSES—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses, it appearing that accused took the note to the county treasurer, with whom he had some unexplained relation affecting county funds, and that the treasurer delivered the note to the payee, who indorsed a certificate of deposit for the amount of the note and gave it to the treasurer, who cashed it and paid the money into the county treasury, evidence that such transaction was to make good money improperly loaned by the treasurer from the county treasury was inadmissible as furnishing no defense for obtaining the note from the maker, who knew nothing of accused's relations with the county treasurer, by false pretenses.

8. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 49*)—INTENT—EVIDENCE.

Where accused obtained a note from G. on the false pretense that he had certain bank bonds which he would sell and pay the note with the proceeds, the question of fraudulent intent was for the jury, to be determined from all the circumstances of the case; and hence the fact that accused, after securing the note, turned over to G. as security certain shares in a corporation did not conclusively show that accused did not intend to cheat or defraud G. when he obtained the note.

9. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 49*)—FALSITY OF PRETENSE—ESTABLISHING NEGATIVE.

Where accused induced G. to execute a note for his accommodation on the alleged false representation that accused had bonds of an unnamed Chicago bank in a local bank, which he would send to Chicago and sell and use the proceeds to pay the note, it was not necessary for the state, in order to prove the falsity of such representation, to examine the officers of every Chicago bank, but proof of an examination of accused's deposit box in the local bank that it contained no such bonds, and that the local banker, whom accused had stated had refused to cash the bonds, never saw them or had any knowledge concerning them, was sufficient, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, to justify a finding that the representation was false.

10. FALSE PRETENSES (§ 49*)—FALSE REPRESENTATIONS—PROMISE TO ACT IN FUTURE.

Where accused procured G.'s signature to a note by a false representation that accused owned certained bonds deposited in a local bank, the fact that he promised that he would have the bonds cashed and use the proceeds to pay the note did not conclusively show that G. relied on the promise to do something in the future so as to defeat a prosecution for false pretenses; the promise being impossible of fulfillment because he had no such bonds.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where, in a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses, accused proved that he delivered certain shares in a drug corporation to prosecutor as security, but there was no evidence that the corporation owned the drug store it was organized to carry on, or that it owned any other property of value, the admission of the state, Compiled Statements of Domestic Corporations, showing that the charter of the corporation in question had been forfeited for nonpayment of a license tax, was not prejudicial to accused.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1169*)—APPEAL—REVIEW—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE—PREJUDICE.

Where accused, in a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses, proved the delivery of certain corporate stock to prosecutor as collateral security, but the stock was shown to have been valueless, accused was not prejudiced by the admission of evidence of the secretary of the corporation that in June or July, 1912, and about the time accused obtained the note, he stated to witness that the corporation "had fallen through."

13. False Pretenses (§ 52*)—Instructions.

Where the first part of an instruction stated that every person who knowingly and designedly, by any false or fraudulent representations or pretenses, defrauds any person of property, and thereby obtains possession thereof, etc., a subsequent clause thereof, declaring that any pretense sufficient to impose on the person to whom it is made, if made with intent to cheat or defraud him, if property is obtained thereby, is sufficient to sustain a conviction, was not objectionable as omitting to charge that the pretense must be false or fraudulent.

14. Criminal Law (§ 823*)—Instructions—Proof—Reasonable Doubt.

An instruction that an intention to defraud is inferable from all the facts of the case, and need not be substantially proved, was not defective as misleading the jury to believe that any degree of proof, however slight, would be sufficient, the court having subsequently further charged that accused's intent to cheat and defraud might be inferred from all the facts and circumstances bearing thereon, in evidence in the case, provided they were sufficient to satisfy the jury of such intent beyond a reasonable doubt.

15. Criminal Law (§§ 763, 764*)—Instructions on Facts—False Pretenses.

An instruction that it was not necessary that the prosecuting witness expressly testify that an alleged false pretense induced him to act as he did, but, if the jury were satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, from the testimony of other witnesses and from all the facts and circumstances in the case, that the pretense induced the prosecutor to part with his property to accused, that was sufficient to that extent, meant only that the fact was capable of proof by testimony of other witnesses and from all the facts and circumstances in the case, and was not objectionable as a charge on a question of fact.

16. Criminal Law (§ 815*)—Instructions Ignoring Evidence—False Pretenses.

In a prosecution for obtaining a note from G. by false pretenses, an instruction that when the pretense made by accused was false and known to be so by him it was no defense that accused intended or expected to pay for the property obtained when he was able to do so, and it was no defense that he himself received no money personally from the note if the jury believed beyond a reasonable doubt that he intended to and did defraud G. of the same by the use and means of the false pretense, was not objectionable as in fact instructing the jury to disregard all the testimony concerning certain stock of a drug store corporation that accused offered the prosecutor as security.

17. False Pretenses (§ 52*)—"Fraud"—Instructions.

In a prosecution for obtaining a note by false pretenses, an instruction that deception, deliberately practiced to secure an unfair advantage of another, is "fraud," and property obtained by such practice is property obtained by fraud, the person deprived of his property by such means being defrauded, was proper.

18. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Trial—Misconduct of Attorney—Prejudice.

In a prosecution for false pretenses, the special prosecutor in his address to the jury stated that he knew accused was guilty of the crime, that he had defrauded a brother Mason (prosecutor) fraudulently and intentionally, and also that he knew accused, "according to this evidence," was guilty. Held, that such statements were not in the nature of testimony, and, there being ample evidence to establish accused's guilt, they were not prejudicial.

19. Criminal Law (§ 236*)—Stenographers' Notes—Correction.

Where a court reporter, in transcribing her notes, substituted "on" for "in" in the phrase "on a bank in Chicago," referring to certain bonds, the court was authorized to accept the stenographer's explanation that she made a mistake in her notes, which she corrected in transcribing, that there was no intention to change the testimony as given, and that there was in fact no change.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge.

J. P. Bowman was convicted of obtaining a note by false and fraudulent pretenses, and he appeals, on rehearing.

Former opinion withdrawn and judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial affirmed.

James N. Gillett and F. A. Cutler, both of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing was granted that we might give consideration to an alleged special verdict that now appears in the corrected transcript, but which was not before us at the former hearing. In relation to the said verdict the account presented by the record is as follows:

"The jury returned into court.

"Judge Childs: Have you reached a verdict, gentlemen?

"Foreman: We have two verdicts, and if the one is not legal, we have another.

"The Court: You will pass it over. The foreman passed to the court a document which read as follows: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of obtaining the signature of N. Giacomini on a certain promissory note under false pretenses, but with no intention to defraud said N. Giacomini of the amount. Wm. McAdoo, Foreman.'

"The Court: This does not find him guilty of anything.

"Foreman: Then we have this verdict: 'We, the jury, find the defendant guilty of the crime charged and leave to the mercy of the court.' The jury was then polled."

Appellant claims that the first of the foregoing constituted a special verdict within the contemplation of the following sections of the Penal Code:

"The jury may * * * when they are in doubt as to the legal effect of the facts proved, * * * find a special verdict." Section 1150.

"A special verdict is that by which the jury find the facts only, leaving the judgment to the court." Section 1152.

"The special verdict must be reduced to writing by the jury, or in their presence entered upon the minutes of the court, read to the jury and agreed to by them, before they are discharged." Section 1153.

"A special verdict need not be in any particular form, but is sufficient if it present inteligently the facts found by the jury." Section 1154.

[1] It is argued by appellant that:

"This verdict contained all of the facts necessary to be found in an action for obtaining money or property by false pretenses. In such an action two material facts must appear, namely, false and fraudulent representations or pretenses whereby one defrauds another person of money, labor, or property, and that there was an intent at the time to defraud. This verdict finds the fact that the defendant obtained the signature of N. Giacomini to a promissory note under false pretenses, and it also further finds that the defendant had no intention to defraud N. Giacomini."

The foregoing is not altogether accurate, and contains only a partial truth, as an analysis of the information and of said verdict will clearly demonstrate. In the information it appears that by false representations the defendant induced said Giacomini to perform two separate acts, namely, to execute or sign the note and to deliver it to said Bowman. It is manifest that if either one of these was superinduced by said fraudulent pretenses and thus appellant was enabled to obtain possession of said note to the prejudice of Giacomini, the offense would be complete. It might be true that the signature was obtained without fraud, but if the delivery was caused by false representations, a verdict of guilty might follow. Thus it appears that no judgment could be based upon the mere finding of the jury that the signature was obtained without any intention to defraud, because it leaves undetermined the character of the other vital element, the delivery of possession of the note.

The latter part of section 1152 of the Penal Code adds a degree of certainty to what is implied in the first sentence of said section. It is that the special verdict "must present the conclusions of fact as established by the evidence * * * and these conclusions of fact must be so presented as that nothing remains to the court but to draw conclusions of law upon them." If the finding of fact be consistent with either a verdict of guilty or of not guilty, as it was in this case, it is apparent that it does not constitute a special verdict as that term is used in the statute. In other words, if the finding does not embrace all the material facts charged in the information, it is not sufficient of itself to support any judgment, and no conclusion of law can be by the court based thereupon.

If the fraud, as alleged in the information, related only to the act of securing the signature of Giacomini, or if it was averred that by means of these false and fraudulent statements defendant had obtained the note and the jury had found that he obtained it without any intention to defraud, in either of these contingencies, of course, the case would be different.

But the so-called special verdict is radically defective in another respect. The jury found, not that Bowman had no intention to defraud Giacomini, or that he did not knowingly make the false statements, but that he had no intention to defraud the latter "of the amount." While the expression is not very clear, the jury probably meant that Bowman had no intention of defrauding Giacomini of the amount of money that the latter might be called upon to pay by reason of the note. But Bowman, at the time he secured the signature of Giacomini, might fully have intended to pay the note himself and to save Giacomini harmless, and yet this would not affect a single element of the crime. If defendant made the said false representations knowingly and with the intention of obtaining said note, and he did thereby obtain the note to the prejudice of Giacomini, he committed the crime whatever might have been his intentions as to his repayment of the money. The fraudulent intent contemplated by section 532 of the Penal Code is the intent, by means of the false representations, to secure the property which is sought by the party charged.

Manifestly no defense would be found in the claim that he fully intended at the time to make the aggrieved party whole if a defendant, by means of false representations, knowingly secures the promissory note of another and thereby obtains credit to the prejudice of the maker.

In People v. Wieger, 100 Cal. 356, 34 Pac. 827, it is said:

"In the assumption that it must be held that defendant did not intend to defraud the Sharpless firm, if he intended at the time to pay for the goods according to the contract of sale, and truly believed that he was able to do so, I think counsel is in error. Deception, deliberately practiced for the purpose of gaining an unfair advantage of another, is fraud. Goods obtained by such practices are obtained by fraud. One deprived of his property by such means is defrauded."

And among the cases cited by Judge Temple is Commonwealth v. Coe, 115 Mass. 481, wherein it is said:

"The intent to defraud is the intent, by the use of such false means, to induce another to part with his possession and confide it to the defendant, when he would not otherwise have done so. Neither the promise to pay, nor the intention to do so, will deprive the false and fraudulent act in obtaining it of its criminality."

[2] One is defrauded of his property "when he is induced to part with it by reason of the false or fraudulent pretenses and representations, and the offense is complete when by means of such false pretenses the fraud thereby intended is consummated by obtaining possession of the property sought." People v. Bryant, 119 Cal. 597, 51 Pac. 961.

"If the false pretense was among the means by which he obtains the valuable thing, he has committed the full crime the same as though no other influence combined therewith." 2 Bishop's Criminal Law, 424.

From the foregoing it follows that if the jury in said verdict had found specifically that the defendant was guilty as charged in the information, it might have been properly entered as a verdict of conviction notwithstanding the concluding clause. Under the decisions, however, it must be held that the finding, "guilty of obtaining the signature of N. Giacomini on a certain promissory note under false pretenses," is not a sufficiently certain and definite response to the general issue to meet the requirement of the law.

In People v. Small, 1 Cal. App. 320, 82 Pac. 87, the defendant was charged with defrauding a person of $100 in money, and it was held that a verdict finding the defendant "guilty of the crime of felony, to wit, obtaining money by false pretenses," was insufficient to support a judgment of conviction. Therein are cited People v. Cummings, 117 Cal. 497, 49 Pac. 476, and People v. Tilley, 135 Cal. 62, 67 Pac. 42. In the former the defendant was charged with obtaining the promissory note of C. Schnelle for the value of $175 by certain false and fraudulent pretenses, and the verdict found that "the defendant is guilty of defrauding C. Schnelle of the note of $175 in the indictment mentioned." The verdict was held to be insufficient for the reason that it did not find as to the false and fraudulent representations alleged in the indictment.

In the Tilley Case the verdict was:

"We, the jury in the above entitled case, find the defendant, Chas. H. Tilley, guilty of receiving stolen property."

It was held insufficient, principally for the reason that it did not appear in said verdict that he had knowledge that the property was stolen. So, in the said verdict here, in addition to other objections, there is no finding that the false pretenses were knowingly made, and the said verdict is uncertain as to what were the false pretenses, and the note is not indentified as the one set out in the information.

[3] Notwithstanding the foregoing infirmities, if said verdict had been legally declared and entered it would have been binding upon the court and defendant would have been entitled to his discharge. People v. Small, supra. The judge, however, seasonably recognized the insufficiency of the said verdict and made the declaration as aforesaid.

[4] The said verdict having been neither general nor special the duty of the court is prescribed in section 1161 of the Penal Code as follow:

"If the jury render a verdict which is neither general nor special, the court may direct them to reconsider it, and it cannot be recorded until it is rendered in some form from which it can be clearly understood that the intent of the jury is either to render a general verdict or to find the facts specially and to leave the judgment to the court."

It seems, though, that the jury had anticipated the action of the court and had already agreed upon another verdict proper in form, and which they immediately declared to be their true verdict. Of course, it was not necessary for the jury to retire again to reconsider their verdict, since they had already accomplished the purpose of such reconsideration. It is equally apparent that the defendant was not prejudiced by the peculiar phraseology of the said remark of the trial judge. It is as plain as anything can be that the only effect of said remark upon the jury was to confirm them in their apprehension or belief that the first verdict was insufficient. The said statement did not influence the second verdict for the very obvious reason that it had already been agreed upon. It follows that as to said proceeding there is nothing of which appellant can justly complain.

One other point strongly insisted upon by appellant on the rehearing is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the inference that defendant was not the owner of the bonds, and he criticizes the following statement in our former opinion herein: "There were no bonds on a Chicago bank or elsewhere in defendant's box," and "he had a deposit box in which he kept his corporation shares, but it contained no bonds." We are satisfied, however, after a re-examination of the record, that the foregoing is not only a reasonable, but the only rational, inference from the testimony of the witnesses Rice and Lauff, and we adopt, with slight modification, the views expressed in the original opinion as follows:

"At the close of the trial defendant moved the court to advise the jury to acquit defendant, which motion was denied. The point urged that the corpus delicti had not been proven was predicated of a failure to prove the falsity of the statements made by defendant with regard to the Chicago bank bonds. It is claimed that it was incumbent on the prosecution to prove that defendant did not own such bonds, of which, it is contended, there was no proof, citing People v. Simonsen, 107 Cal. 345, 40 Pac. 440; that the ruling on defendant's motion 'clearly involved the whole merits of the case, which included proof of the corpus delicti.' People v. Ward, 145 Cal. 736, 79 Pac. 448, is cited, where it was said: 'The elements of this crime necessary to the establishment of the corpus delicti are false statements adapted to the fraudulent purpose, and money parted with upon the faith of such statements.' And it was further said: 'In this case there was no substantial evidence of the falsity of the statements alleged to have been made by the defendant aside from the testimony of witnesses as to his admissions.'

[5] "The principle of the two cases cited is the same—that the extrajudicial statements and admissions of the defendant are not alone sufficient. In the present case the implied findings of the jury do not rest upon the admissions of defendant as testified to by witnesses. The findings rest upon the false statements made to Giacomini by defendant as an inducement for the delivery to him of said note.

[6] "Defendant was engaged in selling drugs, his store being in Crescent City. Giacomini was a man of advanced years, and was engaged in farming some miles in the country. They were friends, and on previous occasions Giacomini had assisted defendant financially in a small way. On July 28 or 29, 1912, defendant, being in earnest need of money for immediate use, went to his old friend at his farm to obtain relief. What occurred there was in the presence of Giacomini, his wife, his son, and a farm hand, and was testified to by them. The testimony was that Giacomini, when first requested to sign the note, refused to do so; defendant urged upon him the importance of his signing so that he could get the money the next day on the note and, to aid him in his attempt to persuade Giacomini to sign, defendant called Mrs. Giacomini out of their house and urged her to have her husband execute the note; she promptly refused, and said he must not sign, that they were old, their farm mortgaged, that their son was not in good health and had a large family, and positively refused to consent. 'Q. What did Mr. Bowman say then? A. He told me to let him sign that note, that he had to have the money at Hegler's Bank, and that he had bonds that he got from Chicago that was worth $3,800. Q. What did he say that he had? A. Bonds that were worth $3,800. He said that Hegler said that he would not accept the bonds, and that he had to have some money, there at the bank. And I said that, "It is funny that he won't accept them" I said, "It is funny that Mr. Hegler won't do it if you have got them bonds there and they are good. It is funny to me." Q. What else did you say, to Mr. Bowman about the bonds? A. He said that Hegler won't cash, or accept them bonds for cash. He said that they had to be sent back to Chicago to get them cashed. And I said that "It is funny if them bonds are good that he won't cash them," and he said that Hegler didn't know much about the bank business. Q. Mrs. Giacomini, did Mr. Bowman say to you, or in your presence, anything about whose bonds those were? A. Yes, he said that they were his own bonds he had deposited there at Hegler's Bank, and that it was more than $3,800, and that when he got the money back from Chicago it would pay the note. Then he said when the money was back that my husband would be out of the note. Then I said, "No," again, that I don't want him to have anything to do with it. Q. When you speak of Mr. Hegler's Bank what bank do you mean? A. The Crescent City Bank. Q. What Hegler is it? A. We always call it Hegler's Bank. * * * Q. After that did your husband sign the note? A. He made him believe that there was going to be no trouble and my husband signed the note. Q. What did your husband do with it? A. Then he handed it to Mr. Bowman. Q. To this man here (pointing to defendant)? A. Yes. Q. You saw that with your own eyes? A. Yes. Then he saw that I was mad. Because I didn't want to let him sign the note and Bowman said, "Don't be afraid, I tell you another thing, Mrs. Giacomini," he says, "if anything should happen inside of those two weeks until the money is back, I will give you security in the drug store." Q. That was after the note was given? A. Yes, after the note was given, because I kicked against it all the time to sign the note.'

"Giacomini testified that he was induced to sign the note by defendant's representations; that he had in the Crescent City Bank bonds of a Chicago bank of the cash value of $3,800; that he 'depended on the bonds'; that after he had signed and delivered the note defendant said that he had shares in a drug store that he would give him as security.

[7] "There was, we think, sufficient evidence to support the implied finding of the jury that defendant procured the note by means of the representation that he had at the time in the Crescent City Bank Chicago bank bonds of the cash value of $3,800, and that the offered shares in defendant's drug store formed no part of the inducing cause to sign the note. Giacomini testified: 'Q. Did you believe the story that he told you about the Chicago bank bonds? A. That is the reason that I signed my name to the note because I believed him. I believed that he had the bonds. * * * Q. Do you remember whether Mr. Bowman said anything about O. B. Lauff going on the note? A. He mentioned Mr. Lauff and another man, but I didn't think of anything but the Chicago bonds; that is what I depended upon. * * * Q. Did you sign the note because Mr. Lauff was going on it? A. No.' Lauff did in fact sign the note, and after Giacomini had paid it secured him to the extent of one-half its face. Defendant took the note to S. W. Rice, county treasurer, with whom defendant had some unexplained relation affecting the county funds. Rice delivered the note to Gamboni, the payee, who indorsed a certificate of deposit on the Crescent City Bank for the amount of the note and gave it to Rice, who cashed it and paid the money into the county treasury. Defendant was not permitted to show that this was a transaction to make good the money improperly loaned by Rice from the county treasury; the court correctly holding that it furnished no defense for having obtained the note from Giacomini, who knew nothing of defendant's financial relations with Rice. Indeed, defendant's representation was that he needed the money to pay to the bank. Rice testified that when defendant handed him the note he did not tell him 'how he came to get it; nor did he say anything about his promising to give Giacomini stock in his drug store as security. He gave me a key to his deposit box and told me to take bonds or stock or something out of it and give it to Mr. Giacomini when he called for it, but the nature of it I didn't know.' He testified that he took the package out of defendant's box and secured a box in Lauff's name, deposited the package in the box and gave him the two keys, and this ended Rice's connection with the matter. A week or more later Giacomini received one of the keys from Lauff. The package referred to was shares in a corporation formed by defendant to carry on the business of selling drugs and other merchandise. This package of shares remained in the box and was produced at the trial by Lauff. There were no bonds of a bank in Chicago or elsewhere in defendant's box. Mr. Hegler, cashier of the Crescent City Bank, testified that defendant left with him no bonds; that he had never spoken to him about cashing any bonds, and he 'didn't know he had any,' and did not know that he ever had any bonds in the bank on deposit, but what he had in his deposit box he did not know.

"There was evidence that defendant formed a corporation, in February, 1912, with a capital stock of $15,000 divided into 150 shares of the par value of $100 each, 98 shares of which were issued to defendant and 1 share each to two other persons to qualify them as directors; that the object of the corporation was to carry on the drug business, and probably it was defendant's intention to transfer his stock of drugs to this corporation. Mr. Parsons, secretary of the corporation, testified that it was the understanding that these shares were 'in payment for the drug store and the merchandise in it which he (defendant) then owned, and which the corporation was then taking over.' There was no evidence other than this that there had been any transfer of the stock of drugs to the corporation, or that the shares had any value; there was no evidence that it had transacted any business, other than to issue these shares, or that the drug store was thereafter conducted by the corpora tion. It was shown by the certificate of the Secretary of State that the charter of the corporation was declared forfeited, November 30, 1912, for nonpayment of license tax for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1913. An inventory of defendant's stock of goods was taken for his creditors, in December, 1912, showing a value of about $5,000, but whether these were creditors of the corporation or of defendant individually does not appear. This evidence as to these corporation shares and defendant's offer to give them to Giacomini as security was introduced as tending to rebut any evidence of an intention to cheat him.

[8] "It is urged that defendant's offer to turn over his corporation shares as security is inconsistent with any intention to cheat or defraud his friend. Assuming that these shares in fact had some value, which is not shown, the placing of them in the hands of Giacomini and Lauff would tend in some degree to negative evidence of fraudulent intent in the transaction and thus eliminate one of the elements necessary to constitute the crime involved. But the question of fraudulent intent was with the jury, and was to be determined from all the circumstances in the case. The turning over of these shares as security after he had secured the note signed by Giacomini was not conclusive of the question of intent when he made the representations which induced Giacomini to sign and deliver the note.

[9] "Nor does it seem to us that there was a failure to establish the falsity of the representations on which Giacomini acted. It is true there is no direct evidence that defendant did not own and have in the bank at Crescent City the bonds he claimed to have there. It was shown that the cashier of the bank had no knowledge of his having any bonds there. He had a deposit box in which he kept his corporation shares, but it contained no bonds. He represented that the cashier had refused to cash them, from which it must be inferred that, if true, the cashier had some knowledge of them. But he testified that he had none. There was left, then, no source of proof to the prosecution but to examine the officers of every bank in Chicago. In establishing a negative, do the rules of law require more than was here shown? We think not. It is not always possible—indeed, it is generally impossible—to prove an absolute negative, and such proof as is available is generally circumstantial and inferential. Defendant did not testify, nor did he offer any evidence tending to show, that he ever owned the bonds or any bonds such as represented by him. Upon this point, see Wharton's Crim. Ev. (10th Ed.) vol. 1, pp. 693, 694; Wharton's Crim. Law (11th Ed.) vol. 2, pp. 1615, 1631. We have no hesitancy in holding that the proofs submitted by the prosecution were sufficient to support the inference that defendant had no such bonds.

[10] "Defendant cites 19 Cyc. 395, Commonwealth v. Stevenson, 127 Mass. 446, and Cook v. State, 71 Neb. 243, 98 N. W. 810, to the proposition that 'a mere promise to do something, relating as it does to a future event, is not within the statute.' The proposition as stated may be conceded to be the rule. Defendant claims that Giacomini 'signed the note upon the promise made by the defendant that he would get some money in Chicago upon some bonds which he owned, and in two or three weeks he would be able to pay it.' The evidence, in our opinion, when fully considered, justified the inference that the persuading fact inducing Giacomini to sign the note was his belief, founded on defendant's representations, that he had in his possession these valuable bonds sufficient to convince him that he would not lose by accommodating defendant. The evidence shows that Giacomini's relations with defendant were of so friendly a character as would justify him in believing that there was no risk so long as defendant had bonds capable of being turned into cash. The fact that defendant said he would send them to Chicago, and that he would have the money in two or three weeks to take up the note, does not conclusively show that the note was signed under a promise to do something relating to a future event. The jury were justified, from all the evidence before them, in finding that Giacomini's reliance, as a moving cause for signing the note, rested on the representation that defendant had these bonds in his possession. In the case here there was a false statement, as found by the jury, to which was added the false promise, a false statement by defendant that he had the bonds, to which he added the false promise that he would have them cashed, a promise impossible of fulfillment because he had no bonds. Such a concurrent promise does not overcome the force of the false pretense. Wharton's Crim. Law (11th Ed.) vol. 2, § 1438; State v. Briggs, 7 L. R. A. (N. S.) note at page 278.

[11] "It is urged that the court erred in admitting the certified copy of Compiled Statements of Domestic Corporations showing that, on November 30, 1912, the charter of the Bowman Pharmacy, the corporation above referred to, had been forfeited for nonpayment of a license tax; that this evidence was offered to show that the shares of the corporation were valueless, and was error because 'it bore directly upon the question of the intent of defendant in securing the complaining witness' signature to the promissory note he was afterwards compelled to pay.' It is true that the forfeiture declared by the Secretary of State, under the statute, did not have the effect to destroy the assets of the corporation or deprive the stockholders of their interest in such assets; it went no farther than to prevent the corporation from transacting business in the state. The directors, however, still retained the power, as we understand the statute, to settle the affairs of the corporation. It seems to us that, conceding error, it was without prejudice for the reason that there is no evidence that the corporation owned the drug store theretofore carried on by defendant, or that it owned any property or that the shares had any value.

[12] "Witness Parsons, secretary of the corporation, was called by the prosecution and, over defendant's objection, was permitted to testify that, some time in June or July, 1912, defendant told witness the corporation 'had fallen through.' The objection was that 'it did not lie in the mouth of any person to dissolve a corporation,' which could be accomplished only by methods pointed out by statute. Defendant made no explanation of what he meant by the rather vague expression, 'fallen through.' For the reasons given respecting the certificate of the Secretary of State, we cannot see that the evidence was prejudicial. If the stock had no value, a fact which if true must have been known to defendant, it is not apparent that offering it as security would go very far towards showing that he did not intend to cheat or defraud the person misled by him.

[13] "Error is claimed of the first instruction given by the court for the reason that it states that 'any pretense sufficient to impose upon the person to whom it was made, if made with the intent to cheat or defraud him, if property is obtained thereby from such person, is sufficient.' The point made is that it omits the essential element that the pretense must be false or fraudulent. The first part of the instruction states 'that every person who knowingly and designedly by any false or fraudulent representations or pretenses defrauds any person of property, and thereby obtains possession of the property,' etc. Reading the entire instruction, as we must to get its meaning, we discover no merit in the point.

able from all the facts of the case, and need not be substantially proven.' There is force in the criticism that 'a fact in criminal law which is not substantially proven is not sufficiently proven. The testimony to prove this intention must be material and substantial and not slight.' If the instruction stood alone and unaided as indicative of the meaning of the court, there might be ground for assuming that it misled the jury into the belief that any degree of proof, however slight, would be sufficient. When read in connection with the instruction which follows the otherwise misleading feature is removed: 'The question of intent to cheat and defraud is one of fact for you to determine from all the evidence in the case. This intention need not be proven by direct and positive evidence, but it may be lawfully and properly inferred by you from all the facts and circumstances in evidence having reference to and bearing upon and tending to prove such intent, provided such evidence is sufficient to satisfy you of such intent beyond a reasonable doubt.'

"Full instructions were given upon the question of reasonable doubt, also as to all the elements entering into the alleged crime and the necessity or proof as to them beyond all reasonable doubt.

[15] "The court instructed the jury as follows: 'You are instructed that it is not necessary that the prosecuting witness, N. Giacomini, should expressly testify that the false pretenses induced him to act as he did. If you are fully satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt from the testimony of other witnesses in the case and from all the facts and circumstances in the case that the pretense induced the prosecuting witness to part with his property to defendant, that is sufficient to that extent.' It is objected that this is an instruction on a question of fact. The prosecuting witness testified expressly that the false pretense induced him to act as he did. The instruction simply means that this fact was capable of proof by testimony of other witnesses and from all the facts and circumstances in the case, which, we think, might properly be stated to the jury.

[16] "Error is predicated of the following instruction: 'You are instructed that when the pretense made by the defendant is false, and known to be so by him, it is no defense that the defendant intended or expected to pay for the property obtained when he was able to do so; and it is no defense that defendant J. P. Bowman himself received no money personally from the promissory note that he obtained from N. Giacomini, if you believe beyond a reasonable doubt that J. P. Bowman intended to and did defraud N. Giacomini of same by the use and means of the false pretenses.' Defendant claims that the jury were thus told to disregard all testimony concerning the stock of the drug store and its offer by defendant to the prosecuting witness as security. We do not think that the jury could have understood from this instruction that they were to disregard any testimony. They were told many times in the course of the charge that they were to consider all the facts and circumstances. This instruction was designed to meet the phase of the case which showed that county treasurer Rice received the money for the note and placed it in the county treasury. Whether this amount had been borrowed by defendant from county funds does not clearly appear, but whatever the reason for his turning the note over to Rice the court very properly told the jury that it was no defense that defendant did not personally receive the money.

"We may remark of the instructions that defendant offered 16 carefully prepared and covering the case quite fully and presumably, as favorable to defendant as counsel felt justified in asking. They were all given with the exception of an unimportant amendment to one. The instructions given at request of the people have been examined. We feel quite convinced that defendant's rights were in no degree prejudiced by any instructions given, and that he had the benefit of full, clear, and correct directions for their guidance.

[18] "In the course of his address to the jury the special prosecutor stated: 'I know that J. P. Bowman is guilty of this crime. I know that he has defrauded a brother Mason, done it fraudulently and intentionally. And his brother Mason, N. Giacomini, has lost $1,900 on this account.' And again: 'When a man breaks a law against his brother in the lodge—ah, gentlemen, does not that add something to it, too? Does not that add cruelty to crime?' It is contended that this was misconduct prejudicial to defendant's rights. There were some other statements, not mentioned in defendant's brief, to which objection was made at the time. There was no evidence that defendant and Giacomini were brother Masons or belonged to the same lodge of any society. The remarks of the prosecuting attorney were unwarranted and highly reprehensible. It does not appear that any one of the jurors belonged to a Masonic or any other lodge. In stating that he knew that the defendant was guilty, the prosecuting attorney said: 'I want to say this, gentlemen, that according to this evidence I know that J. P. Bowman is guilty,' etc. We do not think this statement presents the question of misconduct in the form condemned by the Supreme Court in People v. Valliere, 127 Cal. 65, 59 Pac. 295, where the district attorney, in speaking of another theft, of which evidence was excluded, states what the Supreme Court considered 'as in the nature of testimony.' In view of the evidence in the case bearing upon defendant's guilt, and after an examination of the entire record, we cannot say that this misconduct has brought about a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

DILLON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF NEVADA COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1265.)

1. JUSTICES OF THE PEACE (§ 159*)—APPEAL—BOND—FILING.

Code Civ. Proc. § 978a, provides that the undertaking on appeal from a justice must be filed within five days after filing notice of appeal and notice of the filing of the undertaking given to respondent. Judgment having been rendered for plaintiff, defendant brought husband and the sureties to the justice, and he took their justification, but by mistake marked the bond filed as of that date, and made an entry thereof in his docket. The bond, however, he returned to defendant, whose attorney returned it to the justice thereafter with the notice of appeal, but no further filing of the bond was noted, after which a motion to dismiss the appeal was made because no bond had been filed after notice of appeal. Held, that when defendant's attorney returned the bond and notice to the justice with directions to file them, it was his duty to comply, though it required him to refile the bond, and, this being done within the time allowed to take the appeal, the bond served every purpose of the new one, and it was immaterial that the justice did not mark the bond "filed" as of that date.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Justices of the Peace, Cent. Dig. §§ 544, 550–578; Dec. Dig. § 159.*]

2. RECORDS (§ 7*) — "FILE" — WHAT CONSTITUTES.

A paper is deemed to be filed when presented at the proper office and deposited with the other papers in the office, and especially so when so deposited with directions to "file" it.

Petition by Frank Dillon for writ of prohibition directed to the superior court of Nevada county. Denied.

J. M. Walling, of Nevada City, for plaintiff. Fred Searls and Nilon & Arbogast, all of Nevada City, for defendant.

PER CURIAM. Writ of prohibition to restrain the defendant from proceeding to hear and determine a certain cause. There is no substantial dispute as to the facts. It appears that, on September 16, 1913, plaintiff obtained a judgment against one Cooley, in the justice's court of Washington township, Nevada county; that on October 11, 1913, an undertaking on appeal in due form was filed in said justice's court and said justice indorsed the same, "Filed Oct. 11, 1913, A. W. McGagin, Justice of the Peace, Said Township," and, on the same date, made the following entry in his docket in said cause: "October 11. Undertaking on appeal filed with A. Scwartz and N. M. Melrose as sureties." It appeared by the affidavit of the justice that, on October 11, 1913:

> "Cooley, the defendant in said cause, brought to affiant an undertaking on appeal, now on file in said cause, and requested affiant to take the affidavit of the sureties thereon. That affiant thereafter took the affidavits of the sureties on said undertaking and indorsed a filing mark on said undertaking as of the date of October 11, 1913, the date that said undertaking was verified by the said sureties. That he was not requested to file said undertaking by the said M. D. Cooley or by any other person, and that after taking the affidavits of the said sureties he returned the said undertaking to said M. D. Cooley, who, as affiant is informed and believes, returned the same to Fred Searls, one of his attorneys at Nevada City. That the said undertaking was not placed in the files of the said justice court, but was delivered to the said M. D. Cooley to be returned to Nevada City, and said undertaking was not placed among the papers and files in said cause until October 14, 1913."

As it was, on October 11th, returned to Cooley it, of course, could not then have been placed among the papers. Affiant further deposed that, on October 14, 1913, he received from Mr. Searls, by letter, "the said undertaking on appeal, together with notice of appeal and request that said notice of appeal and said undertaking be filed in said action," and that, "upon the receipt of said notice on appeal and undertaking on appeal affiant filed the notice of appeal and placed the undertaking on appeal without any additional filing mark thereon among the papers in the said cause, and thereafter affiant transmitted said papers to the county clerk of the county of Nevada." Mr. Searls' letter was directed to the justice of the peace and contained the following directions:

> "Herewith find notice of appeal and undertaking on appeal in the matter of F. Dillon, plaintiff, v. M. D. Cooley, defendant. File the notice of appeal and undertaking and send down transcript of your docket to George Coughlin, clerk of the superior court, Nevada county."

The justice's docket as transcribed, with all the papers, was sent to the clerk, on October 17, 1913, and contains no entry after entry of the judgment, except the following:

> "October 11: Undertaking on appeal filed with A. Scwartz and N. M. Melrose as sureties. October 14. Notice of appeal received and placed on file."

Attorney Searls' clerk, J. W. O'Neill, deposed:

> "That on or about the 10th day of October, 1913, he forwarded to M. D. Cooley, the defendant in said cause, an undertaking on appeal with instruction to the said M. D. Cooley to have the same executed at once by two good and sufficient sureties; to have said sureties verify the undertaking before A. W. McGagin, justice of the peace in and for Washington township, * * * and then return the said undertaking to Fred Searls, Esq., at Nevada City, Cal., to be by him forwarded for filing to the said justice of the peace."

That it was received on October 12th and on the 13th was sent back to the justice by mail, together with notice of appeal, and, as above stated, was received by the justice on the 14th, at which date the notice of appeal was filed, but there was no further filing of the bond noted either on the bond or in the docket.

On December 19, 1913, plaintiff's attorney filed a motion in the superior court to dismiss the appeal on the ground "that no bond for costs on appeal has been given or filed in said action by appellant as required by the provisions of the statute in such case provided." Thereafter, on January 12, 1914, the motion came on to be heard and, in opposition thereto, appellant filed the foregoing affidavits of the justice of the peace and Mr. O'Neill and the letter of Mr. Searls. The court made the following order:

> "It is therefore ordered that appellant be and he is hereby given permission to supply the omissions, if any exist, of the marking as filed on October 14th, 1913, of an undertaking on appeal and of the making of the entry of filing such undertaking in the docket of the justice of the peace of Washington township by applying to said justice to so mark such undertaking and to make such entry, and if such application is granted by said justice, then said justice shall certify said entry to this court. Permission to withdraw said undertaking on appeal in this matter from the files of this court is granted appellant for presentation of the same to the said justice of the peace, said undertaking to be returned to said files of this court, with the certificate of such entry on the docket, if any is made by said justice, within 15 days from the date of this order. And in the meantime, respondent's motion to dismiss said appeal is hereby ordered continued until the further order of this court."

Pursuant to said order and on notice given by defendant to plaintiff, the matter came before the justice on February 23, 1914, who, as is alleged and not denied, "changed the original filing mark on said undertaking by simply changing the figure 11th to 14th by converting the unit 1, in the date 11th, to a figure 4, but did not in any other manner whatever refile said undertaking or place any other filing marks thereon. Thereafter, and on February 27, 1914, said so-called amended copy of docket and amended filing of said undertaking, was filed in said cause in said superior court," and, on April 6, 1914, said court denied said motion to dismiss said appeal.

The demurrer of respondent to the petition presents the question to be determined.

Section 978a of the Code of Civil Procedure provides as follows:

> "The undertaking on appeal must be filed within five days after the filing of the notice of appeal and notice of the filing of the undertaking must be given to the respondent. The adverse party may except to the sufficiency of the sureties within five days after the filing of the undertaking, and unless they or other sureties justify before the justice or judge within five days thereafter, upon notice to the adverse party, to the amounts stated in their affidavits, the appeal must be regarded as if no such undertaking had been given."

It was held, in Goodman v. Superior Court, 19 Cal. App. 457, 126 Pac. 185:

> "Upon appeal from a justice's court to the superior court, where the undertaking on appeal was prematurely filed before the filing of the notice of appeal, the superior court acquired no jurisdiction of the appeal."

It appears from the exhibits to the petition that Attorney Searls sent the bond to the defendant in the action with instructions to have the same executed by the sureties before the justice of the peace who tried the case, "and then return the said undertaking to Fred Searls * * * to be by him forwarded for filing to the said justice of the peace." The latter deposed that at the time the sureties signed the undertaking "he was not requested by the defendant or any other person to file said undertaking." He, however, marked it filed as of October 11th and handed it back to defendant who, according to his instructions, returned it to Attorney Searls. The latter then prepared his notice of appeal which, together with the undertaking, was sent back to the justice of the peace with instructions to file both the notice of appeal and the undertaking and forward the record to the clerk of the superior court. The justice of the peace received the papers on October 14th, indorsed the notice of appeal filed as of that date, but made no indorsement on the undertaking other than that as above explained and made no entry in his docket as to the filing of the undertaking other than that made October 11th. The matter rested in that shape until later, when the plaintiff in the action moved, in the superior court, to dismiss the appeal. Pending the hearing of the motion, the judge of the superior court made the order above quoted. When the matter was presented to the justice he, upon the hearing, changed the date in his docket of the filing of the undertaking from October 11th to October 14th and sent up a corrected transcript showing that both the notice of appeal and the undertaking were filed on October 14th.

[1] Petitioner's contention is that the bond was in fact prematurely filed October 11th, and the fact cannot now be disputed; that when defendant Cooley took the bond to the justice of the peace he was acting, as he had a right to do, in his own behalf, and if he be treated as acting for his attorney, being himself the principal, he is bound by whatever took place; that he knew the justice marked the bond filed October 11th, and that the attorney also must have known the fact; that with knowledge of this fact and that the transcript of the docket had been sent up to the superior court showing that the bond was filed of that date, he rested for some time, and the appellant ought not now to be permitted to question the verity of the docket transcript as originally sent up. Furthermore, that the justice of the peace had no power to make the corrections asked, and the superior court had no power to order that he be permitted to do so, or to receive and act upon a corrected docket. It is also claimed that the plaintiff in the action had five days from the date of filing in which to object to the sureties, under section 978a, and had he gone to the justice's office on October 16th he would have found the bond there marked filed October 11th and the same entry in the docket, and would have had a right to act upon the assumption that the filing and docket entry were properly made. He was not required to watch the office of the justice after that date. Nor would he have found any necessity for objecting to the sureties, inasmuch as no notice of appeal was filed until the 14th which rendered the appeal ineffectual. He could thus rest upon the belief that the attempt to appeal had failed. It is also urged that the correction now sought to be made effectual deprives plaintiff of the right to object to the sureties, and that the effect of the correction is to make a filing of the bond as of the date of the correction, and hence too late, since the filing of the notice of appeal must precede the undertaking. Section 978a, Code Civ. Proc.

We do not think it necessary to decide whether the justice had the power to correct his docket or the filing upon the papers. Nor do we think it necessary to decide whether the court had the power to refer the matter back to the justice for correction.

There is a feature of the case which, in our opinion, should save the appeal. When Mr. Searls returned the bond and the notice of appeal and directed the justice to file them, it became his duty to do so, though requiring him to refile the bond. We do not think that appellant was precluded from filing a new bond within five days after filing his notice of appeal, where this was done within the time allowed to take the appeal, and we see no reason why the bond already marked filed might not have been refiled and have served the purpose of a new bond. Appellant should not suffer because the justice did not mark the bond filed at that time as of October 14th. Had the bond gone up with the papers in the case without any filing mark, the fact that it was presented to the justice with a request to file it could have been shown in the superior court, and would have been sufficient.

[2] A paper is deemed to be filed when presented at the proper office and deposited with the papers (Tregambo v. Comanche M. & M. Co., 57 Cal. 501; Howell v. Slauson, 83 Cal. 539, 23 Pac. 692); especially so when deposited in the proper office with directions to file the paper. Edwards v. Grand, 121 Cal. 254, 256, 53 Pac. 796. In Hoyt v. Stark, 134 Cal. 178, 66 Pac. 223, 86 Am. St. Rep. 246, the question as to when a paper is to be deemed filed was quite fully considered. The court said:

> "Nor do we mean to be understood * * * when a proper filing or offer of filing has been made by a party, that he shall suffer for the remissness of the clerk in the performance of his duty. But the proper offer means more than a mere presentation to the officer. It means a presentation to him at the proper place, and within the proper time. When this has been done, the party is required to do no more, and he will not be endangered in any of his rights by the failure of the clerk, in turn, to perform his duty."

In the case here the officer received the undertaking and notice of appeal in time, and was requested to file both. He marked the notice of appeal filed, and placed both papers in his files with the other papers, but neglected to mark the undertaking filed. Appellant, we think, had a right to rely upon the presumption that the officer performed his duty, which was to file both papers. We think, also, that appellant's attorney was not required to go in person with the papers, but that it was sufficient to send them by mail, as they were received in due time and dealt with by the officer in his official capacity as duly received. In contemplation of law the documents were filed, and the failure so to mark one of them does not affect the fact nor prove that it was not filed.

That the justice's docket was silent as to the fact would be immaterial and needed no correction. Naturally the docket was silent because the bond was not marked filed on the 14th. It may be true that the bond was first filed prematurely and, had there been no request to file it again within the time given by the statute, the first filing would have stood as the only filing and would have been fatal to the appeal.

In our opinion the superior court had authority, on the showing made on the motion to dismiss the appeal, to treat the undertaking as filed of date October 14th, and that it was unnecessary to refer the matter back to the justice of the peace for correction or for any action on his part. The superior court had all the facts before it and could act upon them.

The writ must therefore be denied.

LASSEN v. BOARD OF DENTAL EXAMINERS et al. (Civ. 1479.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 13, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 12, 1914.)

1. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS (§ 11*) — SUSPENSION FROM PRACTICE — VERIFICATION — AFFIDAVITS—INFORMATION AND BELIEF.

Where charges against a dentist before board of examiners were verified by an affidavit alleging that affiant knew the contents of the complaint and that the facts therein stated were true of her own knowledge, except as to the matters therein stated on information and belief, and as to those matters she believed it to be true, the complaint would be construed as positively verified on complainant's own knowledge; there being no fact therein stated on information and belief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Physicians and Surgeons, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 11.*]

2. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS (§ 2*)—DENTISTS—DENTAL ACT—VALIDITY.

So much of the dental act (Gen. Laws 1910, Act 922) as makes aiding and abetting an unlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully ground for canceling the certificate of a licensed dentist is not invalid as leaving to the dental board or to the individual making the accusation the determination as to what constitutes aiding and abetting.

3. PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS (§ 11*)—DENTISTS—UNLAWFUL PRACTICE—"AIDING AND ABETTING."

Aiding and abetting one to practice dentistry unlawfully, as used in the dental act (Gen. Laws 1910, Act 922), making such act ground for cancellation of the certificate of a licensed dentist, means being present, either actually or constructively, at the time and place of the offense and doing some act which renders aid to the perpetrator, so that, where a licensed dentist supplied an unlicensed person with tools necessary to practice dentistry, employed him for that purpose, and received money from patients therefor, he was guilty of aiding and abetting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. E. Crothers, Judge.

Petition for writ of review by J. P. Lassen against the Board of Dental Examiners. Petition denied, and on appeal judgment affirmed.

J. G. Reisner, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John T. Nourse, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. In this proceeding the petitioner prayed for a writ of review directed against the board of dental examiners, upon its action in suspending the petitioner's license to practice dentistry in this state, for the reason that he had aided and abetted a person to practice dentistry unlawfully. The writ was issued out of the superior court, and after a hearing that court rendered judgment affirming the proceedings of the board of dental examiners. This appeal is from such judgment.

The transcript consists of the writ, the return, and the judgment. In the return to the writ the proceedings of the court upon the hearing of the charges preferred against the petitioner and appellant are set forth, together with a certificate of its secretary as to what proceedings were taken upon said hearing. From this certificate it appears that when the charges were called for hearing petitioner appeared with his counsel; and, upon the swearing of a stenographer to take down the testimony, the board proceeded to take testimony in support of the written charges made by a party familiar with the facts. Thereupon petitioner entered an oral demurrer to the charges contained in the written accusation, which, upon being overruled, and upon a reading of the charges, a plea of not guilty was entered by the appellant. Witnesses were then called on behalf of the prosecution. While an opportunity was given to the petitioner to present testimony in his own behalf, he offered no evidence in denial of, or in opposition to, any of the charges. The certificate further recites that the evidence was then closed, and after a full consideration of the matter the board found the facts stated in the written charges to be true, and determined that petitioner was guilty as charged, and suspended his license to practice dentistry for the period of one year. The evidence taken by the board is not certified in the return.

Two points are relied upon by petitioner for a reversal of the judgment: First, it is claimed that the accusation upon which the judgment of the board is based is not verified by a person "familiar with the facts" alleged in the accusation, as required by the dental act, and that, as no evidence is incorporated in the return, showing that the accuser was so acquainted, the accusation, standing alone, is insufficient to show that the board ever acquired jurisdiction to render judgment, and that such judgment is therefore void; second, it is further claimed that the provisions of the dental act leave the power within the board to determine what is meant by aiding and abetting, and for that reason this provision of the act is null and void.

From the accusation contained in the return it appears that J. P. Lassen, petitioner herein, is charged with unprofessional conduct; and, as the basis of such charge, certain facts are specified, the substance of which is as follows: That on or about the 8th day of February, 1913, petitioner maintained a dental office in the city and county of San Francisco, and on the said day directly and knowingly employed one Harry E. Keck, an unlicensed dentist, for the purpose of performing operations of all kinds, including the treating and correction of lesions and malimposed formations of the human teeth and jaws, and that on or about said day, and pursuant to his employment by petitioner. said Harry E. Keck did perform an operation upon the teeth of one Arthur Barrons for a fee, and that such fee was retained by petitioner.

A second allegation charges petitioner with permitting said Keck to have the use of petitioner's office and certain dental implements and paraphernalia, for the purpose of practicing dentistry, as the same is defined by section 15 of the dental act, and charges that by said acts he aided and abetted a nonlicensed person to practice dentistry unlawfully. This accusation, upon which the board based its judgment, was made and verified by one Carrie E. Doolittle; the verification being in the usual form provided by section 446, Code of Civil Procedure. The contention of appellant that the accusation upon which the judgment of the board is based was not verified by a person familiar with the facts alleged in the accusation cannot be maintained. Section 21½ of Act No. 922, General Laws, p. 300, provides that:

> "All accusations must be in writing, verified by some party familiar with the facts therein charged."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The accusation upon which the board based its judgment was verified as follows:

> "Carrie E. Doolittle, being first duly sworn, says that she is the petitioner in the above and foregoing petition; that she has read and signed the same and knows the contents thereof; that the facts therein stated are true of her own knowledge, except as to the matters therein alleged on information and belief; and, as to those matters, that she believes it to be true."

[1] In support of the contention that the verification is insufficient, it is argued that, under such a verification, all of the facts charged in the accusation might have been made on information and belief, and that this does not satisfy the mandate of the statute. But every allegation of fact contained in the accusation is stated positively as of the accuser's own knowledge. There is no fact alleged upon information and belief. An affidavit that all the facts alleged are true to the knowledge of the affiant, except such as are stated on information and belief, where no facts are so alleged, is equivalent to an affidavit that all the facts alleged are true to the knowledge of the affiant, notwithstanding the usual words, "except as to those matters therein stated on information and belief," etc.

Where no fact is stated on information or belief, a verification is regarded as a positive affirmance of the truth of the allegation. Christopher v. Condogeorge, 128 Cal. 581, 61 Pac. 174; Benepe v. Scheidegger, 32 Mont. 424, 80 Pac. 1024, 1026. If an averment is made positively, the verification is sufficient if the affidavit states that the facts are true of the pleader's own knowledge. As was said in Patterson v. Ely, 19 Cal. pages 28, 40:

> "To require anything further would be to sink the evident spirit and object of the statute into a mere observance of form."

See 31 Cyc. 541–543; Conolly v. Schroeder, 121 App. Div. 634, 106 N. Y. Supp. 304; In re Curtiss, 134 App. Div. 547, 119 N. Y. Supp. 556; Kieley v. Barron, 87 App. Div. 317, 84 N. Y. Supp. 306; Muirhead v. Sands, 111 Mich. 487, 69 N. W. 826. The cases of In re Hotchkiss, 58 Cal. 39, and In re Hudson, 102 Cal. 467, 36 Pac. 812, cited by appellant in support of his contention, are not in point. In both of those cases, which were disbarment proceedings, the accusation and verification were expressly stated to be made on information and belief; while the statute (section 291, Code Civ. Proc.) requires the accusation to be verified by positive affirmation. As above stated, the accusation in this particular case was made in direct and positive language of matters alleged to be within the knowledge of the informant, and none were made upon information and belief. The words in the verification "except as to such matters therein stated on information and belief" were mere surplusage. We conclude, therefore, that the verification, taken in connection with the accusation, is sufficient to satisfy the requirement of the act.

[2] Equally untenable is the appellant's second contention that the dental act is void for the reason, as claimed, that it leaves the decision as to what constitutes aiding and abetting to the board or to the individual making the accusation. We are cited to the case of Hewitt v. Board of Supervisors, 148 Cal. 590, 84 Pac. 39, 3 L. R. A. (N. S.) 896, 113 Am. St. Rep. 315, 7 Ann. Cas. 750, as supporting appellant's claim. The case is not parallel. It was decided under the medical act, which provides that one who advertised the cure of diseases by printing "grossly improbable" statements is liable to a revocation of his license; and it was held that the provisions of the statute that all advertising of medical business in which "grossly improbable" statements are made shall constitute unprofessional conduct, for which the board may revoke the certificate, without defining what statements shall be deemed "grossly improbable," and which leaves it to the whim or caprice of the medical examiners, without any standard for their guidance, is too indefinite and uncertain to be enforced.

[3] No such situation is here presented. In the case at bar the charges are direct and positive to the effect that appellant actually aided and abetted said Keck in the commission of his offense by supplying him with the tools necessary therefor; that he was employed by appellant, and was supplied with dental paraphernalia for the purpose of practicing dentistry, as defined by section 15 of the dental act. Said section clearly declares what is meant by the practice of dentistry; and the appellant is charged in the accusation with aiding and abetting an unlicensed person, known to him to be such, to so practice dentistry unlawfully, and of receiving the reward of such unlawful practice. Certainly the act of employing a person, providing him with an office and dental instruments for the purpose of practicing dentistry, and receiving the reward of his illegal practice is aiding and abetting such person to commit the offense of practicing dentistry without a license.

There is no doubt or uncertainty as to what is meant by the words "aiding and abetting" one to practice unlawfully, as used in the dental act, as claimed by respondent. This is a pure question of fact, which is subject to proof in the ordinary manner that proof is taken of such offenses in criminal courts.

The expression "to aid and abet," as used in criminal law, means being present either actually or constructively at the time and place of the offense and doing some act which renders aid to the perpetrator. The Legislature certainly has the power to vest the determination of this question in the dental board.

We therefore conclude that the return to the writ shows jurisdictional facts sufficient to justify the assumption of jurisdiction by the board, and that it had the power to determine that the act charged constituted aiding and abetting within the meaning of the statute.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. COSTA. (Cr. 315.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 10, 1914.)

1. Rape (§ 49*)—Evidence—Admissibility—Credibility.

Where accused was prosecuted for having committed rape on prosecutrix June 3d, and she made no complaint until July 31st, when she was arrested, when she voluntarily or by reason of threats, intimidation, or promise of immunity told the arresting officers that she had had sexual intercourse with accused, he was entitled to prove by her what induced her to then disclose the charge to them and show whether she did so voluntarily or by reason of threats, etc., as affecting the weight of her testimony.

2. Rape (§ 49*) — Motive of Prosecutrix — Complaint—Reason for Delay.

Where, in a prosecution for rape on a female under 16 years of age, it appeared that she made no complaint for nearly two months, when she told her story to officers arresting her, the court should have permitted the fullest investigation of the circumstances, motive, and reasons for withholding the statement and then making the complaint to officers.

3. Criminal Law (§ 683*)—Evidence Admissible by Reason of the Admission of Other Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for rape on a female under 16 years of age, a physician testified to an examination made of prosecutrix and that he found her suffering from gonorrhœa, accused was entitled to show by the testimony of another physician who had examined him that he was free from the disease, and that it was impossible for prosecutrix to have contracted it from him.

4. Criminal Law (§ 696*)—Trial—Rulings on Testimony—Duty to Rule.

Where, in a prosecution for rape on a female under 16, a witness testified to statements by accused concerning his relations with prosecutrix, but on cross-examination the witness showed that he did not know that prosecutrix was the girl referred to in accused's statements, whereupon motion was made to strike out the witness' testimony, the court should have sustained the motion at once, and it was improper to withhold a ruling until the argument was begun, and then state, "I think the testimony * * * should be stricken out."

5. Criminal Law (§ 696*)—Trial—Acts of Judge.

Where a motion was made to strike out an answer of a witness, it was improper for the court, on sustaining the motion, to direct the reporter to read the answer because one of the jurors had not heard it.

6. Criminal Law (§ 655*)—Trial—Misconduct of Judge.

That the trial judge was hasty, unreasonably arbitrary, and humiliating to accused's counsel was not alone sufficient to justify a reversal of a conviction, but might be properly considered to accentuate the effect of other errors, if any.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Louis Costa was convicted of rape, and he appeals. Reversed.

Ernest M. Torchia, of Los Angeles, and Henry E. Carter, of Wilmington, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape alleged to have been committed June 3, 1913, upon a female under the age of 16 years. He appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Defendant was a night watchman for a machine shop alongside of which was a lumber yard, both located adjoining the beach at San Pedro. According to the prosecutrix, who was 14 years of age, she had been wading along the beach, and at about 6 o'clock p. m. the defendant, whom she had known for some time, approached and spoke to her, when they walked into the lumber yard, and upon reaching a certain point defendant took hold of her and pulled her a few feet around a pile of lumber and committed the act charged. On cross-examination she was questioned as to whether she at the time said anything to her mother about the matter, when she first told her mother of what defendant had done, and whether she told any one about the matter, to all of which questions objections were sustained upon the ground that the evidence sought to be elicited was immaterial and not cross-examination. It appears that on July 31st the girl was arrested by two officers—upon what ground is not shown. After taking her home, the same officers went immediately in search of defendant and placed him under arrest. Referring to her arrest and being taken to court, she was, on cross-examination, asked, among other similar questions, whether the officers said anything to her, whether that was the time she made complaint against defendant, to which objection was sustained. She was then asked the following questions: "When was the first time you made complaint against the defendant?" "Did you have a talk with the officers when they were taking you down to court?" to which objections based upon the ground that they were immaterial and not cross-examination, were sustained. Thereafter defendant called the prosecutrix as his own witness and, after proving by her that on July 31st she first told of the circumstance and then to the officers arresting her, the following proceedings occurred:

"Q. Now, what did those officers say to you when they arrested you? I will ask you if they arrested you?

"Mr. Blair: I object to that as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and no foundation laid what they said. It is hearsay. I put it on that ground.

"The Court: The objection is sustained.

"Mr. Carter: Now, your honor—

"The Court: I have ruled on that, Mr. Carter. Proceed.

"Mr. Carter: I have authority—

"The Court: Mr. Carter, would you mind going on with the case?

"Mr. Carter: I think this is very material.

"The Court: I intend to be polite. You take your seat, Mr. Carter.

"Mr. Carter: I will ask—

"The Court: Mr. Bailiff, you will seat Mr. Carter, if he does not seat himself.

"Mr. Carter: I bow to the court, but I insist on this.

"The Court: All right.

"Mr. Carter: Q. Did the police officers make any threat to you to induce you to tell what had happened between you and Louis?

"Mr. Blair: Just a minute. I object to that as leading, immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and hearsay, and no foundation laid.

"The Court: I sustain it on the last ground.

"Mr. Carter: Q. Were any threats made to you when you made this complaint to the police officers?

"Mr. Blair: Object to that as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and no foundation laid.

"The Court: I sustain it on the last ground.

"Mr. Carter: Q. State what the police officers said to you when they took you under arrest, or put you under arrest at the lumber yard on the 31st day of July of this year?

"Mr. Blair: I object to that as calling for hearsay evidence, and no foundation laid.

"The Court: The objection is sustained.

"Mr. Carter: Q. Was there anything said by the officers to you in reference to any transaction between you and Louis Costa at the time of your arrest?

"Mr. Blair: I object to that as hearsay evidence and as immaterial, irrelevant, and incompetent, and no foundation laid.

"The Court: The same ruling, the objection is sustained."

[1] Notwithstanding the fact that the alleged offense was committed on June 3d, the prosecutrix made no complaint prior to July 31st, on which date she was placed under arrest, when she voluntarily, or by reason of threats, intimidation, or promise of immunity, told the officers arresting her that she had had sexual intercourse with defendant. If the statement was obtained by threats, or she was induced to make the complaint by promise of immunity from prosecution, it was highly important to defendant that the jury be informed of such fact as affecting the weight to be given her testimony upon which, with little or no corroborative circumstances, he was convicted. The mere charge of an offense so heinous in nature is well calculated to arouse the feelings of the jury against the accused and excite its sympathy for the prosecutrix, particularly when the latter is a child of 14 years of age, thus placing the defendant, however innocent, at the mercy of her evidence. Said the Supreme Court in People v. Benson, 6 Cal. 223, 65 Am. Dec. 506, in discussing a like case:

> "There is no class of prosecutions attended with so much danger, or which afford so ample an opportunity for the free play of malice and private vengeance. In such cases the accused is almost defenseless, and courts, in view of the facility with which charges of this character may be invented and maintained, have been strict in laying down the rule which should govern the jury in their finding."

And in People v. Baldwin, 117 Cal. 249, 49 Pac. 187, it is said:

> "It will be sufficient to say, in a general way, that in a case of this character the very widest latitude compatible with our somewhat technical and restricted rules of evidence should be allowed the defendant in his cross-examination of the witnesses of the people. More especially is this true with reference to the prosecuting witness. In this class of prosecutions the defendant, owing to natural instincts and laudable sentiments on the part of the jury, and the usual circumstances of isolation of the parties involved at the commission of the offense, is, as a rule, so disproportionately at the mercy of the prosecutrix's evidence that he should be given the full measure of every legal right in an endeavor to maintain his innocence."

See, also, People v. Christy, 65 Hun, 352, 20 N. Y. Supp. 278; People v. Mitchell, 5 Cal. App. 45, 89 Pac. 853; People v. Howard, 143 Cal. 316, 76 Pac. 1116.

[2] The rulings of the court in excluding the evidence were not only error, but highly prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant. The court should have permitted the fullest investigation as to the circumstances, motive, and reasons for withholding any statement of the offense for a period of two months and then telling the officers who had her in custody under arrest. As said in People v. Howard, supra:

> "If she was testifying to the truth, such investigation would not have injured the cause of the prosecution. If she was testifying to a falsehood, the defendant should have been allowed in every reasonable way to show it."

[3] A physician was called as a witness on the part of the people, who testified that she made a physical examination of the prosecutrix a few days before the trial and found that she had gonorrhœa. The prosecutrix had testified to having had but one act of sexual intercourse in her life, and that was with the defendant on June 3d, from which fact, if true, it naturally followed that the disease was contracted from him. For the purpose of showing the improbability of such conclusion defendant called as a witness a physician who had made a physical examination of him, and by questions sought to elicit evidence to the effect that he was not afflicted with gonorrhœa. Objection was made thereto upon the ground that it was too remote, whereupon defendant's attorney said to the court: "I may state to the court in that relation that this defendant was examined by some of the city physicians in the city jail—" but was interrupted by the court, saying: "That has not anything to do with this witness' testimony." The witness was then permitted to state that he examined the defendant for the purpose of ascertaining whether or not there was any gonorrhœal infection, to which evidence, notwithstanding it had been given, an objection was sustained. With reference to this alleged error, the language of the court in People v. Fong Chung, 5 Cal. App. 587, 91 Pac. 105, is particularly applicable:

> "The district attorney in his zeal desired the case to be presented to the jury upon evidence as to the one act with defendant, and the corroborating fact of the girl having a venereal disease. Such facts alone would give him a beautiful theory as to the defendant's outrage upon an innocent girl of tender years, and his giving her a venereal disease; but the defendant had some rights."

If the testimony to the effect that the girl at the time of the trial had a venereal disease which, according to her testimony, could only have been contracted from the defendant, then certainly testimony of physicians to the effect that defendant was not suffering from such disease, and perhaps had never had it, was competent as tending to contradict the inference which might be drawn from the people's testimony. He should have been allowed in every reasonable way to prove the impossibility of the girl contracting the disease from him.

[4] Witness Corbett was called on behalf of the people and permitted to give evidence as to statements made in his presence by defendant concerning his relations with the girl. On cross-examination, however, the fact was brought out that there were several girls who frequented the vicinity, and the witness did not know what girl was referred to, and it was made apparent that the direct evidence of the witness did not tend in any way to connect defendant's statements with the prosecutrix. Whereupon, after such fact was disclosed on cross-examination, defendant moved that all evidence of the witness as to admissions of defendant be stricken out for the reason that it was not shown that such admissions had any reference to the prosecuting witness, or were in any wise connected with the crime charged. The court refused to rule upon the motion, stating that it would do so before the case was over. No ruling was made until the argument to the jury was begun, when the court remarked: "I think the testimony of Mr. Corbett should be stricken out." Whether such thought was expressed to the jury is not made to appear. The testimony of this witness was of a character which, under the circumstances, rendered it highly prejudicial to defendant and should have been stricken out and withdrawn from the jury immediately upon the close of the cross-examination when the motion was made. The casual soliloquy of the court after the argument to the jury had begun was in no wise calculated to remove from the minds of the jurors the poisonous effect of the incompetent testimony.

[5] At another point in the proceedings a motion was made by defendant's counsel to strike out an answer given by the witness, which motion was granted, the court, however, stating:

> "One of the jurors did not hear that last answer. Will the reporter read it?"

Aside from the fact that, so far as shown by the record, no juror indicated his failure to hear the answer which was stricken out as incompetent, we are at a loss to perceive any reason for having it read to the jury.

[6] Appellant complains that, throughout the trial, the action of the trial judge was hasty, unreasonably arbitrary and humiliating to his counsel. Such fact, if true, standing alone in the absence of prejudicial error, would not justify a reversal of the case, but merely accentuate the effect of other errors disclosed by the record.

The record discloses other errors, some of which are likewise prejudicial, but as the judgment and order appealed from must be reversed for the reasons above stated, it is unnecessary to discuss them, since a recurrence thereof is improbable in a retrial of the case.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. BARTOL. (Cr. 244.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 1, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court July 30, 1914.)

1. Indictment and Information (§ 83*) — Sufficiency—Accessories.

An information charging defendant with rape in that she aided and abetted T. in accomplishing sexual intercourse with M., a female under the age of 16 years, and not his wife, held unobjectionable.

2 Rape (§ 51*)—Sufficiency of Evidence.

A conviction of rape held supported by substantial evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71–77; Dec. Dig. § 51.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 742*)—Credibility of Witnesses—Question for Jury.

It is a question for the jury whether prosecutrix, when, after testifying to a thing, she testified to the contrary, explaining that she made a mistake when she first testified, was telling the truth.

4. Criminal Law (§ 1036*) — Appeal — Failure to Object to Order.

No objection having been made to an order that there should be no further cross-examination of prosecutrix, and it not appearing defendant desired to ask any further questions, there can be no complaint thereof on appeal.

5. Criminal Law (§ 693*)—Objections to Questions.

Defendant's objection to a question to an impeaching witness, on the ground that the orderly course of impeachment had not been followed, should be made before the question is answered, and she not then making it, but requesting that the impeaching witness give the conversation, and making it only after the answer is practically completed, it is too late.

6. Witnesses (§§ 388, 391*)—Impeachment — Inconsistent Statements.

The proper and orderly course for impeachment by evidence of an inconsistent statement is to ask the impeaching witness, as well as the witness to be impeached, whether certain statements were made by the latter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 1233–1242, 1246, 1248; Dec. Dig. §§ 388, 391.*]

Defendant may not complain of an instruction given at her request.

8. Criminal Law (§ 1172*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

It being undisputed that prosecutrix in rape was under the age of 16, defendant was not prejudiced by mistake of the court in assuming the age of consent was 18 instead of 16.

9. Criminal Law (§ 811*) — Instructions — Credibility of Witnesses.

The vice of an instruction that it is proper to consider whether the position and interest of defendant may not affect her credibility and color her statement is in calling particular attention to her testimony; the principle should be given in general terms, and the jury left without suggestion of its application to any particular witness.

10. Criminal Law (§ 1186*)—Appeal—Harmless Error—Instructions.

The statement, in an instruction, of the truism that it is proper to consider whether the position and interest of defendant may not affect her credibility and color her statement is not ground for reversal of her conviction; Const. art. 6, § 4½, requiring an affirmance, unless, after a review of the whole record, the appellate court is of the "opinion"—that is, of the belief or conviction—that error resulted in miscarriage of justice.

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge.

Ruby E. Bartol was convicted, and appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Wood, of Gold Beach, Or., and E. M. Frost and Henry L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. [1] We can see no valid objection to the information in this case, which, in its charging part, is as follows:

> "Ruby E. Bartol is accused by the district attorney of the said county of Del Norte by this information of the crime of rape, committed as follows: That said Ruby E. Bartol did on or about the 8th day of February, A. D. 1913, at and in said county of Del Norte, state of California, and before the filing of this information, then and there willfully and unlawfully and feloniously help, aid, and assist and abet one Orville Taggart in the perpetration and accomplishment of an act of sexual intercourse, then and there committed and accomplished by the said Orville Taggart with and upon one May Bartol, who was then and there a female under the age of 16 years, to wit, of the age of 11 years, and not then and there the wife of the said Orville Taggart."

The offense of the actual principal, one Orville Taggart, is set out substantially in the language of the statute defining the crime (section 261, Pen. Code), and this has frequently been held to be sufficient. To charge that the defendant did "help, aid, and assist and abet" said Taggart in the perpetration and accomplishment of said act brings her clearly within the contemplation of section 31, Penal Code. Of course she could not be the principal, as commonly understood, in the perpetration of the crime, but, as in the case of any other offense, she might "aid and abet in its commission," or, not being present, advise and encourage its commission.

[2] We cannot say that there is no substantial evidence to support the verdict. While the testimony of the little girl seems almost unbelievable, and she contradicts herself in material points, she did testify that her mother, the defendant, threw her upon the bed and held her hands while said Taggart committed the offense charged. She explained the occurrence so that, giving full credit to her testimony against appellant, the inference of guilt necessarily follows. Strange and startling as her testimony may be, we cannot say that it is inherently improbable or that the jury had no right to accept it as true. In addition we may state that she is substantially corroborated by the testimony of her younger brother. It may be added that some time after the event she was examined by a physician, but, for some reason not disclosed, the physician was not called as a witness. It seems unfortunate that evidence obtained from a physical examination was not produced. This might have constituted an important circumstance in corroboration or refutation of the girl's statements.

[3] We cannot hold that there was a variance between the evidence and the allegations of the information, as contended for by appellant. It is true that in one part of her testimony the prosecutrix testified that her mother was not present when Taggart had intercourse with her, but that she was present and held her hands when one Otto Creitzer perpetrated a similar outrage. But thereafter the record shows the following:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"Q. Did some one take hold of you? A. Yes, sir. Q. Who? A. Mamma. Q. What did she do with you? A. She slung me on the bed. Q. What did they do after your mother threw you on the bed, May? A. Josie Horn took hold of me. Q. And did some one else take hold of you? A. Orville Taggart. Q. Did they do anything to you? Court (to witness): Go on and tell if they did anything. A. Otto Creitzer done business with me. Q. And then what happened after that? A. Then Taggart did it."

She afterward explained that she made a mistake when she said that her mother was not present when Taggart was there, as she misunderstood the question. It was, of course, for the jury to determine whether she was telling the truth.

[4] On cross-examination the witness testified that she never told any one about the occurrence except that she said to Alice Overton, her cousin, that "Creitzer done business with me," and that she did not say anything about Orville Taggart, and her examination as a witness was brought to a close as follows:

"Now, May, at the time you told Alice about this, didn't you tell her your mother didn't know anything about it? A. Yes, sir; I did. Court: I don't think I will allow any further questions of this child; if you have any other evidence put it on."

No objection to this order was made by appellant, nor does it appear that she desired to ask any further questions. The cross-examination seems to have been conducted with the utmost courtesy to all and with unfailing consideration for the feelings of the witness, and it certainly was not unduly protracted. Particularly in a case of this kind should ample opportunity be offered, through the efficacious method of cross-examination, to test the veracity of the prosecutrix; and, if appellant had manifested a desire to proceed further, we should be inclined to hold that the said order of the court operated as an improper restriction of her right.

[5, 6] One A. J. Huffman was called as a witness by the people to impeach Mrs. Violet, who had testified for the defendant. The purpose was to show that Mrs. Violet had made a statement to Mr. Huffman inconsistent with the former's testimony. The proper foundation had been laid when Mrs. Violet was on the stand, and the record shows the examination of Mr. Huffman as follows:

"District Attorney: Mr. Huffman, you some time within the last few weeks had a conversation with Mrs. Violet in the presence of Mr. Jenkins? A. Yes, sir. Q. And in that conversation did Mrs. Violet make a statement as to Mrs. Horn having lived at her house? A. Yes, sir. Q. And did you ask her with reference to Mrs. Horn? Attorney for Defendant: Now let him state what the conversation was."

The witness then proceeded to state a part of the conversation, and the attorney for defendant said:

"It seems that this is all out of place. Mrs. Violet was not under oath at that time. Same objection."

The objection was overruled, and the witness continued with the conversation. After Mr. Huffman had apparently completed the recital, the attorney for defendant said:

"To impeach a witness by contradictory statement, the witness when on the witness stand must be informed of the time, place, and circumstances and the conversation that took place between the parties. Therefore this is incompetent for the purpose of impeaching the witness, under the rules provided by the Codes of this state. I move to strike out all of the last part of the evidence of this witness upon the ground that it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial and does not conform with the requirements of the Code for the purpose for which it is offered."

The motion was denied. The objection, of course, should have been made before the question was answered. On the contrary, the appellant had requested the witness to state the conversation, and the only objection of any merit whatever was made after the answer had been practically completed, and it may be said also that the attention of the witness Violet was called to the conversation with Mr. Huffman with sufficient particularity to justify her contradiction. The proper method of impeachment was not pursued, but of this appellant cannot complain, because she requested the whole conversation to be given. When a witness is sought to be discredited in this way, his attention must be called to the statements inconsistent with his present testimony with the circumstances of times, places, and persons present, and he must be asked whether he made such statements. Section 2052, Code Civ. Proc. If he denies having made them, the statements with the aforesaid circumstances should be related to the impeaching witness, and he should be asked if those statements were made. In other words, the proper and orderly course is to ask each witness whether certain statements were made by the witness who is sought to be discredited.

Accordingly, after his attention had been called to the time, place, and persons present, as in the question to Mrs. Violet, Mr. Huffman should have been asked if she stated that "she woke up some nights and found Mrs. Horn gone," as that was the question to which Mrs Violet responded: "I never did tell Mr. Huffman no such thing." But appellant preferred to pursue the other course indicated, so no error was committed of which she can complain.

[7] Upon the question of "alibi," an instruction was given by the court concluding with this direction:

"But it is sufficient if the defendant prove the alibi by a preponderance of the evidence, and is not required to prove the same to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt."

Of this appellant says:

"We submit that the giving of the foregoing instruction was gross error, and thereby deprived the defendant of her substantial rights to have the jury correctly instructed as to the law."

But, when we turn to the record, we find the instruction was given at the request of defendant, and of course she cannot find fault with the court in complying with her request.

Another instruction which is seriously challenged by appellant, we may state, is in the same category, since it was given at her request.

[8] It is clear that defendant was not prejudiced by the mistake of the court in assuming that the age of consent was 18 instead of 16 at the time of the alleged commission of the offense. Since the prosecutrix was not over 12 years of age, she was within the rule as it was before as well as after the amendment, and the erroneous construction could not possibly have done any harm. It seems that the offense was committed February 8th, and the amendment in question did not take effect until August, but, in view of the undisputed age of the prosecutrix, the circumstance is of no material consequence here.

[9] The only serious controversy that can arise is suggested by the following instruction:

> "The jury are instructed that they are the exclusive judges of the evidence and of the credibility of the witnesses and of the weight to be given to their testimony; and they may consider the character and appearance of the witnesses, the consistency and reasonableness of their statement, the interest, if any, they may have in the outcome of the case, and from these may judge and determine as to the credibility, weight, effect, and sufficiency of such testimony. The testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust, and, in weighing the evidence of the defendant, it is proper for the jury to consider whether the position and interest of such defendant may not affect her credibility and color her testimony, but you are to weigh it fairly in the light of all the surrounding circumstances and give it such credit as you think it ought to receive."

We have set out the whole of the instruction, but the portion to which appellant particularly objects, as may readily be surmised, is that referring the jury to "the position and interest of such defendant."

As sensible men, the jurors would take that circumstance into consideration in weighing the testimony of defendant, and they needed no such admonition from the court. And it is perfectly apparent that they had a legal and moral right to consider "the position and interest of the defendant" in determining her credibility. That is one of the tests that must be applied to all witnesses. And, of course, without any intimation from the court, the jury understood the "position" of defendant and knew her "interest" in the outcome of the case. The vice of the instruction is, though, manifestly, in calling particular attention to the testimony of the defendant. The danger of such practice lies in the possibility that the jury may infer that the judge of the court intends to discredit the testimony of the defendant. The principle covered by the instruction should be given in general terms, and the jury should be left entirely without suggestion of its application to any particular witness.

A somewhat similar instruction was given in People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 262, 86 Pac. 191, as follows:

> "Where the defendant offers himself as a witness, in determining his credibility, it is proper to take into consideration the consequences, inducements, and temptations which would ordinarily influence a person in his situation."

After some discussion of the instruction, the court, through Mr. Justice Henshaw, concludes:

> "For this reason, therefore, we think the time has come to say that in all future cases which shall arise, and where, after this warning, this instruction shall be given, this court will hold the giving of it to be so prejudicial to the rights of a defendant, secured to him by our Constitution and laws, as to call for the reversal of any judgment which may be rendered against him."

In People v. Borrego, 7 Cal. App. 613, 95 Pac. 381, also, it was held that:

> "It was prejudicial error to instruct the jury that they should consider the situation of the defendant and the manner in which he would be affected by the verdict, in determining the weight of his testimony, as being in effect an argument against the defendant upon a matter of fact."

It is true that in People v. Ryan, 152 Cal. 364, 92 Pac. 853, a similar instruction was given, and it was held by the Supreme Court insufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment; the case having been tried before the said opinion in the Maughs Case was handed down. The distinction seems to have been based upon the consideration that, since the trial judge gave the instruction before it was positively condemned by the Supreme Court, his action was no evidence of a desire on his part to be unfair. We respectfully submit, however, that the important question is not whether the trial judge desires to be unfair, but whether, as a matter of fact, he has been unfair, and whether, by reason of his conduct, the defendant has been prejudiced.

It is to be observed that the instruction here is much less objectionable than the one considered in the Maughs Case. There the court referred to the "inducements, consequences, and temptations" of the defendant. Here it is more nearly a mere commonplace, the "position and interest" of the defendant.

[10] Moreover, the situation must be viewed in a different light from that which obtained when the Maughs decision was rendered. Under the recent amendment (No. 4½) to article 6 of the Constitution, it is not sufficient to warrant a reversal to show that error was committed, but, after a review of the whole record, the error must be disregarded and the judgment affirmed, unless the appellate court is of the opinion that the error resulted in a miscarriage of justice. People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal.63, 130 Pac. 1042. "Opinion" is probably used in said amendment in the sense of belief or conviction.

Assuming, then, that error was committed in the giving of said instruction, after considering the entire record we do not see how it can be held that an appellate court could or should be convinced that a miscarriage of justice resulted. There is ample evidence to support the verdict. The jury must have believed it to be true. We must accept the verdict, therefore, as just. The conclusion is that there was no miscarriage of justice. Nor have we any reason to believe that the jury would have had a different belief as to that evidence if said instruction had not been given, or that they would have reached a different result.

It is entirely clear that we cannot say, with any degree of certitude or assurance or even confidence, that said conduct of the court resulted in any injustice. There may be a suspicion to that effect. This will always exist when error is committed, but the provision of the Constitution requires more than that before a reversal is warranted.

The jury must have been satisfied that the atrocious offense, charged in the information, reaching an almost unparalleled limit of infamy, was committed by the defendant, and, far from holding an opinion that the statement by the court of a truism resulted in a miscarriage of justice, we must believe that the result was not thereby prejudicially affected, and that the conclusion of the jury was entirely just.

We think a sufficient showing has not been made to justify an interference with the verdict, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. HOOSIER. (Cr. 245.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 10, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 8, 1914.)

1. RAPE (§ 52*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a prosecution for rape on a female 11 years of age, evidence held to sustain a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 71–74, 76; Dec. Dig. § 52.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 741*)—EVIDENCE—TRIAL—QUESTIONS FOR COURT OR JURY.

Where, in a prosecution for rape on a female 11 years of age, prosecutrix and defendant's accomplice testified for the state, the fact that their testimony did not agree in minor particulars did not justify the court in directing an acquittal or setting aside a conviction; the weight of the testimony being exclusively for the jury.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 511*)—EVIDENCE—ACCOMPLICE'S TESTIMONY—CORROBORATION.

That a conviction cannot be sustained on the testimony of an accomplice, as provided by Pen. Code, § 1111, does not mean that the testimony of an accomplice may not be believed, since, if there is other evidence which tends to connect defendant with the commission of the crime charged, the accomplice's testimony is to be considered as any other evidence, and given such weight as the jury conclude it is entitled to.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1159*)—TRIAL—ALIBI—CREDIBILITY OF WITNESSES.

Where accused offered evidence to establish an alibi, which was necessarily in conflict with the testimony of the state's witnesses tending to connect him with the offense charged, it was the jury's province to determine which they would believe, and their finding that the alibi was not established was not reviewable on appeal.

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 494*) — OPINION EVIDENCE—EFFECT.

In a prosecution for rape on a child of 11, evidence of a physician, who examined her some 8 or 9 months after the assault, held not to conclusively show that she had never been subjected to the treatment complained of, but instead was consistent with a finding that the rape was committed as charged.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 531*)—EVIDENCE—CONFESSIONS—PRELIMINARY PROOF.

A sheriff testified that defendant sent for him and stated that he wanted to make a statement or confession. The sheriff told him he would see if the prosecuting attorney would "stand for it," and on returning told defendant "that there is nothing doing," whereupon defendant stated that he wanted to make a confession and relieve his mind, when the sheriff told him to go ahead and do it, but that any statement he might make would be used against him. Held, that such proof was sufficient to establish prima facie that the confession was voluntary, so as to justify its admission, in the absence of any proof to the contrary.

7. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 176*)—ISSUES AND PROOF—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—TIME.

Where the circumstances of the crime charged were such as to definitely mark and identify it so as to make a conviction available as a plea of former conviction in case accused was again tried on the same charge, it was not material that the state failed to show that the offense was committed at the precise time fixed in the information.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. § 548; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

8. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 176*)—ISSUES AND PROOF—ELEMENTS OF OFFENSE—TIME.

That an information was filed within the statutory period of time, the lapse of which, before the filing of the same, would have barred a prosecution, is sufficient in criminal cases, in which time is not of the essence to support a verdict, though time of the offense has been definitely fixed in the information and not definitely proved.

9. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 757*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—PROVINCE OF JURY.

In a prosecution for rape, the court properly omitted to charge the jury to carefully scrutinize the testimony of prosecutrix and defendant's accomplice, testifying for the state, and to warn the jury of the danger of a conviction on such testimony, since such an instruction would have been objectionable as invading the jury's province to determine the weight of the evidence for themselves.

10. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 824*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS—REQUESTED CHARGE—NECESSITY OF REQUEST.

Accused could not successfully object to the court's omission to charge with reference to the testimony of prosecutrix and defendant's accomplice, who testified for the state, where no request for such an instruction was made.

11. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 782*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ALIBI—BURDEN OF PROOF.

Instructions assuming that an alibi is a special defense, and charging that the burden was on defendant to establish the same by a preponderance of the evidence and not beyond a reasonable doubt, were erroneous.

12. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1137*)—APPEAL—RIGHT TO ALLEGE ERROR — INSTRUCTIONS REQUESTED.

Accused may not successfully complain on appeal of erroneous instructions which he himself requested.

13. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1172*) — APPEAL — INSTRUCTIONS.

Where there was strong and convincing proof of defendant's guilt, an instruction that, in weighing defendant's evidence, it was proper to consider whether his position and interest had not affected his credibility and colored his testimony, etc., though objectionable, was not so prejudicial as to establish a miscarriage of justice and authorize a reversal of a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3128, 3154–3157, 3159–3163, 3169; Dec. Dig. § 1172.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Del Norte County; John L. Childs, Judge.

Fred Hoosier was convicted of assault on a female about 11 years of age, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. A. Wood, of Gold Beach, Or., and E. M. Frost and Henry L. Ford, both of Eureka, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. The defendant was convicted of the crime of statutory rape upon one May Bartol, a female of the age of about 11 years, and brings the case to this court on an appeal from the judgment and the order denying him a new trial.

This case contains the final chapters of the story of a veritable saturnalia of lechery which was carried on, during the month of February, 1913, at Crescent City, Del Norte county. The initial chapter of the series of malodorous transactions is given in the case of People v. Bartol, 142 Pac. 510 (Crim. No. 244), the opinion in which was filed in this court on June 1, 1914. From the beginning to the end, the story is replete with details which are revolting in the extreme and shockingly illustrate the degree of perverseness to which human nature can descend. Indeed, so monstrously diabolical are the circumstances of the series of transactions leading to this and the Bartol Cases that justly it may be declared that truly they have discovered and so added to the criminal annals of California proof of the very Ultima Thule of human depravity. It is, indeed, a heavy tax on human credulity to believe that anywhere within the zone of civilized society a mother could so far descend into the depths of depravity as to suffer herself to assist in forcing her daughter, even where the latter is of the age of consent and of judgment matured to some extent, to submit to acts of sexual intercourse with the opposite sex, and infinitely more difficult is it to conceive, and even much more to believe, that a mother would coerce her 11 year old child, a mere infant, to submit to such monstrous acts of immorality. Yet such is the story told in the Bartol Case, and which story was found by the jury who heard it to be true.

The child upon whom the outrage was committed in the Bartol Case, is the same child upon whom the defendant in this case was charged with and convicted of perpetrating a similar outrage.

It was on or about the 8th day of February, 1913, at a cottage situated in the suburbs of Crescent City, that Ruby E. Bartol, the defendant in the other case referred to, forced her daughter, May Bartol, then 11 years of age, to submit to an act of sexual intercourse with one Orville Taggart. According to the record before us, a few nights after said act by Taggart, May Bartol was similarly outraged, at her mother's home, by said Taggart, one Otto Creitzer, and the defendant.

The story, as told by the little girl and as corroborated by Otto Creitzer and by the confession of the defendant himself, is briefly as follows: That, on or about the 12th day of February, 1913, the defendant, Taggart, and Creitzer visited the Bartol home shortly after nightfall. There was also present at the house at the time a divorced woman by the name of Josie Horn. A short while after the defendant arrived at the house, Mrs. Bartol, mother of May, left her home, accompanied by a brother of Otto Creitzer, for the purpose of visiting a neighbor, to whom she had previously sold a cow, and collecting some money due her on that transaction. Besides the parties above named, there remained at the house the prosecutrix and three other children of the Bartol woman, each younger than May. Mrs. Bartol and her husband, it seems, had previously separated and were then not living together.

After Mrs. Bartol's departure, as above explained, the defendant, Creitzer, and Taggart each (one immediately after the other) had intercourse with the said Josie Horn. These acts took place in the house and were carried on with such reckless indifference that the little girl either actually witnessed them, or, from the circumstances, could not but know that they were taking place. In fact, Creitzer testified that the child threatened to make a disclosure of the whole nasty transaction, and, in the hope that its consummation would prevent the child from carrying out the threat, the horrible idea was conceived and suggested by Josie Horn that the young men have sexual relations with May. This proposition, bestial as it was, was readily assented to by the three men, and thereupon Josie Horn, assisted by the defendant, forcibly threw the little girl upon a bed and raised up her clothes. Creitzer was the first to have connection with the child. He was immediately followed by Taggart, and the latter by the defendant. While these acts were being perpetrated, Mrs. Horn held the child down, and, after it was all over, addressed the victim of the infamy as follows:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "Now, I guess you haven't got anything on me. You wouldn't like to tell your father or Mr. Cousins that this was done to you. If you tell him that, I will tell on you."

Not many days after the outrageous occurrences above related, May Bartol went to the home of her grandfather, in Oregon, and only a short time thereafter, whether, in mere childish innocence, having no appreciation of the infamy fastened upon her character before she had hardly reached the threshold of her life, or whether from a keen consciousness of the enormity of the wrong committed upon her, divulged to a girl companion, of approximately her own age, some of the details of the shocking licentiousness occurring at her mother's home during the month of the preceding February, and to which she was an unwilling party. Thus the particulars of the terrible crimes of the defendant, his male companions, and the Bartol and Horn women finally reached the ears of the authorities of Del Norte county, who immediately instituted a searching investigation, with the result that the culprits were brought before the bar of justice. As already shown, Mrs. Bartol, the mother of the child victim of the outrages, was tried and convicted, Creitzer pleaded guilty, and the defendant, upon a trial before a jury, adjudged guilty, as before stated.

[1] The first point to which attention is directed and which constitutes one of the grounds upon which a reversal is asked is that the evidence does not support the verdict. The above statement of the facts which were brought out at the trial is sufficient to demonstrate that there is no merit to this proposition. The jury were, as is universally understood, the exclusive judges of the credibility of all the witnesses, and if, as this verdict implies that they did, they believed the testimony given by the witnesses called by the people to support the charge in the information, then this court can justly say that the evidence is conclusive of the defendant's guilt. The testimony of the prosecutrix is not unreasonable upon its face. It does not, so far as we are able to pass judgment upon it, involve the narration of an improbable story, unless it may be announced to be true, as an abstract proposition, that no civilized human can be found so foul and depraved as to commit acts of such heinousness as those which constitute the subject-matter of her testimony, and this we cannot say. She apparently told her story in a straightforward manner, hesitating at times, it is true, but only because, we have the right to assume from her immature years and innate female modesty, of the extremely embarrassing situation by which she was surrounded—compelled, as she was, to relate, in the presence of the court, the jury, lawyers, and spectators, the shameful circumstances of as flagitious an affair as ever received an airing in a court of justice. She was not shown to have any reason or motive for wrongfully charging the defendant with so egregious a crime, and while there are some apparent inconsistencies in her testimony, and it was also made to appear that the several statements she made concerning the affair were not harmonious in all particulars, still, as a whole, her story appears to be reasonable and is clearly one which it was within the legal right of the jury to believe, if convinced that it was truthful. In other words, her testimony was of such character as that it became peculiarly a function of the jury to decide whether, notwithstanding the inconsistencies and contradictions pointed out therein, her story was, in the main, entitled to such credit and weight as to persuade the conviction that the defendant was guilty.

[2] But much is made of the fact that, in certain respects, the testimony of the defendant's accomplice, Creitzer, and that of the child do not agree. In some minor particulars, the testimony of the said witnesses varied, but obviously this was a matter entirely for the jury's consideration and decision. Where two witnesses introduced by the same side disagree even upon important points of a controversy, the effect thereof is to produce a conflict in the evidence, and in such case the conclusion of the jury upon such conflict is as conclusive upon the courts of review as if the conflict had been produced by the testimony of two witnesses, introduced the one by one side and the other by the opposing side of the controversy. If, therefore, Creitzer, who was a witness for the people, contradicted the prosecutrix even upon important and vital matters of fact, it was for the jury to determine which of the two was to be believed as to those matters, and their decision thereon is the end of the proposition. But it is to be remarked that as a matter of fact, on all important points, Creitzer corroborated the prosecutrix; the points of divergence in their testimony merely involving, as stated, matters of no special significance, such, for instance, as the position of the child on the bed when she was outraged, whether sidewise or lengthwise of the bed.

[3] Nor were the jury compelled to entirely repudiate the testimony of Creitzer merely because he was an accomplice in the crime committed by the defendant, as is the contention. The law, as a matter of policy, based upon the probability that the guilty, to relieve themselves to some extent from the consequences of their crimes, may be tempted to bear false witness against the innocent, has wisely provided that no conviction can be sustained on the testimony of an accomplice, "unless he is corroborated by other evidence which in itself, and without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice, tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense," and that "the corroboration is not sufficient, if it merely shows the commission of the offense, or the circumstances thereof." Pen. Code, § 1111. But this does not mean that an accomplice may not be believed. If there is other evidence which measures up to the requirement of said section tending to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged, then the testimony of the accomplice is to be considered by the jury as is any other testimony and given such weight as they may conclude that it is entitled to.

[4] The defendant attempted to establish an alibi by the presentation of evidence tending to show that, on the evening of the day upon which the offense is charged by the information to have been committed, and on several evenings thereabouts, he, as well as Josie Horn and Orville Taggart, were at places other than the Bartol house. It is argued here that the testimony thus produced made it impossible for the testimony given by the prosecutrix and Otto Creitzer to be true, and it appears to be the position of counsel for the defendant that it is within the province of this court so to hold. Of course, this position follows from the palpably erroneous assumption that it is within the power and the duty of this court to pass upon the credibility of witnesses and to determine the weight to be accorded their testimony. It may be conceded that there is an irreconcilable conflict between the testimony produced by the people and that produced by the defendant, and that the one or the other is necessarily false. This necessarily follows, of course, from the fact, common to all criminal cases, where the charge is denied and the questions of fact are contested, that the two sides proceed upon entirely different and diametrically opposite theories. With singular propriety, therefore, has the Constitution not only committed to the jury the exclusive province of deciding the questions of fact in all cases, but has declared that their decision of those questions shall be final or, as questions of fact, not subject to review by the courts of appeal. A better illustration of the wisdom of this rule than in the present case could hardly be found. The testimony was in sharp conflict, and, as before suggested, one or the other of the two sets of opposing witnesses were either mistaken or told untruths. Who could be in a better situation to determine this all-important question than the jury or the court in whose presence the testimony was given? They heard and saw all the witnesses as they testified, and observed and noted the manner in which they answered the direct and cross questions, and thus were enabled to consider, compare, and weigh, with at least approximate accuracy, all the evidence and so reach a just conclusion upon the facts. Evidently the jury regarded the testimony addressed to the alibi theory as not worthy of their belief, and there is nothing in the record which tends to show that their repudiation of that theory was the result of an arbitrary consideration thereof or of the testimony offered in its support. Hence their decision of that issue is binding upon us.

[5] It is vigorously contended, however, that the testimony of Dr. Fine, a physician, conclusively shows that the child had never been subjected to such treatment as she declared that she received at the hands of the defendant and his male companions. Some eight or nine months after the outrages were perpetrated, Dr. Fine, at the request of the sheriff and under an order of the court, made an examination of the sexual organs of the prosecutrix. He testified, on direct examination, that he discovered the existence of no unusual conditions in the private parts; that they appeared to be normal in all respects for a female of her age; that there were no indications of approaching puberty, and he found only a rudimentary hymen, a condition not unusual to girls of the age of the prosecutrix. But, on cross-examination, he declared that it was possible "for the privates of a man to have penetrated her private parts to the extent of an inch and a half or two inches eight or nine months ago and left no marks of identification at this time." (The little girl testified that the defendant penetrated her private parts with his privates to the extent of an inch and a half or two inches.) Apparently the testimony of Dr. Fine, considered in its entirety, is not necessarily inconsistent with the child's story. The jury could consistently have believed the testimony of both. In other words, if, as the doctor said, it was possible that an act of that kind could be done and leave no physical traces thereof discernible nine months thereafter, the jury, without disbelieving other parts of the doctor's testimony, could have consistently believed, as obviously they did believe, the prosecutrix and Creitzer when they declared that the act was actually done.

[6] The ruling whereby the confession of the defendant was admitted in evidence is assigned as erroneous and prejudicial. The objection interposed by the defendant to the allowance of the confession in evidence was on the general ground that the proper foundation for its admission had not been preliminarily laid. We assume that what counsel meant by this objection was that the alleged confession was not shown to have been the voluntary confession of the accused. We think the court was justified in overruling the objection and so admitting the confession. The defendant was a prisoner in the county jail, and therefore in the custody of the sheriff, awaiting trial upon the charge set forth in the information, when the statement objected to was made. The sheriff testified that:

> "Some time after his arrest, Fred Hoosier sent for me. I had my deputy * * * bring him over to my office. He said that he wanted to make a statement or confession. * * * No one was present but I and Mr. Hoosier, in the first part of the time. 'Well,' I said, 'Wait here,' and I locked the door 'and I will go and see if the prosecuting attorney will stand for it.' I saw Mr. Hersch"—the district attorney.

The sheriff saw and talked with the district attorney regarding the proposition and then returned to his office and said to the defendant "that there is nothing doing." The sheriff then called into his office one Breen, tax collector of Del Norte county, introduced him to Hoosier, saying:

> "This young fellow, Mr. Hoosier, wants to make a confession, and I informed Mr. Hoosier of his rights. I told Mr. Hoosier that any statement that he might make before me and Mr. Breen would be used against him. Well, he said he wanted to make a confession and relieve his mind. I told him all right, go ahead and do it, and he did."

Breen's testimony as to what occurred after he was brought into the presence of the defendant is substantially the same as the testimony of the sheriff.

The foregoing involves a statement of all that was shown, prior to the ruling admitting the confession in evidence, of the circumstances under which the statement to the sheriff and Breen was made by the accused.

We can perceive no sound reason for holding that the confession was not a voluntary one and freely given by the defendant. Before the court ruled on the admissibility of the confession, the uncontradicted testimony was that Hoosier of his own volition sent for the sheriff and stated that he desired to tell all he knew about the crime with which he was charged and his connection therewith. Before listening to Hoosier, the sheriff desired first to interview the district attorney and, having interviewed that official, was evidently told by him (we judge from what the sheriff said to Hoosier on his return, "that there is nothing doing") that he (the sheriff) would not be authorized to hold out to the accused, in consideration of a confession, any hope of leniency, as far as punishment was concerned. The defendant undoubtedly so understood the remark of the sheriff, for, after the latter had said to him, "there is nothing doing," and informed him that any statement that he might then make concerning his connection with the affair leading to the charge against him would be used against him at the trial of his case, the defendant said that "he wanted to make a confession and relieve his mind." If a statement under such circumstances is not a free and voluntary one, then it would be difficult to form a conception of such a statement. It is true that the sheriff and Breen do not expressly say that the prisoner was not threatened or promised some immunity and thus induced to tell his story, but it of necessity follows from the circumstances under which the confession was given, as detailed by the sheriff and Breen, that neither the sheriff nor Breen, for the purpose of forcing an admission of guilt from the defendant, made any threats or resorted to other acts of intimidation, or held out any hope of immunity or clemency to the prisoner. In other words, if the confession came about and was made as the sheriff and Breen describe, then there can be no reason for saying or supposing that it was either given under duress or influenced by hope of immunity held out by those to whom he confessed.

The defendant, it is true, testified, in support of his denial of having carnal connection with May Bartol, that, prior to making the statement above considered, the sheriff said to him that, if he contested the case, he would, if convicted of the crime, receive a life sentence, but that, if he would enter a plea of guilty, he would receive a less severe punishment; but this testimony was given after the confession was admitted into the record, and it cannot, therefore, be considered as an element entering into the determination of the question whether the court, by receiving the confession as evidence, did or did not commit error. If the defendant, upon the preliminary issue involving the question of the admissibility of his confession, had thus given his version of the circumstances under which his statement was made to the sheriff, the court, as would have been its duty to do, would doubtless have considered it in reaching a conclusion upon that issue; and, even in that case, the conclusion of the trial court upon the question would have concluded its review here under the rule applicable to conflicting evidence upon disputed questions of fact.

[7] The contention that the failure of the district attorney to show that the crime charged was committed at the precise time fixed in the information is fatal to the integrity of the verdict possesses no merit. The argument is that, from the fact that the testimony does not, as is the claim, definitely fix the precise time as alleged, the defendant could not protect himself against a second prosecution and judgment for the same identical offense as the one charged here. But the circumstances of the crime are such as to clearly and definitely mark and identify it and so make his conviction thereof available as a plea of former conviction and once in jeopardy in case, after such conviction, an attempt should be made to proceed against him on precisely the same charge.

[8] The information was filed within the statutory period of time, the lapse of which, before the filing of the same, would have barred a prosecution of the charge, and this has always been held sufficient in criminal cases, in which time is not of the essence of the charge, to support a verdict, even where the time has been definitely fixed in the information and the evidence not clear and definite as to the exact date of the crime. We can see no reason why the rule should be applied with any more rigor or exactitude to cases of rape than to other criminal cases.

The remaining assignments involve attacks upon the action of the court in the matter of its charge to the jury.

[9] It is said that the court seriously erred by failing to instruct the jury carefully to scrutinize and scan the testimony of the prosecutrix and Otto Creitzer and to warn them of the danger of a conviction on such testimony. In the first place, such an instruction would involve an invasion of the constitutional province of the jury to determine for themselves the weight and effect of evidence. Such an instruction has often been given in rape cases, and just as often has the constitutional inhibition against instructions by trial courts upon questions of fact been ignored. If the trial judge entertains a doubt of the truthfulness of the testimony of the prosecutrix in a rape case, serious enough to give such an instruction, and there is no other testimony supporting the charge, then he ought to take the case from the jury, lest, in such cases in particular, public sentiment in the community or the natural prejudices of men against crimes of that nature may influence a verdict against the accused upon testimony of exceedingly doubtful verity.

[10] In the second place, the court was not requested to give any such instruction, and it is not conceived, even if the instruction were legally a proper one, that it rested upon the court to give the instruction upon its own motion or in the absence of a request for it.

> "The defendant has offered evidence for the purpose to prove that, at the time the alleged crime was committed, he was not present, but, on the contrary, was at some other place at the time the alleged crime was committed. In other words, tending to prove an alibi, and in that behalf you are instructed that, when the defense offers evidence for the purpose of proving an alibi, the law does not require that degree of evidence to support that fact as is required to prove the guilt of the defendant; but it is sufficient if the defendant prove the alibi by the preponderance of evidence, and is not required to prove the same to a moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. I therefore charge you that, if you believe from the evidence that at the time the said alleged crime was committed, the defendant was not present, then you are instructed that it is your duty to find the defendant not guilty. When a defendant, charged with a crime, produces evidence in support of an alibi, the law does not require that degree of proof as excludes the possibility of error, but only that degree of proof which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind. And, if the evidence presented by the defendant in this case is sufficient and does produce such a conviction in your mind, he is entitled to the benefit of such proof, and, if it is sufficient within itself to prove an alibi, it is your duty to find the defendant not guilty."

Obviously the foregoing instructions are erroneous. They assume that an alibi, like insanity, is a special defense, the proof of which, by a preponderance of the evidence upon that issue, was a burden resting upon the defendant, whereas an alibi merely means or involves the negative of an element in the proof of the offense charged which it is essential for the people to establish beyond a reasonable doubt, to wit, that the accused was present at the scene of the crime at the time of its commission, and that therefore the opportunity for its commission by him was present. In other words, an alibi means that the defendant was elsewhere than at the place where the crime charged was committed at the time of its commission, and that therefore he could not have committed it. And the rule is that, if the testimony addressed to the alibi is sufficient to raise a reasonable doubt of the defendant's presence at the scene of the crime at the time it was committed, then a reasonable doubt of his guilt arises, and he is entitled to an acquittal.

[12] But the defendant is in no position to complain of the action of the court for the giving of said instructions, for the record shows that they were given and read to the jury by the court at his request. The same instructions, in exactly the same language, were given to the jury in the Bartol Case on the motion of the defendant herself, and it is there said that "she cannot find fault with the court in complying with her request."

[13] The following instruction is complained of:

> "The testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust, and, in weighing the evidence of the defendant, it is proper for the jury to consider whether the position and interest of such defendant may not affect his credibility and color his testimony; but you are to weigh it fairly, in the light of all the surrounding circumstances, and give it such credit as you think it ought to receive."

The part of the foregoing instruction to which the defendant objects reads:

> "And, in weighing the evidence of the defendant, it is proper for the jury to consider whether the position and interest of such defendant may not affect his credibility and color his testimony," etc.

A similar instruction, given in the case of the People v. Bartol, supra, was condemned by the defendant as having prejudiced her rights in said case, and, as is said there, so it is equally, of course, true here, that, while a similar instruction had been disapproved by the Supreme Court (People v. Maughs, 149 Cal. 262, 86 Pac. 187), it cannot be said, in view of the strong and convincing proof of the defendant's guilt, the giving of it resulted in a miscarriage of justice. Const. art. 6, § 4½; People v. O'Bryan, 165 Cal. 55, 130 Pac. 1042.

We have now examined all the important points raised on this appeal, and, as is manifest, have discovered no just reason for disturbing the verdict.

The judgment and the order appealed from are accordingly affirmed.

BURNETT, J. The action was to recover the value of certain materials furnished by plaintiff to the contractor to be used in the construction of a school building for the defendant district. There is no controversy as to the facts, and the decisive question is whether under the findings plaintiff is entitled to judgment. The contract for the building was executed on June 6, 1911, and it is set out in the answer herein. It provided that the contractor, Pearson—

> "shall and will for the consideration hereinafter mentioned, on or before the fifteenth day of November, 1911, well and sufficiently construct, erect and finish the stone and brick two story school building * * * conformable with and according to the plans, specifications and drawings signed by the said A. E. Pearson and filed * * * and approved by the board of trustees of said School District; * * * that he [Pearson] will, at his own expense and cost find and provide all such good, proper and sufficient materials of all kinds whatsoever, as shall be necessary and sufficient for completing and finishing the said school building according to said plans, specifications and drawings and will provide and furnish all necessary labor thereon * * * for the sum of twenty thousand three hundred and fifty dollars, said sum to be paid to the said party of the second part in monthly installments as follows, to wit: Seventy-five per cent. of the value of the material and the work upon said building to be paid to the said party of the second part on the first day of each month during the term of this contract, said value to be based upon the superintendent of construction's estimate. And the remainder of the said twenty thousand three hundred and fifty dollars after the full completion of said school building and upon its acceptance by the said board of trustees of the Alturas School District."

The contract further provided:

> "Should the said contractor at any time during the progress of said work, refuse or neglect to supply a sufficiency of materials or workmen, the said first party shall have the right to provide materials and workmen to finish the said works, and the expense thereby incurred by said first party shall be deducted from the amount of said contract price."

The findings of the court inviting attention are as follows:

> "That pursuant to said contract said A. E. Pearson commenced the construction of said school building, and continued to supply work and materials for the same up to about January 1, 1912, at which time he reached the end of his resources, ceased work upon the building, and abandoned his contract, and defendant thereupon took possession of said uncompleted building and supplied labor and materials necessary for its completion, according to the terms of the Pearson contract"; that said Pearson, while engaged in the work, received certain payments aggregating the sum of $14,895. "The total value of all labor and materials furnished by said Pearson as estimated by the superintendent of construction, amounts to $19,860. After the abandonment of the contract by said Pearson as aforesaid, defendant completed the building in accordance with the Pearson contract, and necessarily expended in so doing the sum of $5,848.38 for labor and materials. At the time of the abandonment of the contract by said Pearson, on or about January 1, 1912, there was in the building fund of defendant school district the sum of $5,455, the unpaid portion of the contract price of said school building, all of which money defendant expended in completing said building, in the manner provided by the Pearson contract."

By other findings it appears that, during the months of September, October, November, and December, 1911, while Pearson was in charge of the work, respondent furnished certain quantities of brick to Pearson and to subcontractors under Pearson, all of which were used in the construction of said building. On the 3d day of January, 1912, and after the abandonment of the contract by Pearson, respondent served notice upon the trustees of the district that there was a balance of $686.40 due him on account of brick furnished to Pearson and his subcontractors for use in said building, and required them to pay said sum out of any money due or to become due said Pearson.

It is thus made entirely plain that the service of said notice constitutes the only possible ground for any liability on the part of said district. This notice was given in pursuance of section 1184 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended by St. 1911, p. 1315, and its legal effect is exposed in the following quotation from said section:

> "Upon such notice being given, it shall be lawful for the owner to withhold and in the case of property, which, for reasons of public policy or otherwise, is not subject to the liens in this chapter provided for, the owner or person who contracted with the contractor shall withhold from his contractor sufficient money due or that may become due to such contractor, to answer to such claim."

But it is entirely clear that at the time said notice was served and at all times thereafter there was nothing due from said district to said Pearson. He was to be paid the balance when he completed the building, but he never completed it. After he abandoned the undertaking it was finished by the district at an expense greater than the amount that would have been due Pearson if he had fully carried out his contract. Under the express terms of the agreement, therefore—to say nothing of legal and equitable implications—there was nothing owing from the district to Pearson.

The said notice had the effect of a garnishment of any money coming to the contractor which was in the hands of the owner, the school district, and the extent of the latter's liability to plaintiff is measured by its liability to the contractor. That is to say, there was and is no liability at all.

Of course, if respondent had served his notice before the district paid Pearson all that he earned under the contract, a different situation would be presented. The governing principle of the case is covered by the decision in Bates v. Santa Barbara Co., 90 Cal. 546, 27 Pac. 438; Denison v. Burrell, 119 Cal. 180, 51 Pac. 1; Bianchi v. Hughes, 124 Cal. 27, 56 Pac. 610; Butler v. Ng Chung, 160 Cal. 438, 117 Pac. 512, Ann. Cas. 1913A, 940; Suisun L. Co. v. Fairfield School Dist., 19 Cal. App. 595, 127 Pac. 349; and we can see no good reason for offering any additional suggestions upon the subject.

Apparently the only pretense of justification for holding the defendant liable is found in the language of section 1200 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as it formerly existed, as follows:

> "In case the contractor shall fail to perform his contract in full, or shall abandon the same before completion, the portion of the contract price applicable to the liens of other persons than the contractor, shall be fixed as follows," etc.

We need not inquire, however, whether this could be given effect to control the said contract of the parties, as this section was repealed May 1, 1911 (Stats. of 1911, p. 1319), and hence was not in force when plaintiff furnished said material.

It is to be deplored if plaintiff must lose his claim, but we see no legal ground upon which he can enforce it against appellant. His contract was not with the latter, and he failed to comply with the statutory condition necessary to create a liability against the district. He is presumed to have had notice of the contract between Pearson and the district, and through his want of diligence he must suffer the consequences of his misplaced confidence in the contractor. It may be, also, that the building cost appellant less than it was really worth but, there being no claim of fraud, the district had the moral and legal right to stand upon the contract with Pearson, though respondent should go uncompensated for his materials that went into the construction of said building.

PEOPLE v. DILLER. (Cr. 330.)

1. WITNESSES (§ 293*) — PRIVILEGE — TESTIMONY AGAINST HIMSELF—STATUTES—VALIDITY.

Pen. Code, § 367c, as amended by St. 1913, p. 218, provides that whenever an automobile strikes a person or collides with another vehicle the driver or a person assuming authority over the driver shall cause the automobile to stop, and render the person in the other vehicle assistance, and shall give him the number of the colliding automobile, with the name and address of the driver and owner and the names of the passengers. It also provides that its violation shall be punishable by fine and imprisonment. Held, that such provision is not unconstitutional as compelling a person who has committed an act which might be the basis of a prosecution for criminal negligence to furnish evidence against himself.

2. HIGHWAYS (§ 166*) — USE—REGULATION—AUTOMOBILE.

The state being authorized to prohibit altogether the operation of automobiles and power vehicles on the public highways, Pen. Code, § 367c, as amended by St. 1913, p. 218, providing that if an automobile comes into collision with another vehicle the driver or owner must stop, render aid, and disclose name and number, etc., is valid as a mere police regulation of the use of the highways by such machines.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 457; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

O. A. Diller was convicted of failing to stop his automobile and give the occupants of another automobile with which he had collided the number of his car, his name and address, etc., and he appeals. Affirmed.

Rodgers & Davis, of San Diego, and Davis & McCoy, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted of the offense defined in section 367c of the Penal Code, it being charged that while driving an automobile a collision occurred between the one operated by him and another automobile, and that he did not stop his car, nor give the occupants of the other automobile the number of his car, his name and address, nor the name of the owner of the machine which he was driving when the collision occurred.

[1] On appeal he attacks the validity of the statute upon the ground that it is obnoxious to section 13, article I, of the Constitution, which provides that "no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be a witness against himself." Section 367c, Penal Code, as amended by St. 1913, p. 218, provides:

> "Whenever an automobile, motor cycle, or other motor vehicle, or any vehicle whatsoever, regardless of the power by which the same may be propelled or drawn, strikes any person, or collides with any vehicle containing a person, the driver of, and all persons in, such automobile, motor cycle or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, who have or assume authority over such driver, shall immediately cause such automobile, motor cycle, or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, to stop, and shall render to the person struck, or to the occupants of the vehicle collided with, all necessary assistance including the carrying of such person or occupant to a physician or surgeon for medical or surgical treatment, if such treatment be required, or if such carrying is requested by the person struck or the occupant of the vehicle struck; and such driver, and person having or assuming authority over such driver, shall further give to the occupants of such vehicle or person struck, the number of such automobile, motor cycle, or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, if the same have a number, together with the name and address of the driver of such automobile, motor cycle, or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle, also the name of the owner thereof and the name of the passenger; or passengers not exceeding five in such automobile, motor cycle, or other motor vehicle, or other vehicle at the time of such striking or collision. Any person violating any of the provisions of this section is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding five years or in the county jail not exceeding one year, or by fine not exceeding five thousand dollars, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Appellant's argument is that since such a collision might be due to dereliction of duty under circumstances showing an actual intent to injure and upon which a charge of criminal negligence might be based against the driver, the information which he is required to give under the provisions of said section 367c could be used as evidence in prosecuting him for the offense. Provisions similar to that found in the statute have been enacted in a number of states the organic laws of which, like our own, provide that no person in a criminal case shall be compelled to be a witness against himself. Among such states are Missouri and New York, the highest courts of which have upheld the law against the attack here made. See Ex parte Kneedler, 243 Mo. 632, 147 S. W. 983, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 622, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 923; People v. Rosenheimer, 209 N. Y. 115, 102 N. E. 530. In the New York case the court held that it was within the power of the Legislature to prohibit altogether the operation of automobiles on the public highways, and since this power might be exercised by the Legislature any restrictions or conditions attached, less than absolute prohibition, subject to which they might be operated, was lawful; in other words, the greater power included the less. This position is based upon the theory that the driver of an automobile in the operation thereof exercises a privilege and not a right, and as to such privilege it is competent for the Legislature to prescribe the conditions upon which it shall be exercised, or deny it altogether. Reference is made to the opinion for the numerous authorities cited in support of the proposition. While the reasons thus assigned for sustaining the validity of a statute might be deemed ample ground for affirming the judgment, other reasons equally cogent are suggested. If a collision between automobiles be due to circumstances showing an actual intent to injure persons or the property of another, such fact would constitute a criminal offense, not by virtue, however, of section 367c, but by reason of other provisions of the law. In the case at bar it is not claimed, or even suggested, that the collision was due to criminal neglect on the part of defendant; hence, so far as shown by the record, no crime was committed. Under the law a witness may be compelled to give answers to competent and relevant questions upon the trial of an issue of fact; nevertheless, if such answers tend to incriminate or connect him with a crime, such fact justifies his refusal to answer. Conceding the case of a collision due to malicious and wanton intent of a person, he might—though we do not so hold, since it is unnecessary to so decide—as in any other case where the answer of a witness tends to incriminate him, assert his privilege and refuse to give the information upon the ground that compliance with the statute would compel him to give testimony against himself. Whatever might be the effect in the case of a collision due to criminal negligence of a party, suffice it to say that in the case at bar, since no crime was committed, the constitutional provision could have no application, and in such case the constitutional rights of defendant could not be infringed by exacting the information required by the statute.

[2] We adopt with approval what is said by the Supreme Court of Missouri in the Kneedler Case, as follows:

> "The statute is a simple police regulation. It does not make the accident a crime. If a crime is involved, it arises from some other statute. It does not attempt in terms to authorize the admission of the information as evidence in a criminal proceeding. The mere fact that the driver discloses his identity is no evidence of guilt, but rather of innocence. State v. Davis, 108 Mo. 666, 18 S. W. 894, 32 Am. St. Rep. 640. On the contrary, flight is regarded as evidence of guilt. In the large majority of cases, such accidents are free from culpability. If this objection to the statute is valid, it may as well be urged against the other provisions, which require the owner and chauffeur to register their names and number, and to display the number of the vehicle in a conspicuous place thereon, thus giving evidence of identity, which is the obvious purpose of the provision. St. Louis v. Williams, 235 Mo. 503, 139 S. W. 340. We have several statutes which require persons to give information which would tend to support possible subsequent criminal charges, if introduced in evidence. Persons in charge are required to report accidents in mines and factories. Physicians must report deaths and their causes, giving their own names and addresses. Druggists must show their prescription lists. Dealers must deliver for inspection foods carried in stock. We held a law valid which required a pawnbroker to exhibit to an officer his book wherein were registered articles received by him, against his objection based on this same constitutional provision. We held this to be a mere police regulation, not invalid because there might be a possible criminal prosecution in which it might be attempted to use this evidence to show him to be a receiver of stolen goods. St. Joseph v. Levin, 128 Mo. 588, 31 S. W. 101, 49 Am. St. Rep. 577. If the law which exacts this information is invalid, because such information, although in itself no evidence of guilt, might possibly lead to a charge of crime against the informant, then all police regulations which involve identification may be questioned on the same ground. We are not aware of any constitutional provision designed to protect a man's conduct from judicial inquiry, or aid him in fleeing from justice."

The record presented discloses no ground for defendant's contention, and the judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1099*)—SUBSEQUENT APPEAL—FORMER APPEAL AS LAW OF CASE.

In an action to establish title to a certificate of stock, where the fundamental question was whether the cashier of defendant bank had authority to sell the stock to plaintiff, and in which defendant's stipulation that a certain witness would testify that the stock at all times after its purchase by defendant was carried on its books in the bond investment account did not have any substantial bearing upon the question in issue, the determination of the Supreme Court on a former appeal that the finding that the cashier had not exceeded his authority in making the sale was not sustained by the evidence was the law of the case on a subsequent appeal; the evidence aside from the stipulation being the same as on the first trial.

Action by George McBoyle and another against the Union National Bank, and H. N. Morris, as receiver. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

See, also, 162 Cal. 277, 122 Pac. 458.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, Fitzgerald & Abbott, and Leon A. Clark, all of Oakland, for appellants. T. C. Coogan, Powell & Dow, and W. H. Orrick, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. The defendants appeal from a judgment declaring the plaintiff Lulu May McBoyle to be the owner of 599 shares of the capital stock of Burnham-Standeford Company, a corporation, and of the certificate representing such shares, and adjudging that said plaintiff recover the 599 shares and certificate upon payment to the defendant receiver of the sum of $9,500, with interest.

The case has already been before this court on appeal. Upon a first trial, judgment had gone in favor of the defendants. The plaintiffs made a motion for a new trial, which was denied. This court, on March 2, 1912, rendered its judgment reversing the judgment below, as well as the order denying a new trial. The essential facts are stated in our opinion on the former appeal, reported in 162 Cal. 277, 122 Pac. 458. When the cause came before the superior court for a second trial, the defendant, with the leave of the court, filed an amended answer. This pleading did not, however, change the issues in any respect material to the questions now presented. At the trial, the cause was, by stipulation, submitted upon the evidence taken at the first trial, together with the further stipulated fact that a certain witness, if called, would have testified that the stock in controversy, "at all times after its purchase by said defendant Union National Bank was carried on its books in the bond investment account." We are satisfied that this additional testimony could not have had any substantial bearing upon the main issue in dispute, and, in fact, the contrary is not seriously urged here.

The fundamental question in the case is whether the cashier of the defendant bank had authority to sell the shares of stock to McBoyle. Upon the first trial the superior court found that the cashier had exceeded his authority in making the sale. The holding of this court was that this finding was not sustained by the evidence. Upon the second trial, the court below, following the conclusions reached by us, found in favor of the plaintiffs on this issue. The judgment entered upon such finding (together with the findings, not now assailed, on other issues) must be affirmed, unless we conclude that we erred in our former decision regarding the extent of the cashier's authority. We see no reason for changing the views heretofore expressed, if, indeed, any such change were not precluded by the doctrine of the "law of the case." The grounds of our action are fully stated in the opinion on the earlier appeals, and the reasoning of that opinion is adopted as the basis of the present decision.

In re HASSELL'S ESTATE. (S. F. 7026.)

1. WILLS (§ 535*)—PRETERMITTED CHILDREN.

Before the natural rights of children to share in the inheritance of their immediate ancestors is taken away, the intent that they shall not so share must appear convincingly on the face of the will, and if it does not so appear, the testator will be held to have inadvertently failed to provide for such children or children of deceased children.

2. WILLS (§ 535*) — CONSTRUCTION — PRETERMITTED CHILDREN — DISINHERITANCE — "HEIRS."

Where testator provided that those of his heirs not mentioned in his will had been omitted with full knowledge, the word "heirs," was used to include children, so that those of his children not mentioned in his will were disinherited, not pretermitted.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Nils F. Hassell, deceased. On petition of three of testator's children who were disinherited, for a distributive share in the estate as pretermitted heirs. From an order denying the petition, petitioners appeal. Affirmed.

Edward R. Eliassen, of San Francisco, for appellants. Stetson & Koford, of San Francisco, for respondent. Gavin McNab and Nat Schmulowitz, both of San Francisco, for Mrs. Rosa S. Theorin.

HENSHAW, J. Nils F. Hassell died testate. His estate was probated in the county of Alameda. He was 79 years old at the time of his death. The executor petitioned for final distribution of his estate. Three of the children of Hassell petitioned for distributive shares of the estate as pretermitted heirs of the deceased. The court held that they were not pretermitted heirs, but had been intentionally omitted from any share in the testator's bounty. From the decree following this determination these children of Nils F. Hassell have appealed.

The will contained the following provisions:

> "One half thereof to Rosa S. Theorin of Chicago, Illinois, to have and to hold unto herself heirs and assigns forever, if she survive me, otherwise said share shall go to my son Carl J. Hagelund one half and the other one half thereof shall go to Signa Hagelund and Marie Valentine, both of Chicago, Illinois, shares and shares alike. * * *

"Those of my heirs not herein mentioned has been omitted by me with full knowledge thereof.

"Any of the foregoing persons or any other person or persons claiming to be heirs of mine, and not herein mentioned, making any contest of this will under any pretense shall be, by such contest, excluded from taking any part of my estate."

[1] It is, of course, well established, that before what are considered to be the "natural rights" of children to share in the inheritance of their immediate ancestors shall be taken away, the intent that they shall not so share must appear upon the face of the will strongly and convincingly. In re Stevens, 83 Cal. 330, 23 Pac. 379, 17 Am. St. Rep. 252; Rhoton v. Blevin, 99 Cal. 647, 34 Pac. 513; In re Salmon, 107 Cal. 617, 40 Pac. 1030, 48 Am. St. Rep. 164. If the intent is not thus satisfactorily established, the law will reach the humane conclusion that the testator inadvertently failed to make provision for his children or children of deceased children.

[2] The first quotation from this will indicates the knowledge of the testator of the existence of one son, who is made the recipient of the father's bounty. It is argued by appellants that the language subsequently quoted, to the effect that "heirs not herein mentioned have been omitted with full knowledge," should not be construed to mean and to include his children, since if he had designed or intended to exclude his children, he would have used the precise word. But this is asking the court to put an unpermissible construction upon a word of well-defined meaning both at law and in popular parlance. At law, while the word may include others, it always includes the children of a decedent. In popular parlance it not only has the same meaning, but, if there be any difference, it is more frequently used as a synonym of "children." Thus, in common speech, a man will frequently speak of his heirs, meaning thereby his children and his children alone. No natural sympathy for the disinherited (the reason for which disinherison we cannot know) can be allowed so grossly to pervert the meaning of a well-understood word as to permit us to hold, as here under appellant's contention we would be obliged to hold, that the word "heirs" did not include and was not used to include a class universally embraced within its significance.

It follows herefrom that the decree appealed from must be and hereby is affirmed.

HARTFORD FIRE INS. CO. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State, et al. (S. F. 6382.)

1. States (§ 78*)—Officers—Collection of License Tax under Protest—Liability of Collecting Officer.

Under St. 1906, p. 43, making it the duty of all state officers to pay into the state treasury money received by them in their official capacity, Pol. Code, § 663 et seq., providing that money deposited in the state treasurer's office can be taken therefrom only on a proper warrant after audit of the state board of control, and Pen. Code, § 424, making it a felony to willfully fail to pay over public moneys to the state treasurer, the secretary of state was not individually liable to an insurance company for a license tax collected from it, pursuant to St. 1905, p. 493, and amendments thereto, and duly paid over to the state treasurer, where he acted merely in his ministerial official capacity, and did everything pursuant to the statute.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 843*)—Questions Reviewable—Jurisdiction.

An objection that an action by an insurance company against the secretary of state and treasurer of the state officially and individually was not maintainable because it was in effect an action against the state, was not available on appeal, where a nonsuit was granted as to the treasurer, and judgment was rendered against the secretary of state solely in his individual capacity, though the appeal purported to be taken by both defendants in their official capacity.

3. Insurance (§ 7*)—License Tax—Voluntary Payment.

The payment of a license tax by an insurance company under protest, to avoid the forfeiture prescribed by St. 1905, p. 493, and amendments thereto, for nonpayment of such tax, which forfeiture would result in case the courts held such statute to be still in force, was not a voluntary payment, so as not to be recoverable by the company.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. § 6; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

4. Insurance (§ 4*)—License Tax—Liability of Insurance Company.

Const. art. 13, § 14, providing that taxes "shall be levied, assessed and collected in the manner hereinafter provided," and requiring every insurance company to annually pay a certain tax, to be "in lieu of all other taxes and licenses * * * upon the property of such companies," supersedes the prior State License Act (St. 1905, p. 493 and amendments thereto) so far as it applied to insurance companies and exemptions from the provisions thereof as to the payment of the license tax thereunder.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by the Hartford Fire Insurance Company, a corporation, against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State, and others. From judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, of San Francisco, for appellants. Coogan & O'Connor, Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, and Samuel Knight, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing was granted in this case for consideration of the sole question of the personal liability of defendant Frank C. Jordan, against whom, as an individual, judgment was given. This question did not receive the attention it merited, the mind of the court being led away from a consideration of its real importance by the fact that it was stipulated at the trial of the cause that no attempt would be made to enforce a personal judgment against Jordan, if in fact such a judgment was given. On rehearing it is pressed upon our attention with a force which cannot be combated that the silence of the opinion of the court upon this question is necessarily a determination that a public officer, under the indicated circumstances, is personally responsible, and it is urged that the question should be distinctly determined by the court. To that point and to that point alone this consideration is addressed; the opinion of the court heretofore given, in all other respects, standing affirmed and approved.

[1] As to the facts controlling this consideration it is to be noted that everything that Jordan did was in consonance with the language of the law of the state, and was done in his ministerial official capacity. He certified the list of delinquent corporations to the Governor, as the state law in terms ordered him to do. The Governor made his proclamation to the effect that the delinquent corporations would forfeit their right to do business in the state if their license fees were not paid upon the date fixed by the statute. Jordan, as secretary of state, received the fees, as the law declared it his duty to do, which were paid under protest by plaintiff. Thus the duress on plaintiff was the duress of the law, and not the duress of officers of the law. The fact that the money was paid to Jordan under protest enlarged neither his powers nor his liabilities. The law itself made plain the steps which he must take upon receipt of such moneys, whether paid under protest or not. It is the duty of all state officers to pay all moneys received by them in their official capacities into the state treasury. Stats. 1906, p. 43. They must make these payments monthly. It is the duty of the state treasurer to keep all moneys in the state treasury. Pol. Code, § 452. Once deposited in the state treasury funds can be taken therefrom only upon warrant of the state controller after audit by the state board of control. Pol. Code, § 663 et seq. It is pleaded and admitted that Jordan so paid the money into the state treasury. He was not only under the mandate of our fiscal civil laws so to do, but he was equally under the strong compulsion of the penal laws, since by section 424 of the Penal Code, his willful omission or refusal to pay over the moneys to the treasurer would have been a felony, punishable by imprisonment for from 1 to 10 years and by perpetual disqualification from holding office in the state. Therefore, notwithstanding the protest of plaintiff, Jordan could not, without committing a felony, have held the money in his own possession to respond to the judgment which plaintiff might obtain against him as an individual.

There will be found in the earlier adjudications a strictness of accountability upon the part of public officers which has been greatly and justly abated. Thus in Elliott v. Swartwout, 10 Pet. 137, 9 L. Ed. 373, it is said:

> "The case put by the third point is where, at the time of payment, notice is given to the collector that the duties are charged too high, and that party paying so paid to get possession of his goods, and accompanied by a declaration to the collector that he intended to sue him to recover back the amount erroneously paid, and notice given to him not to pay it over to the treasurer. This question must be answered in the affirmative, unless the broad proposition can be maintained that no action will lie against the collector to recover back an excess of duties paid him, but that recourse must be had to their government for redress. Such a principle would be carrying an exemption to a public officer beyond any protection, sanctioned by the principles of law or sound public policy."

Cary v. Curtis, 3 How. 236, 11 L. Ed. 576, announces the same doctrine touching the responsibility of the agent where protest has been made at the time of payment, and Justice Story, in the course of his dissenting opinion in that case speaks as follows:

> "Hence it is a doctrine of the common law (so far as my researches extend), absolutely universal, that if a man, by fraud, or wrong, or illegality, obtains, or exacts, or retains, money justly belonging to another, with notice that the latter contests the right of the former to receive, or exact, or retain it, an action for money had and received lies to recover it back, and it is no answer for the wrongdoer to say that he has paid it over to his superior; for, although as between the wrongdoer and his superior, the maxim may well apply, respondeat superior, yet the injured party is not bound to seek redress in that direction; and, a fortiori, * * * he is not so bound where, as in the case of the government, the superior is not suable. That would be a mere mockery of justice."

Of course these cases take no account of the unhappy dilemma of the agent, who is a public officer, when, as here, the law, notwithstanding the protest, compels him to pay over the money to his principal. This difference in the law is itself sufficient to demand the application of a different rule, and the opposite rule has in fact been declared in this state upon every occasion where the question has arisen. Thus in Phelan v. San Francisco, 120 Cal. 1, 52 Pac. 38, the action was to recover taxes against the tax collector, paid under protest. There, as here, the tax collector had paid the money into the treasury, as the law compelled him to do, and, says this court, he "having paid the money into the treasury in obedience to this official duty, it would violate all principles of justice to hold him individually liable to the plaintiff therefor, upon the ground that he had refused to follow the plaintiff's directions to disregard his official obligation." Bailey v. Johnson, 121 Cal. 562, 54 Pac. 80, was an action upon an agreed case between a protesting taxpayer and a tax collector. This court, in declaring the lack of power in the tax collector to make such an agreed case, said:

"He was but the agent of the county for the collection of the tax, with no interest other than that of an officer performing a duty enjoined by law, and with only such power and authority as the statute gave. He was not concerned in the question of the validity of the tax. If he failed to collect it because of its illegality, he was not responsible to the county; and if he collected it, and it subsequently proved to have been illegally assessed, he was not responsible to the aggrieved taxpayer."

Craig v. Boone, 146 Cal. 718, 81 Pac. 22, was another case brought against the tax collector by a protesting taxpayer. Here, with reference to and quotations from the above cited cases, the same doctrine is laid down. It conclusively follows herefrom that the defendant Jordan was not responsible to plaintiff and that the judgment against him in his individual capacity was therefore erroneous. To the end that it may be noted that the views of this court are not singular upon the question, but, as has been said, are in accord with the humane and just doctrine of later cases, reference may be made to 27 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, page 795; 37 Cyc. 1187; 2 Cooley, Taxation, pages 1477 et seq.; Mechem, Pub. Officers, § 694; Throop, Pub. Officers, § 760; Blackwell, Tax Titles (4th Ed.) page 187.

Following is that portion of the former opinion of the court which is here approved and adopted:

"Lorigan, J. This action was brought by plaintiff in its own behalf, and as assignee of several other fire insurance companies, to recover certain moneys paid by them under protest as a state license tax on fire insurance corporations for the fiscal year commencing July 1, 1911.

"The license tax in question is provided for under an act of the Legislature entitled 'An act relating to revenue and taxation providing for a license tax upon corporations and making a provision for the purpose of carrying out the objects of this act,' approved March 20, 1905 (Stats. 1905, p. 493), and amendments thereto.

"This act, in so far as material to the questions presented here, and as it stood when the license tax involved was paid, provides that every domestic corporation and every foreign corporation doing business in this state must procure from the secretary of state a license authorizing it to do so and pay a license tax therefor, the amount of tax being based on the authorized capital stock of the corporation; makes the tax payable to the secretary of state on July 1st of each year, and a delinquency of the corporation therefor if the tax is not paid by September 1st thereof. The act then provides for a report to the Governor of the state by the secretary of state before the 15th of September of each year of a list of delinquent corporations and the issuance forthwith by the Governor of a proclamation declaring under the act "that the charters of such delinquent domestic corporations will be forfeited, and the right of such foreign corporations to do business in the state shall be forfeited," unless payment of the license tax is made to the secretary of state on or before 4 o'clock of November 30th following. Provision is then made for the immediate filing of this proclamation of the Governor in the office of the secretary of state, that said secretary shall immediately publish it, and that at the hour and date specified in the proclamation the charters of all domestic corporations which have failed to pay said license tax shall be forfeited to the state and the right of all delinquent foreign corporations to do business in the state which have failed so to pay shall be likewise forfeited. The secretary of state is required to make out and transmit to each county clerk in the state, to be filed in his office, a list of such domestic and foreign corporations whose charters or right to do business have been forfeited. It is further made unlawful for any corporation delinquent under the act, whether domestic or foreign, which has not paid the license tax, to exercise the powers of such corporation or to transact any business in the state after November 30th next following the delinquency, and declares that any person who exercises any of the powers of the corporation so delinquent, or who transacts business for or on behalf of the corporation, after the date last referred to, shall be guilty of a misdemeanor and subject on conviction to fine or imprisonment, or both. In addition it is provided that the directors or managers, in office, of a delinquent domestic or foreign corporation whose charter or right to do business is forfeited shall be deemed trustees of the corporation with full power to settle up its affairs.

"Subsequent to the passage of the act and its amendments and in November, 1910, section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution of this state was ratified. That section as far as applicable here provides that:

" 'Sec. 14. Taxes levied, assessed and collected as hereinafter provided upon * * * telephone companies, * * * insurance companies, * * * and taxes upon all franchises of every kind and nature, shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes, and shall be levied, assessed and collected in the manner hereinafter provided. * * *

" '(b) Every insurance company or association doing business in this state shall annually pay to the state a tax of one and one-half per cent upon the amount of the gross premiums received upon its business done in this state, less return premiums and reinsurance in companies or associations authorized to do business in this state. * * * This tax shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property of such companies. * * *'

"The principal question on this appeal, though others are involved, is whether the constitutional provision quoted superseded the state corporation license tax act and thus exempted the plaintiff and its assignors from the payment of such tax.

"The complaint alleged that plaintiff and its assignors are foreign fire insurance companies and were on July 1, 1911, each doing business in the state under certificates of authority regularly issued to them pursuant to law by the insurance commissioner of the state still in full force and effect, and that the value of the business of each in the state exceeded $20,000. It then alleged the proceedings taken under the act —the making of a report by Jordan as secretary of state to the Governor thereof on September 11, 1911, of a list of the corporations in the state claimed to have been delinquent in the payment to the state of license taxes, which list included plaintiff and its assignors, and a proclamation issued by the said Governor, declaring that their right to do business in the state would be forfeited unless said license tax was paid to the secretary of state by 4 o'clock p. m. of November 30, 1911; the filing of said proclamation and its publication as provided in the act. Further, that on October 17, 1911, Jordan, as such secretary, notified and threatened plaintiff and its assignors that unless such tax was paid by them by November 30, 1911, the right of each to do business in the state would be forfeited; that solely by reason of said proclamation and threat of forfeiture and to prevent such threatened forfeiture, plaintiff and its assignors, on November 29, 1911, paid involuntarily and under protest to said Jordan, as such secretary of state, the amounts claimed as said license taxes under the act, and simultaneously therewith presented and delivered to said Jordan, and he accepted and filed in his office, a protest against said payments, on the ground that the act under which it was being exacted was superseded by section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution above referred to, and that its exaction was therefore unauthorized and illegal; that Jordan, as such secretary of state, thereafter turned over the amounts paid to the defendant Roberts as state treasurer; that subsequently a demand for repayment to plaintiff and its assignors was made by them upon both Jordan and Roberts as said secretary and treasurer, respectively, and by both refused. The complaint as originally filed was against Jordan and Roberts in their official capacities only. Subsequently plaintiff by leave of court was allowed to amend the complaint by including said Jordan and Roberts in the title as defendants individually, and to amend the prayer by asking judgment also against them as individuals. All the allegations of the complaint were admitted except the allegation that the money was paid involuntarily under a threat of forfeiture. Plaintiff had judgment against the defendant Jordan individually, and from that judgment and an order denying their motions for a new trial, each of the defendants in all the capacities in which they were sued filed notice of this appeal.

"Several grounds are urged for a reversal but the three main propositions upon which this is sought need only be considered.

[2] "Defendants first contend that the superior court had no jurisdiction to entertain this action. In that regard it is insisted that this is an action against the defendants as state officers, in which judgment is sought against them in their official capacities; that while not nominally a suit against the state, in legal effect it is such, and cannot be maintained under the principle that the state cannot be sued without its consent, and there is no law under which consent to do so has been granted. But we do not perceive that this point is involved on this appeal. The action was originally brought against Jordan and Roberts in their official capacities. It was amended so as to make them also defendants individually. During the trial the motion of defendants for a nonsuit in favor of Roberts as defendant officially and individually was granted, and eliminated him entirely from the case. There was no judgment against Jordan in his official capacity, but solely against him individually. While it is true this appeal purports to be taken by both defendants in the official capacity in which they were sued, as there was no judgment against either of them in that capacity, they had no right of appeal as such, and there is therefore nothing in the case under which the question of the jurisdiction of the court attempted to be raised by them can be considered.

[3] "It is next insisted that the license tax was voluntarily paid, and hence cannot be recovered back. The general rule for determining whether a payment illegally exacted is voluntary or involuntary is well settled, and its discussion is not necessary here because attention will be presently called to cases where, under conditions similar to those shown here, if the payments herein named were illegally exacted, they were made involuntarily and may be recovered back. It appears here that under the provisions of the act in question the failure of the plaintiff to pay the tax to the state within the time provided would result in a proclamation declaring that it had forfeited its right and was without authority to do business in the state. The payment was made to prevent this threatened result, and was paid under a written protest against its exaction as being illegal for the reasons therein stated and urged here. The act provided for no judicial proceeding or action by the state to be taken on failure of the plaintiff to pay the tax under which an opportunity would be afforded it to test its legality. A forfeiture by the self-executing provisions of the act is declared against the right of plaintiff to do business in the state, and it was either compelled to make the license tax payment or go out of business. Under the act the parties were not placed on equal terms. The plaintiff had no choice; it must either submit to the illegal exaction or go out of business. Nor had it any redress for such illegal exaction unless payment under such circumstances is regarded as involuntary and compelled under duress. It is true, as asserted by appellants, that a declaration of forfeiture under the act following the proclamation of the Governor had no legal efficacy if the exaction of the tax against plaintiff was illegal; that if it was not subject to the tax, no forfeiture could result from a mere proclamation which declared it, and that when the right of plaintiff to do business was in any way attacked, it could show this. Of course, in any proceeding subsequent to the declared forfeiture against the corporation, its agents or officers, by the state in quo warranto proceedings or civil or criminal action, the attempted forfeiture under the act of the right of the plaintiff to do business might be disputed and declared invalid. But by that time great damage and injury might have resulted to the plaintiff from the fact that the forfeiture, though unjustified, had been declared. It is too clear for discussion that the effect of a proclamation, declaring that the right of plaintiff to further do business in the state had been forfeited, must necessarily work it an irreparable injury. Its business is to secure contracts of insurance therein and renewals thereof, and a proclamation of a forfeiture of its right to do so, even though not justified, would of itself—particularly as to fire insurance companies—have the direct effect of raising a question in the business community of the validity of contracts which the company might seek to make, and would naturally drive business which it might otherwise hold or secure to other corporations engaged in a like business, whose right to make them was not subjected to the same uncertainty and doubt. While asserting in good faith that the exaction was illegal, plaintiff and its assignors could have no certainty that their contention would be sustained in some judicial proceeding brought subsequent to the proclamation of forfeiture, and if their claim was not then sustained, they would have suffered the extraordinary penalty of having lost their right to do business in the state. Under such circumstances, to avoid this penalty, the only thing plaintiff could do was to make the payment under protest, and if the license tax was illegally exacted, we are satisfied under the authorities that the payment was involuntary, and plaintiff had a right to recover it back.

"This precise question has arisen in cases where the tax was exacted under the provisions of acts, in the main, similar to ours, and some less drastic in their provisions, and where it was held that the payments made were involuntary and could be recovered back.

"In A., T. & S. F. Ry. Co. v. O'Connor, 223 U. S. 280, 32 Sup. Ct. 216, 56 L. Ed. 436, Ann. Cas. 1913C, 1050, the action was to recover back a tax of 2 per cent. on the capital stock imposed by an act of the state of Colorado. The plaintiff was a Kansas corporation. As to the tax the Colorado law gave an action for debt to the state, and provided that every corporation failing to pay the tax should forfeit its right to do business in the state until the tax was paid, with certain penalties as long as its payment remained in default. Plaintiff paid the tax under protest that the act was unconstitutional as levying a tax on interstate commerce. The Supreme Court declared: 'The defendant did not argue that the tax could be maintained, but contended only that the payment was voluntary. * * * It is reasonable that a man who denies the legality of a tax should have a clear and certain remedy. * * * Of course we are speaking of those cases where the state is not put to an action if the citizen refuses to pay. In these latter he can interpose his objection by way of defense, but when, as is common, the state has a more summary remedy, such as distress, and the party indicates by protest that he is yielding to what he cannot prevent, courts sometimes, perhaps, have been a little too slow to recognize the implied duress under which payment is made, but even if the state is driven to an action, if at the same time the citizen is put at a serious disadvantage in the assertion of his legal, in this case of his constitutional, rights, by defense in the suit, justice may require that he should be at liberty to avoid those disadvantages by paying promptly and bringing suit on his side. He is entitled to assert his proposed right on reasonably equal terms. See Ex parte Young, 209 U. S. 123, 146 [28 Sup. Ct. 441], 52 L. Ed. 714 [13 L. R. A. (N. S.) 932, 14 Ann. Cas. 764]. * * * In this case the law, besides giving an action of debt to the state, provides that every corporation that fails to pay the tax shall forfeit its right to do business within the state until the tax is paid, and also shall pay a penalty of 10 per cent. for every six months or fractional part of six months of default after May 1st of each year. It may be that the forfeiture of the right to do business would not be authoritatively established except by a quo warranto provided for in a following section, but before or without the proceeding, the effect of the forfeiture clause upon the plaintiff's subsequent contracts and business might be serious. See Ludwig v. Western Union Tel. Co., 216 U. S. 146 [30 Sup. Ct. 280], 54 L. Ed. 423. And, in any event the penalty would go on accruing during all the time that might be spent before the validity of the defense could be adjudged. As appears from the decision below, the plaintiff could have had no certainty of ultimate success, and we are of opinion that it was not called upon to take the risk of having its contracts disputed and its business injured and in finding the tax more or less nearly doubled in case it finally had to pay. In other words, we are of opinion that the payment was made under duress.'

"Gaar Scott & Co. v. Shannon, 223 U. S. 468, 32 Sup. Ct. 236, 56 L. Ed. 510, was also an action to recover back money paid as a tax under protest. An act of the state of Texas required foreign insurance companies doing business in Texas to pay a certain franchise tax measured by their capital stock, and provided that if by a given date payment was not made, a percentage penalty would be incurred, and that if the tax was not paid by a still further date, the permit of such company to do business in the state would be forfeited 'without judicial ascertainment,' and the company deprived of the right to sue in the courts. Plaintiff, a foreign corporation doing business in Texas, paid the tax under protest, on the ground that the amount was exacted under an unconstitutional law. Defendant contended that the payment was voluntary. The court holding to the contrary said: 'Neither a statute imposing a tax nor the execution thereunder, nor a mere demand for payment, is treated as duress. It does not necessarily follow that there will be a levy on goods. Or, if there is, a citizen, to avoid the consequences of the levy may pay the money, regain the use of his property, and maintain a suit for the recovery of what has been exacted from him. The legal remedy redresses the wrong, but he has the same right to sue if he pays under compulsion of a statute whose self-executing provisions amount to duress. An act which declares that where the franchise tax is not paid by a given date a penalty of 25 per cent shall be incurred, the license of the company shall be canceled, and the right to sue shall be lost, operates much more as duress than a levy on a limited amount of property. Payment to avoid such consequences is not voluntary, but compulsory, and may be recovered back. Otherwise plaintiff might be without any remedy whatever.'

"Scottish Union Ins. Co. v. Herriott, 109 Iowa, 606, 80 N. W. 665, 77 Am. St. Rep. 548, presents a case practically identical with the one at bar. A law of Iowa provided that foreign and domestic insurance companies on filing their annual statements should pay to the treasurer of the state as taxes a certain percentage tax (different as between foreign and domestic companies) on the gross amount of premiums received by them during the preceding year, taking a receipt therefor to be filed with the auditor of the state, who should not, until such filing, issue the annual certificate as provided by law authorizing the corporations to do business in the state. Upon failing to make payment of the taxes imposed when plaintiff filed its annual statement, it was notified by the auditor that if the amount was not paid, action would be taken to collect the tax by distress or suit, and that the company would be precluded from doing business in the state. The plaintiff then paid the tax to the state under protest, and subsequently sued to recover it back. It was claimed that the payment was voluntary. The court said: 'Again it is said that the money was paid voluntarily and cannot be recovered back. The petition recites, in substance, that plaintiff had large property interests in the state, which it was in duty bound to preserve and protect, and that the letter from the auditor of the state made it impossible for plaintiff to continue its business or protect its property without paying the tax. At the time of the payment plaintiff filed with both the treasurer and the auditor a written protest, in which it claimed that the tax was unconstitutional and invalid, and that by so paying it did not acknowledge its liability to pay the tax or waive any of its rights to contest the same. Plaintiff was bound to submit to the exaction or discontinue its business. Under such a state of facts, it is clear that plaintiff's act was not voluntary, and that it may recover back the amount paid, provided it has established its claim that the act in question was unconstitutional. Swift Co. v. United States, 111 U. S. 23 [4 Sup. Ct. 244, 28 L. Ed. 341]; Cunningham v. Munroe, 15 Gray, 471; Carew v. Rutherford, 106 Mass. 1, 8 Am. Rep. 287; Beckwith v. Frisbie, 32 Vt. 559; Shelton v. Platt, 139 U. S. 594 [11 Sup. Ct. 646, 35 L. Ed. 273]; and cases cited in State v. Nelson, 41 Minn. 25 [42 N. W. 548, 4 L. R. A. 300].'

"We refer to and quote from these cases because of their practical identity with the case at bar. Cases other than those cited, supporting the proposition that payment made under similar conditions to those here are involuntary and may be recovered back, are Swift v. United States, 111 U. S. 29, 4 Sup. Ct. 244, 28 L. Ed. 341, Western Union, etc., Co. v. Mayer, 28 Ohio St. 521, and our own cases of Lewis v. San Francisco, 2 Cal. App. 112, 82 Pac. 1106, and Trower v. San Francisco, 152 Cal. 479, 92 Pac. 1025, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 183.

[4] "It is next insisted by appellant that insurance companies are not exempt under the constitutional provision relied on by respondent from the payment of the corporation license tax exacted by the act. Appellant insists that it is matter of grave doubt whether the constitutional provision was intended to have this effect, and hence the rule of strict construction against the exemption of property from taxes should be applied; that the provision contains no express exemption respecting a 'license tax' or 'corporation license tax,' and that these terms should not be read into it. Along the same line it is insisted that as the only exemption proceeding from the payment of the percentage tax provided by the constitutional amendments is from 'all other taxes and licenses * * * upon the property of such companies,' etc., and as there is no such thing as a 'license upon the property,' the word 'license' as used in the provision is to be construed as intended to mean the same thing as 'taxes'; that as the tax in question in this case is neither 'a tax on property' nor a 'license on property,' but is purely a corporation license tax on the intangible privilege or right of insurance companies to do business in the state, it is not embraced within the terms of the exemption in the constitutional provision.

"These are the only points made by appellant against the exemption of such companies from the payment of the state license tax by virtue of the terms of the constitutional provision.

"An extended discussion of these points is rendered unnecessary by the decision of this court in City and County of San Francisco v. Pacific Telephone & Telegraph Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 Pac. 971, rendered since the appeal in this case was submitted. That action was brought to recover a license fee or tax imposed by an ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco enacted prior to the adoption of section 14 of article 13 of the Constitution. The claim of defendant was that under such constitutional provision it was exempted from liability for such license charge. The trial court so held, and that ruling was sustained here upon a full consideration of the subject.

"In applying the reasoning of the court in that case to the contention of appellants in this, it is to be observed that though in the case referred to, a license tax imposed on a telephone company under a municipal ordinance was involved, and here an act of the Legislature imposing a state license tax on insurance companies is under consideration, the same constitutional provision applies to both these classes of corporatons. Both telephone and insurance companies are enumerated as among the persons and corporations to be taxed. By the constitutional provision 'a tax upon all franchises of any kind or nature shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes and shall be assessed and collected in the manner hereinafter provided.' The manner provided is that taxes in the case of telephone corporations (and other corporations enumerated) shall be a specific percentage upon the gross receipts; in the case of insurance companies (both domestic and foreign) a specific percentage of gross premiums. As to each it was declared that the taxes so imposed were 'in lieu of all other taxes, state, county and municipal, upon the property of the corporations,' subject to certain specified exceptions which are not involved here.

"In the case cited the court stated the claims of the respective parties on the appeal; that of the appellant being 'that the constitutional provision relieves the companies named [telephone companies] from no burden except that of taxes upon the property theretofore enumerated, and that the charge imposed by the ordinance is a business or occupation tax, and not a tax upon property at all, and therefore not covered by the so-called exemption.' This is the identical point made by appellants here under their claim that, the exemption being from 'taxes' and 'licenses upon the property of the company,' the word 'licenses' should, under the rule of strict construction of provisions under which exemption from taxes is claimed, be given the same meaning as taxes.

"Defining the position of respondent in the cited case, the court said 'The respondent, on the other hand, claims that under a fair reading of the constitutional amendment the liability of a telephone company to pay a percentage of its gross receipts was designed to exclude the power of the state or any county or municipality to exact from it any further revenue, * * * whether by way of a direct tax upon its property, or in the guise of a license fee upon its business.' This is the position of the present respondent. Hence the claims of the respective parties here as to the construction to be given the constitutional provision are the same as with those made by the respective parties here. In disposing of the contention of the appellant in the cited case this court, after discussing the point made as to the rule of strict construction to be applied to provisions exempting from taxation and holding that the constitutional provision was to be interpreted upon a full consideration of all its terms, said: 'Giving, then, a fair and reasonable interpretation to the constitutional provision, we think the charge imposed by the ordinance of the city and county was within the class of taxes and licenses from the imposition of which the respondent was relieved by the amendment. It is true that a license tax upon an occupation or business is not a tax upon property, even though, by constitutional or statutory definition, franchises are included in the meaning of the word "property." This is clearly decided in City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Independent Gas Co., 152 Cal. 765, 93 Pac. 1006. If the amendment did no more than to declare that the percentage required to be paid by telephone companies should be in lieu of all other taxes upon the property of such companies, it would seem to be a necessary conclusion that the power to impose an occupation tax was not excluded. But there are other words in the provision, and all of the language must, under familiar principles of construction, be considered and given its fair meaning and effect. The percentage imposed is declared to be in lieu, not merely of other taxes, but "of all other taxes and licenses * * * upon the property." The word "license" properly speaking, means a grant of permission or authority to do a particular thing or carry on a particular business. City of Sonora v. Curtin, 137 Cal. 583, 70 Pac. 674; Words and Phrases, page 4137. In the clause under discussion, the term is evidently used to designate the fee or charge imposed upon the exercise of the right. While such fee or charge is often spoken of as a tax, it is not in any sense a tax upon property. See City of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Independent Gas Co., supra. In order to construe the clause as relieving from taxes or charges upon property alone, we should therefore be required to deny meaning and significance to the word "license." The right of the telephone company to carry on the business of supplying telephone service is a franchise. Franchises are included in the enumeration of classes of property which, by the terms of the amendment, are to be taxed for state purposes only. * * * Every word in the clause under discussion can be given a reasonable and legitimate effect by reading the term "licenses" as including revenue charges of any character upon the exercise of the franchises which are declared to be taxable for state purposes only. In this way, the phrase "upon the property above enumerated" is made fully effective as qualifying both "taxes" and "licenses" preceding it, while no word is either ignored or distorted from its fair meaning.'

"We do not think in view of this decision just quoted, that further discussion on this branch of this appeal is necessary. The right of insurance companies, whether domestic or foreign, to do an insurance business in this state is a franchise, is property of the company engaged in it, and it is upon this franchise that under the provisions of the constitutional amendment the tax therein provided for is levied. The state license tax imposed under the act as it stood when the constitutional amendment was adopted and under which the license tax here in question was exacted, is a tax for revenue imposed—so far as insurance companies are concerned—on their franchise right to do business in the state. But as this franchise is taxed under the constitutional amendment and the tax thereby levied is declared to be in lieu of 'all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal upon the property of such companies,' the effect of the amendment was to supersede the prior state license tax act so far as it applied to insurance companies and to exempt them from the provisions thereof as to the payment of the license tax thereunder."

The judgment appealed from is therefore reversed.

(Supreme Court of California. July 29, 1914.)

1. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 70*)—SUBJECT-MATTER OF TRADE-MARK.

While under Civ. Code, § 991, a designation which relates only to the place where the thing is produced cannot be appropriated as a trademark, defendants who fraudulently attempted, by the use of a geographical name which plaintiffs had used to designate their products, to palm off their goods as plaintiffs', will be enjoined.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, Cent. Dig. § 81; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 100*)—USE OF NAME—DECREE—CONSTRUCTIONS.

Where plaintiff used the name of the town in which it manufactured butter to designate its product, and defendants fraudulently marked their product with the same name, a judgment, declaring that, as against defendants, plaintiff had the exclusive right to use the town name as it appeared on its butter wrapper, and enjoining defendants from using the town name so as to deceive the buying public into the belief that their product was plaintiff's, is not an adjudication that plaintiff had the exclusive right to use the name of the town in connection with its product, but only adjudges that plaintiff has a superior right to the use of the name as it appears on its wrappers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trade-Marks and Trade-Names, Cent. Dig. § 114; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 93*)—ACTIONS TO ENJOIN—EVIDENCE.

In a suit to enjoin defendants from using a wrapper for their goods similar to that used by plaintiff, evidence held to show that defendant used the wrapper for the purpose of deceiving the public.

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1073*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

In a suit to enjoin defendants from using a label for their goods which they had adopted to deceive the buying public into believing they were those of plaintiff, the error in enjoining defendant from using a wrapper which had been abandoned before the commencement of the action was harmless, if erroneous, where the use of such wrapper would deceive the buying public.

5. TRADE-MARKS AND TRADE-NAMES (§ 98*)—UNFAIR COMPETITION—DAMAGES—RIGHT TO.

Where defendants by means of a fraudulent label deceived the buying public into the belief that their goods were those of plaintiff, plaintiff can recover as damages profits made by reason of defendants' unauthorized use of the label, even though plaintiff suffered no actual loss.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by the Modesto Creamery against the Stanislaus Creamery Company and another. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Jordan, Rowe & Brann, H. K. McKevitt, and L. J. Maddux, all of San Francisco, for appellants. J. W. Dorsey and W. E. Cashman, both of San Francisco, and L. L. Dennett and J. M. Walthall, both of Modesto, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. The defendants appeal from the judgment and from an order denying their motion for a new trial.

The action was brought to enjoin the defendants from selling butter marked with labels alleged to have been designed in imitation of plaintiff's label, and to recover damages for profits diverted from plaintiff or made by sales by defendants of butter so labeled.

The findings, which are responsive to the issues made by the pleadings are, in effect, as follows: Plaintiff is a corporation which, since the year 1900, has been manufacturing butter at the city of Modesto, and selling such butter at Modesto and elsewhere in the state of California. In the conduct of its business it has adopted and used as a symbol and name a device (shown on a wrapper attached to the complaint and marked "Exhibit A") consisting of the word "Modesto" in large script, with a scroll or flourish thereunder, the word "creamery" appearing in said scroll. The words "churned daily at Modesto, Cal." also appear upon the wrapper. Butter of plaintiff's manufacture, so wrapped and marked, acquired a valuable reputation, and is known by purchasers and the public as "Modesto Creamery Butter" or "Modesto Butter," the word "Modesto" having acquired "a special significance and secondary meaning apart from its geographical sense," and being taken to signify the origin, manufacture, and qualities of plaintiff's butter. The defendant Sherry-Freitas Company is engaged in the business of buying and selling butter. In April, 1910, said defendant, with the intent to deceive persons intending to buy plaintiff's butter, and to divert trade from plaintiff to itself by palming off its goods for those of plaintiff, offered its butter for sale under a wrapper, a copy of which is designated "Exhibit B." This wrapper contained the word "Modesto" in large type, and under it the word "brand" in smaller letters. By so doing defendant has endeavored to cause it to be believed, and has caused it to be believed, by the public that its butter was made in the city of Modesto, which was not the fact. The use of said wrapper misled and deceived customers into buying defendant's butter in the belief that it was plaintiff's product. Said butter was sold at a price less than that at which plaintiff's butter was offered to the public.

The defendant continued the sale of butter under the label or wrapper designated "Exhibit B" until about September 1, 1910, when it began to sell and offer for sale, and has since continued to sell, butter under a label or wrapper designated as "Exhibit C." This wrapper bore the word "Modesto" in script type similar to that appearing on "Exhibit A." The butter so wrapped has been made by the defendant Stanislaus Creamery Company at the city of Modesto. The findings relative to the purpose with which "Exhibit C" was used, and the effect upon the public and upon plaintiff's trade of the use of such wrapper, are, except with respect to the place of manufacture, similar to the findings, above outlined, in connection with "Exhibit B." It is further found that the defendant Stanislaus Creamery Company was organized by the officers and directors of the other defendant, Sherry-Freitas Company, with the object of having said Stanislaus Creamery Company assist its codefendant in the latter's wrongful acts. The court also finds that the defendants will, unless restrained, continue the unfair competition complained of.

The judgment declares that plaintiff is the owner of and has the exclusive right, as against the defendants and each of them, to use the word "Modesto" in the manner in which it appears on its butter wrapper. It adjudges that defendants be enjoined from using, in connection with the manufacture, advertisement, or sale of butter, the wrapper, labels, or brands shown on Exhibit A, Exhibit B, or other representation containing the word "Modesto" as its prominent feature "in a manner calculated to deceive the trade or public into purchasing the product of defendants, or either of them, as and for the product of plaintiff," from offering for sale or selling any butter under wrappers, labels or representations in imitation or likeness of any of said exhibits, which will be calculated to mislead the public into buying said product as and for the product of the plaintiff, and from advertising, representing, labeling, or wrapping butter in such manner as to cause it to be palmed off, sold or mistaken for plaintiff's product. Finally, it is determined that plaintiff is entitled to an accounting of the profits diverted from plaintiff or made by defendants, or either of them, by the sale of butter under Exhibit B or Exhibit C, and the court reserves power to take such accounting before itself or a referee.

[1, 2] The relief granted by the decree does not rest upon any ownership by plaintiff of the exclusive right to the use of the word "Modesto" as a trade-mark. A "designation which relates only to the * * * place where the thing is produced" cannot be appropriated as a trade-mark. Civ. Code, § 991. The suit is one to restrain unfair competition. The principles involved have been declared in numerous decisions, not a few of which have been rendered by this court. In Banzhaf v. Chase, 150 Cal. 180, 88 Pac. 704, they are stated in the following language which, with the substitution of the word "butter" for "bread" (the article which occasioned the controversy in the Banzhaf Case), is entirely appropriate to the case at bar:

> "The case of the plaintiffs * * * is based on fraud. It rests on the right of the plaintiffs to restrain the conduct of the defendant whereby he, in order to injure the plaintiffs and benefit himself, simulates the plaintiffs' goods, deceives the plaintiffs' patrons into the belief that his bread is that made by the plaintiffs, and thereby induces them to buy his own bread instead of the plaintiffs', thus by fraud and deception depriving the plaintiffs of the profits of such sales and appropriating the same to his own use. The right to prevent such an injury by injunction does not depend on the ownership by the plaintiffs of any particular word, phrase, or device, as a trade-mark. * * * The right of action in such a case arises from the fraudulent purpose and conduct of the defendant and the injury caused to the plaintiffs thereby, and it exists independently of the law regulating trade-marks or of the ownership of such trademark by the plaintiffs. The gist of such an action is not the appropriation and use of another's trade-mark, but the fraudulent injury to, and appropriation of, another's trade."

See, also, Weinstock, Lubin & Co. v. Marks, 109 Cal. 529, 42 Pac. 142, 30 L. R. A. 182, 50 Am. St. Rep. 57; Dodge, S. Co. v. Dodge, 145 Cal. 380, 78 Pac. 879.

The judgment does not assume to protect plaintiff in the exclusive use of the word "Modesto." All it does is to declare that the plaintiff has a right superior to that of defendants to use such word in the manner in which it appears on its wrappers. It enjoins the defendant from using the wrappers designated "Exhibit B" and "Exhibit C," or from using any wrapper containing the word "Modesto" in a manner calculated to deceive the public into purchasing defendants' product as and for that of plaintiffs. The other parts of the injunction are directed against other practices tending to thus deceive the public and thereby injure the plaintiff.

[3] So far as the particular labels, Exhibit B and Exhibit C, are concerned, the evidence fully justifies the findings that these wrappers were adopted with the purpose of deceiving the public as above stated, and that they accomplished this purpose. This is virtually conceded by appellants with respect to Exhibit B, which was applied to butter not in fact manufactured at Modesto.

The word "Modesto" is the most prominent feature of Exhibit C, as it is of Exhibit A. The type in which the word is printed is so similar on the two labels that this circumstance, in connection with the other facts shown amply warranted the conclusion that the use of Exhibit C was intended to have, and did have, the effect of misleading the public into the belief that the butter so marked was that manufactured and sold by plaintiff.

The argument that plaintiff cannot enjoin the use of the word "Modesto" unless such word has acquired a secondary meaning apart from its geographical sense—unless, that is to say, it has come to mean the goods of plaintiff rather than the place of their manufacture—is therefore beside the mark. The use of the name "Modesto" is not enjoined. All that is enjoined is the use of such name in a manner calculated to deceive purchasers into mistaking defendants' product for that of plaintiff. It is true that there is a finding that the word "Modesto," as applied to butter, has acquired the secondary meaning spoken of. This finding would have been necessary to support a decree recognizing plaintiff's exclusive right to the use of the word in its secondary sense. 38 Cyc. 770. But it is not material as a basis for the limited decree that was here made.

[4] It is urged that the use of Exhibit B should not have been enjoined, because the evidence showed that there had been no use of this wrapper for several months preceding the commencement of the action, and there was no proof that defendants intended to use it in the future. But, even if this part of the injunction were eliminated, the general restraint against the use of any wrapper calculated to deceive the public would still operate to prevent the use of Exhibit B. If there was any error in extending the injunction so as to cover this wrapper specifically, the error was technical merely, and without prejudice.

[5] Finally, the claim is made that the court erred in decreeing that plaintiff should have an accounting of the profits made by defendant through sales of butter under wrappers having the mark of Exhibit B or Exhibit C. So far as Exhibit B is concerned, it is contended that plaintiff suffered no damage, having sold its entire output, without diminution in price, during the period in which Exhibit B was used. But the decree does not order an accounting of damages as such. The accounting is to be directed to "profits diverted from the plaintiff, or made by the sale of any butter sold by the defendants or either of them under wrappers bearing the label and brand of Exhibit B and Exhibit C attached to the complaint." We think this provision should be construed as covering simply the profits made by the defendants through the use of these wrappers. In contemplation of law, such profits are diverted from plaintiff, being obtained through the improper invasion of plaintiff's trade rights. Entirely apart from the question of actual damage, the owner of a trade-mark is entitled to recover from an infringer the profits realized by the latter from sales under the simulated trade-mark. Graham v. Plate, 40 Cal. 593, 6 Am. Rep. 639. The same rule applies to cases of unfair competition, in which, while there is no violation of an exclusive right in a technical trade-mark, the defendant has used devices calculated to pass off his goods as those of plaintiff. 38 Cyc. 909; Regis v. Jaynes, 191 Mass. 245, 77 N. E. 774; Saxlehner v. Eisner, etc., Co., 138 Fed. 22, 70 C. C. A. 452.

The objection to an accounting with respect to Exhibit C is based on the contention that the use of this brand was not an invasion of plaintiff's rights. This contention is answered by what we have said in an earlier part of this opinion.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

HARBAUGH v. LASSEN IRR. CO.

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 13, 1914.)

1. Exceptions, Bill of (§ 50*)—Settlement —Delivery to Judge—"Presentation."

Code Civ. Proc. § 650, provides that a party desiring a bill of exceptions after trial may prepare a draft of the bill and serve the same on the adverse party, who within ten days shall propose amendments and serve the same on the applicant for the bill, and the proposed bill and amendments must, within ten days thereafter, "be presented by the party seeking the settlement of the bill" to the judge who tried or heard the case, on five days' notice, or if no amendments are served, or, if served, are allowed, the proposed bill may be presented with the amendments, if any, for settlement without notice to the adverse party, and that when the bill is so received by the judge for settlement he must designate a time at which he will settle the bill. Held, that mere delivery of a proposed bill to the judge pending the time allowed by law or by stipulation within which amendments might be proposed and before the same had been proposed, without an agreement that the bill might be so presented, did not constitute a "presentation" of the bill to the judge for settlement, he having no power under such circumstances to fix or designate a day for settlement or to settle it.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 787*)—Dismissal of Appeal—Supreme Court Rules.

Supreme Court rule 2 (119 Pac. ix) provides that appellant, within 40 days after appeal, shall serve and file the transcript of the record, duly certified to be correct by the attorneys of the respective parties or by the clerk of the court from which the appeal is taken, but if a proceeding is pending for the settlement of a bill of exceptions or statement which may be used in support of the appeal, the time shall not begin to run until the settled and authenticated statement or bill of exceptions has been filed. A proposed bill of exceptions was delivered to the judge April 7, 1908, but on May 22d 30 days' additional time was allowed respondent, by stipulation, in which to file amendments. No further proceedings were taken, however, for over five years, though appellant's attorney on several occasions wrote letters requesting respondent's attorney to present his amendments and proceed with the settlement of the bill. Held that, even though the proposed bill was presented to the judge for settlement on April 7, 1908, such presentation was in effect withdrawn or waived by the extension of time to file amendments, and, more than six months having expired, which was the limit prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 473, within which appellant might obtain relief from default in presenting its bill of exceptions within the time required, there was no proceeding pending for the settlement of the bill, and respondent was entitled to a dismissal of the appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; F. A. Kelley, Judge.

Action by L. A. Harbaugh against the Lassen Irrigation Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Granted.

W. F. Williamson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Martin S. Vilas, of Burlington, Vt., for respondent.

HART, J. This is a motion by the respondent to dismiss the appeal taken herein from the judgment entered in his favor and against the appellant by the superior court of Lassen county for the sum of $500 and costs.

An opinion in which it was held that the motion ought to be granted was filed in this court on April 23, 1914, and judgment entered in this court accordingly on said day. Prior to and at the time of the filing of said opinion, there was no counter showing of any character by the appellant, and consequently the facts set forth in the affidavits filed by the respondent and upon which he rested his motion to dismiss the appeal stood uncontradicted. But within a brief time after the filing of said opinion, to wit, on the 25th day of April, 1914, a written stipulation, signed by the attorney for the respondent, was filed in this court, and therein it was stipulated that the attorney for the appellant might have to and including the 4th day of May, 1914, within which to file its brief upon the respondent's motion to dismiss the appeal. At the same time, appellant filed with the record here a number of affidavits in rebuttal of the facts alleged in the affidavits upon which the respondent based said motion. In view of the stipulation of counsel for the respondent, extending the time within which the appellant might file its brief and of the filing of the counter affidavits by the appellant, and preferring to decide the motion upon a record fully disclosing the history of the controversy from the viewpoints of both parties thereto, an order was made by this court, on the said 25th day of April, 1914, setting aside the former judgment herein, thereby reopening the proceeding for further consideration. The motion to dismiss the appeal is consequently now before us upon the record made up since the filing of the first opinion.

The grounds of the motion, as set forth in the notice thereof, are: (1) That the notice of appeal was not served on the plaintiff or his attorney; (2) that the appellant has failed to prosecute said appeal with diligence, and has not filed a transcript of the record on appeal within the time limited by rule 2 of the rules of this and the supreme courts.

The facts as revealed by the affidavits and certificate of the clerk of the superior court in and for the county of Lassen, filed by the respondent in support of the motion, are: On the 16th day of October, 1907, the said superior court of Lassen county "made and entered its judgment in the above-entitled action wherein L. A. Harbaugh is plaintiff and Lassen Irrigation Company, a corporation, is defendant, in favor of the said plaintiff, and against the said defendant, for the sum of $500, and plaintiff's costs incurred in said action taxed at $86.95, and that on the said 16th day of October, 1907, the said judgment was duly filed and entered therein and recorded in Book D of Judgments, at page 305;" that on the 21st day of October, 1907, W. F. Williamson, Esq., attorney of record for the said defendant, filed in said court a notice of appeal to the District Court of Appeal for the Third Appellate District from said judgment and the whole thereof; that the said original notice of appeal contains no written acknowledgment of service or other evidence of service of the same upon the plaintiff or his attorney, "and that no evidence of service of said notice of appeal upon the plaintiff or his attorney has been filed in said action"; that on the 21st day of October, 1907, an undertaking on appeal, in due form, was filed in said court and cause; that on the 21st day of October, 1907, there was filed in said court and cause an order by the judge of said court granting the defendant in the said cause 20 days' time in addition to the time allowed by law, "and the 30 days theretofore allowed by the plaintiff to said defendant, within which to prepare, serve, and file its proposed bill of exceptions in said cause"; that thereafter (December 16, 1907, and February 6, 1908) the court made two other orders, whereby the time within which the defendant might prepare, serve, and file its proposed bill of exceptions was further extended. The clerk of the court declares, in his certificate filed here, that:

> "No bill of exceptions, statement on motion for a new trial, or other bill or statement has at any time been presented to me as clerk of said court for the judge of said court, or other purpose or reason; that the appellant in said action has not at any time requested the clerk of said court to certify to a correct transcript, or any transcript, of the record on appeal in said action; nor is there any record in my office that any bill of exceptions, statement on motion for a new trial, or other bill or statement, has been presented to said court for settlement, nor that any bill of exceptions has ever been settled or allowed by this court."

The affidavits of W. F. Williamson and W. W. Sanderson, attorneys for the appellant, and William E. Miles, secretary of the defendant, declare that said bill of exceptions was presented for settlement to the judge who tried the case on the 8th day of April, 1908; that the matter of the settlement of the said bill was then taken up on the 20th day of May, 1908, and then postponed to the 22d day of May, 1908; that, on the last-named date, said Sanderson, who personally conducted said proceeding on behalf of appellant, "again presented the bill of exceptions to the judge for settlement, and some question having then arisen as to the manner in which certain exhibits should be incorporated into said bill, the court ordered that N. J. Barry, Esq., the attorney for the plaintiff and respondent in this cause, should be allowed to take with him the original bill of exceptions and the transcript of testimony and certain exhibits and papers in the said action to his office in Reno, in the state of Nevada, and examine the same there and report what portions of said exhibits he desired inserted in the said bill of exceptions." Sanderson proceeded to depose that, at the same time, said Barry stipulated that the said bill of exceptions had been served in the time provided by law, and asked and was granted a stipulation allowing him 30 days from said 22d day of May, 1908, within which to prepare certain amendments to said bill of exceptions.

The affidavit of N. J. Barry admits that the bill of exceptions in this cause was served upon him on the 29th day of January, 1908, but denies that said Barry "took the bill of exceptions from the records of Lassen county" at any time, or that he ever had such original bill of exceptions, or that he ever took the exhibits or any of them referred to in the affidavits filed by the appellant.

There is, as will be seen, a direct conflict arising in the affidavits upon the question whether Barry at any time took the bill of exceptions to his office, in Reno, Nev., but we think it is immaterial, so far as the decision of this motion is concerned, whether he did or did not.

Rule 2 of the Supreme Court (119 Pac. ix) provides that the appellant in a civil action shall, within 40 days after an appeal is perfected, serve and file the transcript of the record duly certified to be correct by the attorneys of the respective parties, or by the clerk of the court from which the appeal is taken.

> "If a proceeding is pending for the settlement of a bill of exceptions or statement which may be used in support of such appeal, the time aforesaid shall not begin to run until the settled and authenticated statement or bill of exceptions has been filed."

The appellant here contends that, during all the years since it proposed and served upon the respondent its bill of exceptions in this action, there has been and is still now pending a proceeding for the settlement of the said bill of exceptions, which is to be used in support of its appeal herein. It cannot, in our opinion, from the facts stated in the affidavits filed herein by the appellant in resistance to this motion, be held that a proceeding for the settlement of the bill of exceptions in this action is still pending or was pending at the time of the institution of proceedings on this motion.

[1] Section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides:

> "When a party desires to have exceptions taken at a trial settled in a bill of exceptions, he may, at any time thereafter, and within ten days after the entry of judgment, if the action was tried with a jury, or after receiving notice of the entry of judgment, if the action was tried without a jury, or such further time as the court in which the action is pending, or a judge thereof, may allow, prepare the draft of a bill, and serve the same, or a copy thereof, upon the adverse party. * * * Within ten days after such service the adverse party may propose amendments thereto, and serve the same, or a copy thereof, upon the other party. The proposed bill and amendments must, within ten days thereafter, be presented by the party seeking the settlement of the bill, to the judge who tried or heard the case, upon five days' notice to the adverse party, or be delivered to the clerk for the judge."

Or, where (so proceeds the same section), no amendments are served, or if served, are allowed, the proposed bill may be presented, with the amendments, if any, to the judge or referee, for settlement without notice to the adverse party. Said section further provides that when the bill is received by the judge for settlement, he must designate the time at which he will settle the bill, "and the clerk must immediately notify the parties of such designation. At the time designated, the judge must settle the bill."

It will be observed that, before the judge can, or, indeed, has the right to designate a time or take any other legal steps looking to the settlement of the bill, the same must first have been presented to him for that purpose. The mere delivery of the bill to the judge pending the time allowed by law or by the stipulation of the parties within which amendments might be proposed and before the same had been proposed, there being no agreement by the parties that the bill might be so presented, would not be a presenting of the bill to the judge for settlement, for in such case the judge would have no legal right to fix or designate a day for its settlement or to settle it. It will be further observed that said section makes it necessary for the party seeking the settlement of the bill of exceptions—in other words, the party taking the appeal and desiring and intending to use such bill in support of his appeal—to present the bill, with any amendments proposed thereto, to the judge who tried the case, or to the clerk for the judge, for settlement. Or, where no amendments are served, it is likewise the duty of such party to present such bill for settlement, as provided.

> "Compliance with this requirement is essential to the right of a party to have his bill of exceptions settled, and, if he fails to so comply, his right is gone, unless he be relieved from the effect of such failure by the trial court, under the provisions of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, on account of 'mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect.'" Moultrie v. Tarpio, 147 Cal. 376, 81 Pac. 1112.

Although, as seen, it appears from the affidavit of W. F. Williamson that the bill of exceptions was presented for settlement to Hon. F. A. Kelley, then judge of the superior court of Lassen county, on or about the 7th day of April, 1908, it further appears, as we have shown, from the affidavit of W. W. Sanderson, who was then associated with said Williamson in the practice of law, that on the 22d day of May, 1908, he (Sanderson) being in attendance on the session of the superior court of Lassen county before Hon. F. A. Kelley, then judge of said superior court, both in the matter of the settlement of said bill of exceptions and concerning other matters and trials set for said day, presented said bill of exceptions for settlement, "and, some question having been raised as to the manner in which certain exhibits should be incorporated into said bill of exceptions, the court ordered that N. J. Barry, Esq., the attorney for the plaintiff and respondent in this cause, should be allowed to take with him the original bill of exceptions and the transcript of the testimony and certain exhibits and papers in the said action, to his office in Reno, and examine the same there and report what portions of said exhibits he desired inserted in the said bill of exceptions. Said Barry at the same time * * * asked and was granted a stipulation allowing him 30 days from said 22d day of May, 1908, within which to prepare certain amendments to said bill of exceptions; that said stipulations were entered into, and the said order made in the court room of said superior court of Lassen county, in the city of Susanville, on the 22d day of May, 1908. Affiant thereupon returned to San Francisco, reported said action and proceedings to said W. F. Williamson, and has no further knowledge and taken no further action in the said matter since said date."

[2] It will thus be seen that, even though it be true that the bill was by the appellant presented to the judge for settlement on the 7th day of April, 1908, such presentation was in effect withdrawn or waived and ceased to operate when, on the 22d day of May, 30 days' additional time from said date within which he might propose amendments to said bill was allowed the respondent by the agreement and stipulation of the appellant. The effect of said stipulation was the same as if the bill had never, as a matter of fact, been presented for settlement as provided by section 650 of the Code of Civil Procedure. It follows, as before stated, that, at the time this motion was filed, there was no proceeding pending for the settlement of the bill of exceptions. And it is obvious that the time within which the appellant might, under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure (viz., six months) have obtained relief from the effect of its default in the matter of presenting its bill for settlement within the time provided by the statute has long since passed. Indeed, over five years have elapsed since the expiration of the time within which the appellant might have sought relief from the effect of its default under said section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure.

As is said in Moultrie v. Tarpio, supra, so the facts as admitted by the appellant warrant us in saying is true here:

> "The rule of this court quoted above [rule 2] contemplates a proceeding for a settlement that is alive, at least to the extent that it is being in some degree pressed by the appellant. Ordinarily this court would not undertake to determine, on a motion to dismiss an appeal, whether or not a party had so failed to comply with the requirements of the law in regard to the settlement of a bill of exceptions that his pending proceeding for such settlement must ultimately fail, but would leave that question to be determined by the trial judge, subject to a review on appeal. But where, as here, the facts are not in dispute, and it is apparent that no bill can ever be settled, and that the appellant has long since practically abandoned his proceeding for the settlement of any such bill, we are satisfied that it should not be held that there is a 'proceeding pending for a settlement of a bill of exceptions,' within the meaning of the rule."

In this case, even if it be true that counsel for the respondent took possession of the original bill of exceptions as proposed by the appellant, and wrongfully kept the custody thereof for an unreasonable time, still it was the duty of the appellant, as the actor in the proceeding looking to the preparation of his appeal, to move promptly and diligently in the matter and take such steps as might have been necessary for the preservation of the integrity of the proceeding inaugurated by it for the proper settlement and authentication of its record on appeal. No such steps seem to have been taken, unless it may be said that certain letters addressed to the respondent's attorney by the attorney for the appellant, requesting him to proceed to present any amendments he desired to propose to the bill, may be treated as such, but, obviously, under the circumstances disclosed here, the burden was upon the appellant, as the actor in the proceeding, to go further than merely to appeal to the adverse party to hasten the settlement of the bill.

Under the circumstances above stated, no other course is open to us but to dismiss the appeal. As has been shown herein, the appellant, in practical effect, over five years ago abandoned the proceedings essential to the prosecution of its appeal by failure to pursue the legal steps necessary to the preparation and the filing in this court of the record essential to a hearing thereon.

> "There can be no doubt of the inherent right of this court to dismiss an appeal under such circumstances." Moultrie v. Tarpio, supra.

In view of the conclusion thus arrived at, it is not necessary to notice the first point suggested above and urged by the respondent in support of the motion, viz., that the notice of appeal was not served upon him.

The motion to dismiss the appeal herein is granted.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

KOSKELA v. ALBION LUMBER CO. et al. (Civ. 1229.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 23, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 22, 1914.)

1. Shipping (§ 84*)—Death of Servant—Course of Employment.

Decedent, a sawmill employé, was loaned to perform the work of a longshoreman for the charterers of a vessel which was loading at the mill. As evening approached he was told by the captain to go ashore for his supper and return, as they intended to continue loading during the evening. Lumber was transported from the wharf to the vessel by means of a traveling chute arrangement on which the workmen rode between the ship and the wharf. When deceased returned from his supper and the cable was ready for use, the lumber company's foreman told deceased and his companion to "hurry up and get on that traveler"; they did so, and while being transported to the ship, the chute broke, precipitating decedent into the ocean, where he was drowned. Held, that decedent's contract of service included transportation to and from the wharf by means of the chute, and that he was therefore in the course of his employment when he was killed.

2. Shipping (§ 86*)—Death of Servant—Negligence—Res Ipsa Loquitur.

The breaking of a chute precipitating deceased into the ocean, in the absence of evidence to show the exact cause thereof, was sufficient to raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the defendants under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur.

3. Shipping (§ 84*)—Death of Servant—Defective Appliances—Joint Liability.

A ship chartered by S. & H. being about to take on a cargo of lumber at the A. Company's mill, a wire traveling chute, designed to carry lumber from the wharf to the vessel, was rigged, part of the appliances connected therewith being owned by the lumber company and part by the shipowners. All the parts, however, constituted a single appliance intended to transport the lumber, and were necessary to each other. The charterers being short of stevedores, decedent, an employé of the mill company was loaned to them to do stevedore work aboard the vessel, and while riding from the wharf to the vessel on the carrier, it gave way, precipitating him into the ocean and he was drowned. Held, that both the charterers and the lumber company were liable under the doctrine of res ipsa loquitur, in the absence of evidence that the accident was caused by the sole fault of one of them.

4. Trial (§ 343*) — General Verdict — Effect.

A general verdict imports a finding in favor of plaintiff on all the averments of the complaint material to his recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 809–812; Dec. Dig. § 343.*]

5. Trial (§ 359*)—General Verdict—Presumptions—Special Verdict.

All presumptions are in favor of a general verdict for plaintiff, and it must control if the special verdict is not absolutely irreconcilable therewith, while answers to interrogatories cannot be aided by intendment, but must be limited and controlled by their specific terms.

6. New Trial (§ 102*)—Newly Discovered Evidence.

Where deceased was killed by the breaking of a traveler chute by which lumber was conveyed from a wharf to a vessel and defendants had knowledge of the fact that the mate, who was present at the time and assisted in putting up and operating the appliance, would be a valuable witness for them, and also that his presence could be obtained, but made no application for a postponement in order that he might be present, it was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to deny a motion for new trial for the alleged newly discovered evidence of the mate which in fact was but cumulative of that of the captain of the vessel, though in greater detail.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by Maria Sophia Koskela, as administratrix of the estate of Matt Gabriel Koskela, against the Albion Lumber Company and Swayne & Hoyt. From a judgment for plaintiff and from orders denying a motion to set it aside and enter judgment for defendants, and denying defendants' motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for appellants. M. H. Iverson and Preston & Preston, all of Ukiah, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Action for damages resulting from alleged negligence of defendants through which plaintiff's intestate lost his life.

General and special demurrers to the amended complaint were overruled, and defendants answered, denying the material averments of the complaint alleging negligence, and pleaded in defense unavoidable accident; that defendants had no knowledge of any defects in the appliances which it is alleged had been carefully inspected prior to their use, and that the "accident was a casualty which no act of the defendants could have foreseen or prevented, and was caused through the breaking of a metal device of the loading apparatus, through a latent, unknown, undiscoverable defect in the metal thereof." The jury rendered a general verdict and also a special verdict, as follows:

"I. Did the wire cable give way by reason of any defect in it? Answer: Don't know.

"II. If so, what defect? Answer: Don't know.

"III. Did the wire cable give way by reason of any defect in the machinery or appliances by which it was supported? Answer: Yes.

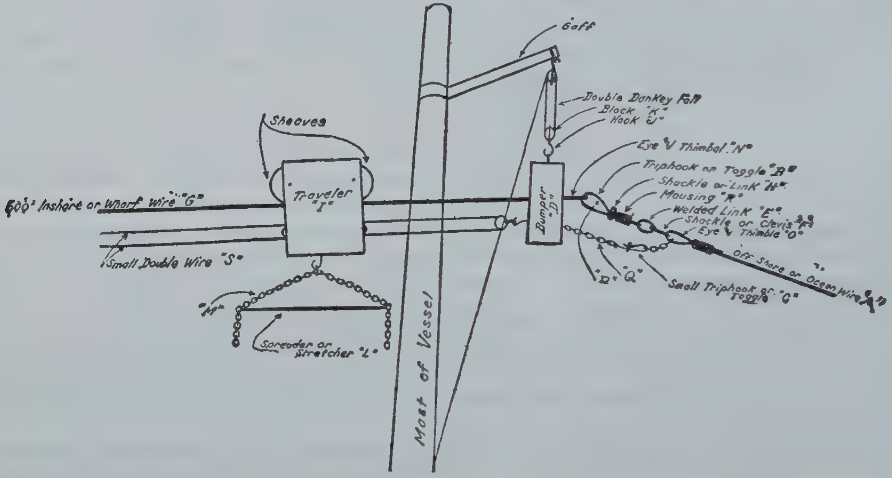
"IV. If so, what defect? Answer: Don't know.

"V. Did the wire cable give way by reason of the careless or negligent manner in which the machinery or appliances supporting it were adjusted? Answer: Yes.

"VI. If so, in what way were the appliances or machinery carelessly and negligently adjusted? Answer: The jury does not think that the evidence locates the defect that caused the accident."

Three appeals are prosecuted: (1) From a judgment in favor of plaintiff and against both defendants in the sum of $10,000; (2) from an order refusing to set aside the judgment and enter a judgment in favor of defendants on the special verdict rendered; (3) from an order denying defendants' motion for a new trial. The evidence is brought up on bill of exceptions.

A diagram was used at the trial which we find necessary to an understanding of the facts in the case and is here inserted in this opinion:



The general statement of the case found in appellants' opening brief is conceded by respondent to be substantially correct "for the purpose of getting the case before the court." We shall avail ourselves of this statement to some extent.

The defendant Albion Lumber Company has been for many years engaged in the operation of a sawmill at Albion in Mendocino county. As a part of its plant it owns and operates what is known as a "wire chute" at the end of a wharf, by means of which a vessel lying off the wharf can be loaded with lumber or other forest products. At the time of the accident here in issue, the other defendant, Swayne & Hoyt, had under charter and was operating the steamer Fulton, and by contract with Albion Lumber Company was transporting lumber and ties from Albion to other points. This "wire chute" is a device by which a wire cable is suspended between the wharf and the vessel to be loaded, and on this cable runs a "traveler" (I) from which is suspended the load to be transported between the wharf and the ship (L, M). The traveler is drawn back and forth by means of a steam donkey engine located on the wharf.

The cable, traveler, engine, and, in fact, everything belonging to the chute is the property of the Albion Lumber Company, with the exception that the "falls" and "tackle" (J,K), by which the seaward part of the chute is raised and lowered, is the property of the vessel, which is then being loaded. The "main wire" (G) on which the traveler runs is really two cables joined together at the ship with a "toggle" or "hook" (B). The offshore end of the main wire (A) is permanently moored in the harbor and when not in use this part of the wire rests on the bottom.

On January 17, 1911, the steamer Fulton came into Albion harbor and went "under the wire" to load. Her crew, all employés of Swayne & Hoyt, drew up the offshore wire from the bottom and, by means of a running line, pulled out the main wire from the wharf and then joined the two ends of the wire together by means of the toggle (B) which was permanently attached to the free end of the offshore wire. As a part of making this wire fast the vessel's crew "moused," i. e., tied with small rope, the tongue of the tripper or toggle hook (B).

The loading of the vessel then proceeded by means of the chute and continued during the 17th of January and all day of the 18th. At all times the employés of Albion Lumber Company had charge of the shore end of the wire and the employés of Swayne & Hoyt had charge of the vessel end thereof and attended to the storing away of the cargo. Matt Gabriel Koskela, plaintiff's intestate (hereafter referred to as Koskela), had been working in the lumber yard of the Albion Company and in its employ. On the morning of the 17th, however, the master of the Fulton found himself short of stevedores, and he therefore, with the permission of the Albion Company, employed Koskela in that capacity, and the latter went to work on the Fulton in the employ of Swayne & Hoyt about noon on the 17th, and continued in that employ until the accident.

About 5:30 p. m. on the 18th Koskela and another stevedore, called Jack Paavanen, having been working on the Fulton all day, came ashore for supper. They reached the shore by riding on the traveler across the wire chute, as was the custom in going ashore and returning to the vessel. After these men came across, the wharfman slackened the main wire between the wharf and the ship, so that it dropped to the bottom and another steamer which was lying at the wharf backed over the bight of the wire and then put out to sea. After this was done the wharf foreman, Byrne, set the wire tight by pulling it up again and put it in a position to carry loads over to the vessel. He then ran the traveler out with no load more than halfway to the ship, in order to test the wire, and then ran it back to the wharf. In the meantime, Koskela and Paavanen had gotten their supper and returned to the wharf, as it was proposed to continue loading that evening. When the wharf foreman gave the signal that everything was ready, Koskela and Paavanen took their places on the traveler to be transported back to the ship. The traveler was started out, and when it had gone halfway or a little less, the main wire dropped and caused the traveler with the two men to fall into the ocean. Paavanen was rescued, but Koskela was drowned.

An examination of the apparatus after the accident showed that the trip hook or toggle (B), holding the main wire together, was entirely gone, together with the link (E), by which it had been fastened to the shackle in the end of the offshore line. The trip hook and link disappeared either by falling into the water, as contended by appellants, or was thrown overboard by some one on the vessel to conceal their defects, as suggested by respondent. This trip hook (B) was a massive contrivance more than 26 inches long, and the link at its offshore end was made of material 1½ inches in diameter. The operation of the trip hook (B) can be understood from the diagram if it is remembered that there is a hinge in it just where it bears against the eye and thimble (N). Unless the tongue (P) is fastened down with the link or shackle (H) the trip hook will open and no longer hold the apparatus in position.

This action was brought against the two corporations to recover damages because of Koskela's death. The amended complaint alleges that Koskela's

> "death was caused by the negligence of said defendants committed as follows: * * * The said wire cable by reason of the defects in the machinery and appliances by which the same was supported, and by reason of the careless and negligent manner in which said machinery and appliances were adjusted, gave way and the deceased without fault on his part was * * * instantly killed. That said death of said deceased was the direct consequence of the defective and imperfect appliances and machinery of defendants and the negligent and careless manner in which same were used and adjusted, as above set forth, which said defects were well known to the defendants and each of them, and were unknown to the plaintiff. The said defendants ordered the deceased to undertake said journey to said vessel, well knowing that the said machinery and appliances for taking him there were defective, insecure, unsafe, and dangerous, and also well knowing that said machinery was adjusted in a careless and negligent manner."

Witness, George Olsen, called by plaintiff, was at the time the Albion Lumber Company's foreman on the wharf. He testified, in explanation of the operation of the apparatus, that when not in use the entire offshore wire from the thimble "N" and including the links of the small chain "Q" were dropped into the sea and rested at the bottom.

> "When the steamer is unloading and you trip the wire, this is untripped first [witness here indicates on diagram hook marked "C"] and this block [witness here indicates block marked "D"] and the little wire ('S') goes ashore, then you trip the big wire and the trip and this whole thing [witness indicates wire and trip marked "A," "B"] goes overboard. The end of this wire marked 'A' is under water too."

He testified further, that two or three months before the accident he assisted in overhauling the apparatus. He testified:

> "It was my duty to see that the rigging was in good order. These two wires (offshore wire 'A' and inshore wire 'G') are fastened together in this way: You pull the inshore wire out to the boat and raise it up and slip that trip hook (B) through the eye (N) of the inshore wire. After putting that link marked 'H' on there, they place a 'mousing' on outside that. I don't know whether that was done on that day of the loading of this vessel. I did not consider it a part of my duties to see whether that was fastened together right or not. On the day the steamer began to load I didn't fasten it; I was not aboard the boat. * * * We had some trouble with a part of the wire or the rigging of the vessel on the day before the accident."

Over defendants' objection he was permitted to explain the trouble:

> "The hook and this block here [indicating on diagram hook marked "J"] gave way and dropped the wire out aboard the vessel while the traveler was out there, and split the woodwork on this traveler here. * * * This block here [indicating block marked "K"] belonged to the steamer; it is used to hoist the wire up and down, and this hook and block both here [indicating "J," "K"], that belongs to the steamer, but the block there [indicating block marked "D"] belongs to the wire. It was this hook here on this block [marked "J"] which broke."

He testified that the next morning they began to load the vessel; ran the traveler out to see that it would work; did not examine to see whether the hook arrangement belonging to the vessel had been fixed; there might have been some little sling trouble at the vessel the day of the accident, but he was not certain. He testified that he went aboard the vessel about a half an hour after the accident and found the end of the inshore wire uncoupled from the offshore wire at the connection with the trip hook or toggle (B), and—

> "hanging in the rigging of this thing—right in the rigging [indicating on diagram point marked

"J"] * * * and the eye of this wire was right here in this block [indicating on diagram point marked "D"]. The weight of this inshore wire would naturally pull it toward the shore. * * * The offshore wire was not there at all. This bumper (D) was hanging right over the vessel. I did not find anything with reference to this trip hook [marked "B"]. Something was said about looking after it. I did not look for the offshore end of the wire or the coupler at this time of night."

It appeared that when Koskela started to return to the vessel it was at the hour of about 7 p. m. and it was quite dark, and "raining slightly." He testified that he proposed to look for the coupler.

"Q. Who did you propose it to? A. To the captain. Q. How was it you didn't look? A. Because the captain said it was too dark, and did not want to look for it."

The foregoing questions and answers were given over defendants' objection. "I did not hear any statement made by the captain as to what had become of the coupler." He testified that he examined the outside or offshore wire the next morning and found nothing on the end except the shackle or clevis (F). "The rest was gone," i. e., (B), (E), from that point to the eye or thimble at the end of the inshore wire. He was not certain whether the tripper (C) was here. The shackle or clevis (F) was not broken, and nothing on it showed a strain.

"Nobody dragged the ocean or sent any divers down to find that hook. I didn't look for it. I didn't see anybody else look for it. I have not seen the coupler since the accident."

He explained that the office of the little chain and tripper (C) was to hold the strain from the traveler (I). He got all of this chain and the tripper after the accident, but could not tell whether it was on the end of the inshore or outshore wire. He also testified that the "mousing" (R) was rope wound around the shackle (H) "and is always put on when you put the wire out. Every time you put the wire out it is customary to put on new mousing."

Witness Paavanen (Pavnen) was Koskela's companion and was on the traveler with Koskela when the latter was drowned. They had gone ashore for supper, and were, as directed to do by the captain of the vessel, returning to continue the work that night. His description of the accident is not material. He testified that during the day he worked the 18th, "something broke about the rigging of the vessel." Over objection he was permitted to describe what happened.

"This pulley broke off [indicating on the diagram marked "K"], and this whole thing [indicating traveler, bumper, and wire tripper] broke down into the hold of the vessel and broke the framework, and then they had to fix it. Q. Did that break let the wire down? A. Yes, sir. I do not remember what time of day this break was, but I thought it was in the forenoon. It was a couple of hours before they fixed it up. * * * After they fixed it we loaded more lumber or ties that day. I am also positive that it was the same day that I fell into the ocean. While they were fixing this traveler, they uncoupled the two wires. They had a rope around here in this block [indicating mousing on diagram]. Somebody took a knife and cut the rope off and then lifted this hook [indicating point "B"] and unhooked it. I didn't see him put this rope back. I didn't see them couple the wire back. I don't know whether they put the rope back on it or not. * * * They were hauling about 50 ties at a load across there on that day. Ties weigh from 100 to over 200 pounds. They were not carrying any load at the time Koskela and I got on the traveler. * * * There was nothing on the traveler to carry except we two men."

Witness Johnson was working "longshore" on the Fulton, and saw "the wire go down" at the time of the accident. He testified:

"I know what shape the coupler part that couples the two wires together was in that day. It was in good shape, and was tied. I don't know whether it was tied at the time of the accident. At the time I jumped out of the way. * * * All of the crew was around there when I jumped. I did not see this coupler after the wire fell. The wire didn't go quite overboard, the whole thing stood on top of the railing. I didn't see the offshore wire. I didn't look or help them look for the end of the wire that night. I didn't help them look for the coupler. I didn't hear anybody say anything about the coupler. I didn't hear the captain say anything about this machinery or any part of it, but when we was loading he told us to keep out of the way, that is all he said. He told us to keep out of the way, 'it ain't very safe around the load;' that is all I heard him say—that it was not very safe around there."

He testified that he saw the captain go ashore on the wire and return with the load a dozen times that day.

"He told us it would not be safe every time he was aboard the ship. When he was not there the mate told us. He never mentioned what was the matter. Neither the mate nor anybody else ever told us what was the matter."

On cross-examination he testified:

"When a load of ties goes out there on the steamer, and as it goes over the vessel it swings back and forth considerable. It always does. It is sure dangerous to stand around in the way of that and have it strike you."

On re-examination he testified:

"The captain and the mate surely made an examination of the rigging of the vessel in my presence while I was there that day. I don't know how many times they did that. * * * He didn't say it would not be safe while he was looking at that, but while he was running loads. He said the same thing every time but he didn't tell me what it was that would not be safe."

Plaintiff rested her case at the close of Johnson's testimony, and defendants moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. The motion presents certain questions which may as well be decided at this point as elsewhere. The grounds of the motion were: That the evidence does not show that Koskela was in the employ of either of defendants when the accident occurred; that it does not tend to prove negligence of either of the defendants, or that deceased in the course of his employment was directed by defendants, or either of them, to get upon the traveler; or that the cable gave way by reason of any defects therein; or that it gave way by reason of any defect in the appliances or in the negligent manner of operating the machinery; or that there were any defects in the machinery or its adjustment.

[1] There was evidence that the deceased was told by the captain of the vessel to return after getting his supper; that the traveler was used for transporting the workmen, and that when deceased returned from his supper to the wharf and the cable was ready for use, the lumber company's foreman said to deceased and his companion, Pavnen: "Hurry up and get on that traveler." It is true that there is no evidence that deceased was under pay while at his supper, or while he was returning on the cable. Strictly speaking, he may not have been at the time in defendants' employment. But we think it a fair inference from the evidence that the contract of service included transportation to and from his place of work by the very means through which he lost his life, and we think that the same rule should apply as would have been applicable if, without fault of his, he had been injured by the breaking of the cable while at work on the vessel.

[2] And that brings us to the question whether the circumstances thus far disclosed afforded reasonable evidence of want of care on defendants' part sufficient to require explanation by them. The rule or maxim, res ipsa loquitur, is stated as follows:

> "When a thing which caused the injury without fault of the injured person is shown to be under the exclusive control of the defendant, and the injury is such as, in the ordinary course of things, does not occur if the one having such control uses proper care, it affords reasonable evidence, in the absence of explanation, that the injury arose from the defendant's want of care." San Juan Light & Transit Co. v. Requena, 224 U. S. 89, 99, 32 Sup. Ct. 399, 56 L. Ed. 680; Hill v. Pac. Gas & Elec. Co., 22 Cal. App. 788, 790, 136 Pac. 492.

It is not contended that deceased was at fault, and it seems to us that the undisputed facts show that the thing which caused the injury was under the exclusive control of the defendants, and that the injury was such as in the ordinary course of things would not have occurred had defendants used proper care. The appliances for loading vessels were such as were in ordinary use and, presumably, had been adopted by defendants as proper and suitable for the purpose designed. It is inconceivable that defendants would have adopted these means had they supposed that in the ordinary course of their operation, with proper care, such accidents as the one here were likely to occur. It is not necessary to refer to the many and great variety of cases in which the rule has been applied, to show that the present case comes plainly within its operation.

[3] Nor have we any doubt upon the remaining question presented by the motion, namely, whether or not defendants were jointly liable, if liable at all.

Appellants contend that:

> "The rule of res ipsa loquitur does not and cannot apply, for the reason that there cannot, under any view of the evidence, have been a joint liability by the defendants, and the evidence leaves it impossible to determine which if either defendant is liable."

The appliances used were in part owned by the lumber company and in part by the shipowners. All of these parts constituted the means of transportation, and were necessary to each other. It was also necessary that both parties should assist in the operation of the appliances, and they were jointly operated by and for the joint benefit of both defendants. In the absence of evidence tending to show by one of the parties that the accident happened by reason of the fault alone of the other, for which the former was in no sense responsible, we think it must be held that both were liable.

Appellants cite Harrison v. Sutter St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 549, 66 Pac. 787, 55 L. R. A. 608. In that case the injury was to a passenger riding on a street car, and was caused by its colliding with a brewery wagon belonging to the National Brewing Company. Both companies were made defendants, and the contention was that, under the rule of res ipsa loquitur, a presumption of negligence arose against both parties. The court, speaking of this principle, said:

> "In the very nature of things it cannot be made to apply in favor of a plaintiff seeking to recover damages for injuries against two defendants wholly independent of each other; it being an open question as to which defendant had control of the particular instrumentality that caused the injury."

Appellants in their quotation omit to add the further statement of the court:

> "If it were a conceded fact in such a case [or, we may add, appeared from the evidence] that the instrumentalities of both defendants caused the injury, probably the principle could be applied, but not otherwise."

The undisputed evidence was that this very situation existed in the present case. The motion for nonsuit was rightly denied.

Capt. Jacobson, master of the steamer Fulton, was called by defendants, and testified that he assisted in adjusting the appliances aboard ship.

> "When we got this tripper up on deck I was right there and saw all of it, and there was no visible defect. That tripper did not go back in the water between that time and the time the accident happened. We didn't load any more that night."

He testified that "once the hook up above gave way" and also "the chain [marked "Q" on diagram] that takes the strain of the carriage"; these "were fixed and we kept on loading." He testified that he had to wait for the steamer Pomo to go out, and he told deceased and Pavnen to go and get their supper; that the bumper and the whole business was sent ashore and the inshore wire was let down to the bottom of the sea, and the Pomo went out over the wire.

> "I was on deck when this was done. Then we started up again. We sang to them on shore to heave tight the big wire, and then after that we got out the small line. * * * Then we rigged up our single and double donkey falls, the big wire was there already.

We did the same as we had done before, except that we had the main wire ashore."

He saw the bumper sent out part way, and then went in to his room.

> "I was in my room at the time this accident happened. I went out immediately, and when I got out there I found this here [indicating bumper and end of inshore line on diagram] hanging shoreward from the deck. I found all the rigging except that none of the offshore wire was on the vessel. I think the water there is somewhere around three or four fathoms deep."

He testified that George Olsen was not there that night, and that no one came from the wharf that night. Olsen's testimony is already given to the contrary. He testified that the next morning they got up the offshore line and there was nothing on it but the thimble or eye (marked "O" on diagram). "The tripper and the link and everything was gone, there was nothing left but just this tymbal [properly called thimble]." He explained that all his then crew were elsewhere employed at the time of the trial, and none of them testified except the captain. Concluding his testimony in chief, he said:

> "We didn't examine the tackle of the ship; that we took for granted was O. K. The tackle was hooked up on that day, if it was hooked up property (properly). I was over the wire myself on the day of the accident I should think a dozen times. I rode back and forth, out on the load and back empty."

On cross-examination he testified:

> "It was customary for the employés and longshoremen to go back and forth on this traveler; that is the way they always did."

He denied that the "mousing" was cut that day, or that the wires had been separated, and claimed that the breaking of the bumper and hook was the day before. The only explanation given by the witness as to his theory of what caused the accident was on his cross-examination, and was as follows:

> "The night this man was drowned that link must have broken" [indicating link marked "E" on big tripper]."

And his reason given was:

> "Because the tripper was not there. * * * I didn't make any investigation to see which way the trip hook fell over. No one saw it. I didn't see the trip hook. I don't know which side it went over on. If it had fallen in the boat I would have seen it."

He denied telling any of the men that the machinery was not safe. He told them when a load came out "to stand clear." He testified:

> "There was nothing the matter with any machinery such as the traveler or the dumping block, that I knew of. * * * It had been about 30 hours since I examined the mousing. It is the universal custom on all of these chutes for the vessel to make fast the two wires. We have no assistance at all in making it fast. We have men enough to do it ourselves."

Witness Byrne was called by defendants. He was the engineer handling the inshore end of the wire. He testified that they had trouble with the bumping block the day before the accident, but he didn't know of any other trouble. He was told by Olsen to send the longshoremen out; he tested the wire after the Pomo went out.

> "After I brought the traveler back and the two got on I started my engine; threw my clutch in and ran probably a third of the way out, or possibly half of the way, when everything dropped."

He explained that he had a rope or yarn tied around the wire to indicate when he had the wire taut.

> "When everything dropped I thought my mark might have slipped, or something, so I examined that the first thing, and found it where it belonged. It showed the main wire was not too tight. Of course, in setting that wire up it is difficult at night, and we go by that mark."

On cross-examination he testified:

> "The weight of an ordinary load of ties on the carriage would be probably three ton, from two to three tons, and at the time these men were out there was nothing at all on there except the two men. There was no reason that I know of why the toggle should break. Everything was in good order as far as I knew. There was no particular weight to these men to make it break when it had held up big loads before."

Pavnen was recalled for cross-examination, and testified that it was the evening before the accident that "the mousing on the big tripper" was cut, and that both he and Koskela worked there on the 17th and 18th.

Witness McKee testified for defendants as an expert in operating wire chutes. His testimony related to chutes at other places and the custom in their operation. We cannot see that his testimony throws any informing light on the case here. Of the wire chutes with which he was familiar he said: "It is not an unusual thing for some part of the rigging to carry away."

Olsen was recalled, and stated that it was the bumper and not the traveler that broke the night before the accident, and that the main wire was tripped that night. Witness Miller gave some expert testimony in rebuttal as to the proper construction of these wire chutes, but we do not think it important to state his opinions.

We have endeavored to give so much of the testimony, perhaps more than necessary, as would fairly present the salient facts in the case.

Reviewing the facts as shown by the testimony, we start with the presumption of negligence, i. e., that, under the rule res ipsa loquitur, there was reasonable evidence that the injury arose from the defendants' want of care. This alone, without considering specific facts indicating negligence, of which respondent claims there are many, would sustain the general verdict in the absence of satisfactory explanation by defendants of the cause of the injury exculpating them from responsibility therefor. And the sufficiency of the facts constituting such explanation was for the jury to determine. It is difficult to conceive of appliances that had during the day carried safely many loads of two or three tons weight suddenly, without fault of the operators or of the appliances themselves, breaking down under a load of 300 pounds. If the accident was susceptible of an explanation consistent with the assumption that the appliances were adequate and their operation by defendants without fault, the burden was upon defendants so to show to the satisfaction of the jury. The only member of the vessel's crew who testified was the master, Capt. Jacobson, and in his testimony in chief he made no explanation whatever of the cause of the accident. In his cross-examination the only suggestion made by him of a probable cause was that the "link must have broken [indicating point marked "E" on diagram] because the tripper was not there." It is possible that this link broke, if it did break, by engineer Byrne's having put a tension on the main wire to the breaking point when he sent the deceased out on the traveler. He was guided by a mere rope tied around the cable, which at first he thought had slipped, thus leading him to put too great a strain on the cable. It is not improbable that unwittingly he did this. However, it is not for us, nor was it for the jury, to speculate upon the cause of the breakdown. It was for defendants to make the explanation, and this, we think, they failed to do.

Appellants contend:

> "That the special verdict of the jury necessitates a judgment in favor of defendants, inasmuch as it affirmatively appears therefrom that the plaintiff did not prove to the satisfaction of the jury that the defendants' negligence caused Koskela's death."

[4] There was a general verdict for plaintiff and against defendants. The rule is that the general verdict imports a finding in favor of plaintiff on all the averments of the complaint material to his recovery. Merritt v. Wilcox, 52 Cal. 238, 242.

> "The presumption is that the general verdict covers findings in plaintiff's favor upon all the facts necessary to be proved under the issues not covered by the findings." Clementson on Special Verdicts, p. 135.

[5] And all presumptions are in favor of the general verdict for the plaintiff, and it must control if the special verdict is not absolutely irreconcilable therewith. Antonian v. S. P. Co., 9 Cal. App. 718, 731, 732, 100 Pac. 877. On the other hand, answers to interrogatories cannot be aided by intendment, as all intendments are in favor of the general verdict. Clementson on Special Verdicts, p. 134. And a special finding must be limited and controlled by its specific terms. Id. Special verdicts cannot control a general verdict unless consistent with each other, are not uncertain, and are free from obscurity. They cannot destroy the general verdict, if at all, except by their own inherent strength and clearness. Id., p. 135. Obviously, as the general verdict is an express finding for plaintiff on all material issues, it should not be overthrown unless the special findings are utterly at war with it. We have seen that the jury were warranted in finding the defendants guilty of negligence from which the injury resulted. We do not think it affirmatively appears from the special verdicts that plaintiff did not prove that defendants' negligence caused Koskela's death. Res ipsa loquitur. Special interrogatories I and II were not answered, and need not have been because plaintiff was not required to locate the particular defect in the wire cable. The jury did answer that the cable gave way by reason of defects in the machinery or in the appliances supporting it. Interrogatory III. But it was not required of the jury specifically to locate the defect. The jury also found that the wire gave way by reason of the careless and negligent manner in which the machinery or appliances supporting it were adjusted. Interrogatory V. These were findings of negligence, and respondent, we think, pertinently remarks:

> "Does this not exclude the idea of latent or undiscoverable defect? If the cause lay in the negligent manner in which this machinery was adjusted, the cause could not be a latent or undiscoverable defect. Negligent adjustment is not a latent defect."

Interrogatory VI invited an answer, In what way were the appliances or machinery negligently adjusted? The answer must be limited to the scope of the question which called for an explanation by the jury of the specific defect in the manner of adjusting the appliances which caused the accident. This the jury were unable to do. As shown, the happening of the accident under the circumstances and the death of deceased without his fault resulting therefrom established defendants' negligence. The jury found specifically that the cable gave way by reason of a defect in the machinery and appliances supporting it, and also by reason of the negligent manner in which they were adjusted. We must, if we can, under the rules stated, so construe the failure to answer interrogatory VI, as to be consistent with the answers just referred to. Besides, we do not think any inconsistency arises between this answer and the general verdict and the specific answers III and IV; nor, in our opinion, was an answer locating the defect necessary to the giving of full force to the general verdict.

We find no prejudicial error in any rulings of the court on the admission of evidence.

[6] The motion for a new trial was further urged on the ground of newly discovered evidence, and was supported by the affidavit of John Tietjen, mate of the steamer Fulton at the time of the accident. His affidavit shows that he was present and assisted in adjusting the appliances and operating them. It is in greater detail, and in some respects more specific, than the testimony of Capt. Jacobson, but is quite similar and, while corroborative and in that sense important, it was in large degree cumulative. He does not explain the cause of the accident, nor does he state facts which, if believed, would necessarily rebut the evidence of negligence. He states that he "would have attended the trial on July 11, 1912, if he had had notice." Affiant Moran, manager of Swayne & Hoyt, deposed that he was notified, on June 24, 1912 (the case was set on June 20th), that the case had been set for trial July 11, 1912, and that he immediately "set about procuring Tietjen's attendance," and traced him aboard the steamer San Pedro, June 30, 1912, bound from San Francisco to Eureka and finally succeeded in obtaining information from the San Pedro's agent that she would arrive at San Francisco on July 9th, and that he, the agent, would employ a substitute mate, relieve Tietjen, and send him to Ukiah on the 10th; that affiant relied on this promise, and notified the defendants' attorneys that Tietjen would be at Ukiah on July 10th, not later than the 11th. It turned out that the San Pedro did not arrive at San Francisco until July 18th. No application was made to postpone the trial for the reason, as deposed by Attorney Mannon, that he could not assure the court that he would be able to secure Tietjen's attendance nor state where he was.

Attorney Preston, one of plaintiff's attorneys, deposed that the cause was at issue in February, 1912, and the case was called up to be set for trial about March 11th, and was set down for trial for April 25th, but on April 8th the order was vacated and the cause regularly continued from week to week to be reset until May 27th, when the trial date was fixed for June 27th, and at the request of defendants the cause was again postponed until July 11th, at which date the trial began; "that no application for a postponement was made on said last-named day, or at any other time; that John Tietjen does not reside in the county of Mendocino, nor did he reside at a place where he could be forced to attend trial by subpœna." There is no reason given why Tietjen's deposition was not taken except as may be inferred from the fact that Mr. Mannon was notified by Swayne & Hoyt that all the witnesses, including Tietjen, would be in attendance.

The granting of the motion, under the circumstances, was within the sound discretion of the court, and it is only where such discretion has been abused that its order will be reversed. People v. Urquidas, 96 Cal. 239, 31 Pac. 52.

Tietjen's evidence cannot be said to be newly discovered. It was well known to the defendants that he was present and acting as mate of the Fulton when the accident happened. Knowing as early as March that the cause was called up to be set for trial, defendants had ample time to assure themselves of the attendance of their witnesses, but it was not until June 24th that any effort was made to ascertain Tietjen's whereabouts. Swayne & Hoyt, being engaged in the coastwise shipping, had the means of learning who constituted the crews on coastwise vessels. Defendants' attorneys were justified in relying on their clients to secure the attendance of necessary witnesses, and defendants cannot be heard to complain of their own want of diligence. Had they made timely inquiry and learned that this witness could not be found or, if found, was so situated as to make it doubtful whether he could attend the trial, the attorneys should have been so notified and given an opportunity to move for a postponement before the trial began. We cannot say that the court abused its discretion in denying the motion.

The judgment and orders are affirmed.

COLLOM v. ROOS BROS., Incorporated. (Civ. 1320.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 2, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1914.)

BROKERS (§ 46*)—COMPENSATION—PROCURING LEASE — OPTION TO RENEW — EXERCISE — LEASE TO DIFFERENT PERSON.

Plaintiff, a broker, having obtained an option for a lease for three years with a privilege of renewal at $500 a month, made an agreement with R. Bros. to lease the premises for that term with the privilege of renewal at $600 per month, they agreeing to pay plaintiff monthly the difference in the rent. This agreement was consummated, except that the lease executed to R. Bros. contained an option to renew for seven instead of three years for the sum of $600 per month. Prior to the expiration of the lease all the stockholders in R. Bros. Co. but two organized a new corporation, known as the R. Realty Co., to which R. Bros. assigned all its interest in the lease, etc. In February, 1909, R. Bros. notified the landlord that the privilege of renewal would not be exercised. A short time thereafter, however, one of the stockholders of the R. Realty Co. obtained from the landlord a lease to him, individually, for a rental of $600 a month from the end of the term of the former lease, with the privilege of renewal of the new lease for a term of three years and four months, and on the expiration of the old lease nothing further was paid to plaintiff. Held, that the new lease could not be regarded as a renewal of the old, and R. Bros. and, the R. Realty Co. being entirely different entities, plaintiff could not recover any portion of the rent reserved under the new lease, in the absence of any claim of fraud.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff for the sum of $844.10, and from an order denying the defendant's motion for a new trial. The essential facts are these: The plaintiff in April, 1906, was a real estate broker in the employ of Madison & Burke, a real estate firm in San Francisco. After the earthquake and fire of that year, knowing that Mrs. B. McDermott was the owner of certain property on Fillmore street which she desired to rent, and having learned that the defendant wished to lease the property, the plaintiff went to the home of Mrs. McDermott in Oakland on April 26, 1906, and obtained from her an option for a lease of the premises for three years, with a privilege of renewal, and at a rental of $500 a month, the option to expire on May 1st. Two days later he made an agreement with Roos Bros., by which he agreed to procure a lease of the premises for them, for three years, with a privilege of renewal, at a rental of $600 per month, and by which Roos Bros. agreed to pay Collom "out of the monthly rental of $600 per month to be reserved in said lease, such amount as the owner of said premises may allow him, the same to be in full of all commissions and other services rendered and to be rendered by him as above." Having this agreement Collom then went back to Mrs. McDermott, and obtained the execution by her of a lease of the property to Roos Bros., for the term of three years, with an option of renewal for seven years additional, for the sum of $600 a month. He also obtained from Mrs. McDermott a letter addressed to Roos Bros., in which the latter were "authorized to pay on account to J. Frank Collom, his heirs or assigns, the sum of $100 per month during the full term of said lease and any renewal thereof for the period of seven years additional as therein provided." This letter was presented to Roos Bros. at the time of the execution of the lease on their part, and their acceptance of its terms was evinced by the payment to Collom for a time thereafter of the monthly sum of $100 out of the rents specified in their lease.

Roos Bros. is, and prior to the date of the lease in question was, a corporation composed of Leon L. Roos, Robert L. Roos, George H. Roos, Adolph Roos, and Achille Roos. Immediately after the earthquake and fire this corporation had taken a number of leases of real estate in San Francisco; but in the month of July, 1906, a new corporation was formed, known as Roos Realty Company, which then took over and thereafter conducted separately the real estate branch of the business of Roos Bros., with which the two elder members of the former corporation did not wish to be further concerned. The stockholders of the new corporation were Leon L., Robert L., and George H. Roos; and in it the two elder members of the Roos family, Adolph and Achille, had no interest. To this new corporation the older one of Roos Bros. assigned all of its interest in these several leases, including that made by Mrs. McDermott, and thereafter the Roos Realty Company paid to Mrs. McDermott the portion of the rental to which she was entitled under the foregoing agreements, and also paid to the plaintiff, Collom, his share thereof in accordance with Mrs. McDermott's direction. In the month of February, 1909, Roos Bros. notified Mrs. McDermott that the privilege of renewal in the lease of April, 1906, would not be exercised. A short while later negotiations were entered into between George H. Roos, representing the Roos Realty Company, and the owner of the property, for another lease of the premises, as a result of which a new lease was entered into between Mrs. McDermott and George H. Roos, whereby, for a rental of $600 a month, the latter leased the property for a term of three years and eight months from the end of the term of the former lease, with the privilege of renewal of the new lease for a further term of three years and four months from the end of the stated term thereof. Upon the execution of this instrument and the expiration of the former lease Mrs. McDermott instructed Roos Bros. in writing to cease paying Collom any further sum. The payments to Collom accordingly ceased on May 1, 1909, and in November 1909, he brought this action.

In his third amended complaint the plaintiff, after stating the substance of the option and agreements out of which the first lease came into being, together with the direction of Mrs. McDermott to Roos Bros. as to the payment of the $100 a month to him during the term of said lease, and also the fact of the making of the later lease, proceeded to aver that George H. Roos, to whom the second lease ran, was a large stockholder and officer of Roos Bros. and was also a large stockholder and officer of Roos Realty Company; that the stockholders of Roos Realty Company are all stockholders of the defendant Roos Bros., and were all as such stockholders beneficially interested in the original lease, and were in fact the only stockholders of the defendant corporation who ever had any beneficial interest therein; that said second lease was taken in the name of George H. Roos as the agent and trustee of Roos Realty Company, and that the same was taken and held by said George H. Roos in the form of a new lease, and not as a specific renewal of the lease of April, 1906, "as an attempt on the part of defendant to evade its liability under its contract with the plaintiff for the payment to him of $100 a month during any renewal of the former lease." In its answer to this third amended complaint the defendant admits that George H. Roos is a large stockholder both of the defendant and the Roos Realty Company, and admits that the stockholders of the Roos Realty Company are all stockholders of the defendant, and admits that they were all as such stockholders interested in the first lease, but denies that they were the only stockholders so interested therein, and alleges that the other stockholders of the defendant were also interested in said first lease at the time of its execution, and so continued to be until its transfer to the Roos Realty Company, but not thereafter; the defendant also admits that George H. Roos took the second lease as trustee for the Roos Realty Company, but denies that the said last-named lease was taken in the form of a new lease as an attempt on the part of the defendant to evade its liability to the plaintiff in the event of a renewal of the former lease; but, on the contrary, avers that the new lease constituted an entirely new and independent transaction with the owner of the property, and was in no sense a renewal of the old lease, but was different in time and terms from what such renewal would or could have been; that the old lease was not renewed, and hence that defendant's liability to the plaintiff ceased with its expiration on May 1st of 1909, and that the defendant owes the plaintiff nothing.

Upon the issues as thus formed the cause went to trial. The plaintiff introduced in evidence the several documents referred to in the history of the transaction, and thereupon and upon the admissions of the pleadings rested his case. The defendant moved for a nonsuit upon the ground of plaintiff's failure of proof, which motion the court denied, and to which the defendant duly excepted, and now assigns the same as error.

We think the defendant's motion for nonsuit should have been granted. The plaintiff's theory as to his right of recovery is predicated upon a twofold aspect of the facts as presented by the documentary proofs and by the admissions of the pleadings in the case. The first of these is that the defendant, by its transfer of the first lease to the Roos Realty Company, transferred to it the right to enter into a renewal thereof, which, if consummated, would serve to bind the defendant to continue its payment of $100 monthly to the plaintiff during the term of such renewal, and that the new lease taken by George H. Roos as the agent and trustee of the Roos Realty Company constituted in fact such renewal. But while it may be conceded that the defendant, by its transfer of the first lease passed over to the Roos Realty Company the right to make a renewal of it by which the defendant would be bound to continue its payments to the plaintiff, it does not follow that the new lease is, on its face and standing by itself, to be considered to be a renewal of the former lease. It is made to a different person, representing a different entity from that of the former lessee. It is for a different term from that provided for in the privilege of renewal stipulated in the former lease. This is an essential variation; and, while it is true that a new lease made between the immediate parties to a former one containing the privilege of a renewal, may, under the authorities, be varied as to its terms and still be held to constitute a renewal thereof, this flexibility in the exercise of the privilege cannot be held to apply as between the lessor and a transferee of the first lease. Otherwise the original lessee would be placed in a position where it would be bound by obligations to which it was not a party and differing from those which it would have consented to incur. In order, therefore, that this new lease, made between different parties and for a different term than the former one, might be held to be a renewal of it so as to bind Roos Bros. to a continuance of their payments to the plaintiff, it must either have been identical in terms with the original lease, or it must be aided by those proofs which the plaintiff in his complaint undertook to supply; that is to say, by evidence sustaining the plaintiff's averments that the second lease was taken in the form of a new lease, and not as a specific renewal of the former one, in "an attempt on the part of the defendant to evade its liability under its contract with plaintiff," or, in other words, with the fraudulent design and effort on the part of the appellant to avoid its obligation; for this is what the averments of the plaintiff's complaint must be held to mean, although the plaintiff in his brief disclaims the intent to impute fraud to the appellant.

This branch of the plaintiff's case, requiring averment in his complaint, and being traversed by the answer, of necessity demanded affirmative proof on the part of plaintiff at the trial; but this proof, essential to his case, the plaintiff utterly failed to produce, unless it is to be found in the documents which evidence the transaction, or in the admissions of the defendant's pleadings, or in both read together.

So far as the documents are concerned, they, in themselves, evince no such fraudulent intent or attempt as the plaintiff avers; and so far as the admissions of the pleadings go, the only admission of the defendant which plaintiff urges as supporting this view of the case is the admission that the stockholders of Roos Realty Company, the corporation for whose benefit the second lease was made, were also stockholders of Roos Bros., the corporation named as lessee of the first lease and the transferrer thereof to the later corporation. But this admitted fact, either taken alone or in connection with the documentary proofs, does not tend to disclose any fraudulent design or effort on the part of Roos Bros. to avoid its obligation to the plaintiff. It is not shown, or even contended, that these two corporations are one entity, even though all of the stockholders of Roos Realty Company are also some of the stockholders of Roos Bros. On the contrary, the pleadings and proofs of the plaintiff himself show that they are two different entities, having different holdings and engaged in distinct forms of corporate energy; that the latter corporation was organized to take over the real estate activities and investments of the former corporation which certain of its stockholders no longer wished themselves or it to be interested in; that it did so openly, and that thereafter its business and affairs were entirely separate from those of the earlier corporation; that these facts were known to the plaintiff at the time; and that during practically the entire term of the first lease he dealt with the Roos Realty Company as a separate entity and as the successor in interest in such lease of the former corporation. The mere fact that the same persons were stockholders of one corporation doing one kind of business, and are also stockholders of another corporation engaged in another and distinct line of business, is not in itself sufficient to impute liability to one for the acts of the other in the absence of some direct proof of a fraudulent design in the carrying out of which the two entities are controlled and act as one. No such proof had been presented at the close of the plaintiff's case. This being the state of the record and the proofs when the plaintiff rested, we think the court erred in refusing to grant the defendant's motion for nonsuit at that stage of the trial.

The subsequent proofs cannot be said to have in any way strengthened the plaintiff's original case; and hence it follows that if the motion for a nonsuit should have been granted, the judgment which the court rendered and entered at the close of the trial should be reversed, as well as the order of the court refusing to grant a new trial.

The judgment and order are reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

We concur: LENNON, P. J.; KERRIGAN, J.

PEOPLE v. SVENDSEN. (Cr. 323.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. June 18, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 17, 1914.)

1. ROBBERY (§ 24*)—EVIDENCE—CONVICTION.
In a prosecution for robbery, evidence held to sustain a conviction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Robbery, Cent. Dig. §§ 32–36; Dec. Dec. Dig. § 24.*]

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1170½*)—WITNESSES—CROSS-EXAMINATION — LIMITATION — APPEAL—REVIEW.
Exercise of discretion by the trial judge with reference to the cross-examination of a witness and permitting leading questions to be asked of a party's own witness will not be disturbed on appeal, unless abuse of discretion and prejudice are shown.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3129–3135; Dec. Dig. § 1170½.*]

3. WITNESSES (§ 268*)—CROSS-EXAMINATION—SCOPE.
In a prosecution involving the life or liberty of accused, where the guilt depends on the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecuting witness, it is the court's duty to permit a full investigation, and not to hold too strictly to the rules governing cross-examination.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 931–948, 959; Dec. Dig. § 268.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 409*) — EVIDENCE — ADMISSIONS TO OFFICER—PRELIMINARY PROOF.
Admissions made by accused to a police officer when placed under arrest, if not confessions of guilt, are admissible without the preliminary laying of a foundation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 918, 919, 972; Dec. Dig. § 409.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 829*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS — REQUESTS TO CHARGE — INSTRUCTIONS GIVEN.
It is not error to refuse requests to charge fully and fairly covered by other instructions given.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 834*)—TRIAL—REQUESTS TO CHARGE—MODIFICATION.
Accused requested the court to charge that if, after considering the whole case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of accused's guilt it was the juror's duty "not to vote for a verdict of guilty nor" not to be influenced into voting for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of guilty. Held, that the striking out of the quoted words left the instruction complete and unobjectionable, and its modification was therefore not error.

7. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 1166½*)—TRIAL—MISCONDUCT OF COURT.
Alleged misconduct of the court, consisting of a hostile manner towards accused's counsel, was not of itself sufficient to constitute reversible error, but merely accentuated prejudicial error exhibited by the record.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Neils Svendsen was convicted of robbery, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald and Nathaniel R. Rutherford, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was convicted upon an information charging him with the crime of robbery. He appeals from the judgment alone.

On the night of August 2, 1913, defendant, who had been to the city of Los Angeles, alighted from a suburban electric car at a point near the town of Whittier, from which point he started to walk to the farm where he was employed as a dairyman. On the same car was a Chinaman, Sing Lee, who was also traveling from Los Angeles to his place of employment as a farm laborer near Whittier, and distant about one mile from the point where both he and the defendant left the electric car at the same time. In going to their respective places of employment, both defendant and Sing Lee on foot and together traveled the same road. When they had reached a point about a quarter of a mile from the camp where Sing Lee was employed, and at about 12:15 o'clock on the morning of August 3d, a fight ensued wherein defendant, as conclusively shown, inflicted upon the Chinaman some 40 to 50 knife wounds, a number of which were dangerous, and as a result of which Sing Lee was left in a disabled and semiconscious condition, in which he was found several hours later by persons traveling the thoroughfare. There were no witnesses other than the parties to the encounter, and their versions as to who was the aggressor and other material facts are conflicting. According to Sing Lee's testimony, defendant, without provocation, suddenly attacked him by grasping his throat, holding his knuckles against his vocal cords, and, saying, "God damn, no likee me," began using a knife on him until, disabled from his numerous wounds, he fell to the ground, when defendant searched his pockets, taking therefrom a purse containing $4.05, and left him. Defendant testified: "This Chinaman met me on the boulevard, and he says 'Where do you live?' I told him it was none of his damn business. He said, 'What is the matter with you?' I says, 'Don't bother me; I ain't got no use for Chinamen; cheap labor.' And about that time he pulled out a knife and struck me on the forehead with the knife, and we had quite a fight there on the boulevard. I got the advantage of him and took his knife away from him and give him quite a beating." But that he did not go through his pockets, nor take any money from, nor rob him. That Sing Lee first struck him in the forehead with a knife, whereupon he took the knife away from the Chinaman and struck him once or twice. That in taking the knife he took hold of the blade, cutting his hand. There was some corroborative evidence that defendant had a cut on his hand.

[1] It is apparent that the jury in reaching a verdict believed the testimony of the Chinaman, to the effect that the defendant robbed him of the purse containing the money. Defendant's story, in view of the fact that when found the next morning Sing Lee had 40 or 50 knife wounds in his body, that he took the knife from Sing Lee, who was the aggressor, and struck him with it once or twice only, was well calculated to cause the jury to discredit his entire testimony. It was the province of the jury to determine the fact, as to which the evidence was conflicting. Hence there is no merit in the contention that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict of conviction.

[2] On direct examination Sing Lee testified: "He [the defendant] took from me a pocketbook containing four dollars and five cents." On cross-examination, after stating that he had this purse in his trousers pocket, he was asked: "Did the defendant put his hand in your pocket and take your purse from your pocket?" The judge, without waiting for an objection to be interposed or answer given, interrupted, saying, "He has answered that," to which defendant's attorney replied, "Not that question," in reply to which the learned judge said: "Yes, he has. I will sustain an objection and make it myself. We have got to get through here some time. The next question, if you have got another one, Mr. McDonald." The witness stated the trousers he had on were those worn at the time of the robbery, and that while he was in the hospital the nurse took them to the laundry, having them cleaned. He was then asked: "Is that the only person that has ever had your trousers in their possession or cleaned them since the 2d day of August?" to which the court sustained an objection upon the ground that it was immaterial. He was also asked: "Who lives with you on this ranch?" Whereupon, no objection being interposed, the court said, "That is not proper cross-examination." An objection was also sustained to a question as to whether he had been spending the night in Chinatown and what he had been doing. The control of the cross-examination of a witness, and the permitting of leading questions to be asked of one's own witness, is largely in the discretion of the trial judge, and unless there be an abuse in the exercise thereof and the rights of defendant prejudiced thereby, the action of the court should not be disturbed. The witness, if we may determine from the record, had not stated in terms, as said by the court, that defendant put his hand in his pocket and took therefrom his purse, and, conceding that he had, he might very properly have been permitted to answer the question. Doubtless he would have given an affirmative answer, since by reason of its being in his pocket he could not have obtained it otherwise, except by forcing Sing Lee to take it from the pocket and hand it over to him, in which case the act would have constituted the offense charged. Hence, conceding the ruling of the court to be error, it must likewise be conceded that it was not prejudicial to the substantial rights of defendant. The other questions to which objections were sustained appear to have been immaterial. The answers, whatever they might have been, could not have had the slightest effect upon the question at issue. The same remarks apply with equal force to a number of like assignments of error based upon rulings in the admission and rejection of evidence. While we think the court might properly have allowed defendant greater latitude in the cross-examination of the prosecuting witness, it cannot be said the record discloses that defendant's rights were prejudiced by the limitation placed thereon.

[3] In this connection it may be said generally, however, that where the life or liberty of one accused of an offense depends upon the uncorroborated evidence of the prosecuting witness, the ends of justice will be best subserved by permitting the light of a full investigation to be thrown upon the transaction, which, other than his own statement, in the absence of direct evidence elicited by the district attorney, can only be done on cross-examination of the witness. The policy often pursued by district attorneys in proving the bare facts and then objecting to questions calculated to illuminate the subject involved, asked by the accused, upon the ground that they are not proper cross-examination, is not to be commended; and the trial judge, who is supposed as between the accuser and the accused to sit impartially, should, notwithstanding the limited scope of the direct examination, grant to defendant the fullest opportunity for cross-examination and inquiry as to direct statements made against him by his prosecutor. So long as the present system of criminal procedure prevails, and particularly since the adoption of section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution, under which notwithstanding a defendant has, by a ruling of the court, been deprived of a legal right in his trial, he is nevertheless, on appeal, without remedy, unless this court can say upon the entire evidence that such error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice, a greater and larger responsibility rests upon the trial judge in seeing that a defendant on trial is accorded every right to which he is entitled; otherwise a legal wrong is done under judicial sanction for which the aggrieved is without remedy.

[4] One of the officers who made the arrest of defendant was called as a witness for the people, and testified as to certain statements made to him by defendant at the time when placed under arrest. After the district attorney had asked certain preliminary questions, the witness was told to repeat the conversation had with defendant. Thereupon the following proceedings were had:

"Mr. McDonald: Just a moment. Was this conversation had—

"The Court: You are not cross-examining.

"Mr. McDonald: For the purpose of objection—

"The Court: "Well, I don't care anything about that. You will get your chance when the time comes."

And again, when the witness was asked to repeat another talk had with defendant, his attorney, addressing the court, stated:

"For the purpose of objecting, I would like to ask the witness one or two questions."

"The Court: I think not."

As we gather from appellant's brief, his complaint is that the admissions made by defendant to the officer in the conversation had with him constituted confessions, and as such were inadmissible in evidence for want of proper foundation laid. Assuming the statements made by defendant, as testified to by the witness, were confessions, we think a sufficient foundation was laid to entitle them to admission as evidence. Moreover, an examination of the statements made by defendant in the conversations to which the witness testified clearly shows that they were not confessions of guilt; indeed, nothing that he said could be so construed. For this reason it was not necessary to make the proofs required as a prerequisite to introducing a confession in evidence. People v. Wilkins, 158 Cal. 530, 111 Pac. 612; People v. Weber, 149 Cal. 325, 86 Pac. 671; People v. Stokes, 5 Cal. App. 211, 89 Pac. 997.

[5, 6] Certain instructions to the jury requested by defendant were refused, or given as modified. Where such instructions were refused the subject thereof appears to have been fully and fairly covered by other instructions given. Hence, conceding the instructions requested to have been correct and applicable to the case, nevertheless the rights of defendant could not have been prejudiced by the refusal to give the same. Of the requested instructions given as modified, the changes therein appear to have been by running a line through such portion as was elsewhere given, or by the court deemed improper. As so modified, the instructions, taken with those given, were correct, full, and fair statements of the law applicable to the case. Assuming that defendant was entitled to the instruction that, "if after consideration of the whole case, any juror should entertain a reasonable doubt of the guilt of the defendant, it is the duty of such juror not to vote for a verdict of 'guilty' nor not to be influenced into voting for the single reason that a majority of the jury should be in favor of a verdict of 'guilty'" (the failure to give which, however, has been repeatedly held not error. People v. Loomer, 13 Cal. App. 660, 110 Pac. 466; People v. Singh, 20 Cal. App. 150, 128 Pac. 420; People v. Fisher, 16 Cal. App 271, 116 Pac. 688), the modification thereof by striking out the part underscored left the instruction complete and unobjectionable; the jurors being correctly told that the fact that a majority of their number favored a verdict of guilty should not in itself influence any one of them who entertained a reasonable doubt as to defendant's guilt to so vote. It is also claimed the defendant's rights were prejudiced by permitting the jury to take these instructions so modified to the jury room, an inspection of which disclosed the parts thereof so stricken out. There is nothing in the record showing that the instructions were so delivered to the jury.

[7] Assignments are made of misconduct on the part of the court, it being claimed that the manner in which the rulings were made showed hostility to counsel for the defendant in the method in which he presented his client's case, and tended to humiliate counsel and prejudice the cause of defendant. Some of the rulings upon which appellant bases his claim are hereinbefore stated. Many of the questions asked by defendant's counsel were immaterial and of the most trivial nature, and, while doubtless he was defending his client to the best of his ability, nevertheless his conduct of the case was calculated to try the patience of the court. While the court might have expressed its rulings in a manner indicative of less impatience and less calculated to affect the sensibilities of defendant's counsel, it cannot be said, in the absence of prejudicial error, that this alone was sufficient to prejudice the rights of defendant. As said by this court in an opinion filed June 10th, in the case of People v. Costa, such action on the part of the court merely accentuates prejudicial error exhibited by the record. People v. Szafcsur, 161 Cal. 636, 119 Pac. 1083; People v. Casselman, 10 Cal. App. 238, 101 Pac. 693; People v. Modina, 146 Cal. 142, 79 Pac. 842.

Counsel for appellant cites section 4½, article 6, of the state Constitution, to the effect that no judgment in a criminal case shall be set aside for error unless, after an examination of the entire case, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the errors complained of have resulted in a miscarriage of justice. In compliance with appellant's request, we have read this provision which, however, is not, as indicated by counsel, entirely new to us, and we have likewise carefully read the record, and are convinced that it discloses no error which will justify this court in holding there has been a miscarriage of justice. Appellant's counsel have filed voluminous briefs, a large part of which is not devoted to a discussion of alleged errors contained in the record, but to the fact that defendant, a white man, has been convicted upon the uncorroborated testimony of a "heathen Chinaman" (and other matters wholly foreign to the questions presented for review), and insist that the laws of the state permitting such an outrage should be changed. The labor of the court would have been greatly lessened had counsel devoted their time to a discussion of the alleged errors contained in the record.

The judgment herein is affirmed.

TITLE GUARANTY & TRUST CO. et al. v. RAILROAD COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA. (S. F. 6666.)

(Supreme Court of California. Aug. 3, 1914. Rehearing Denied Sept. 2, 1914.)

1. Waters and Water Courses (§ 203*)—Public Water Supply—Service Connections—Duty to Furnish.

A franchise giving a water company the right to furnish water to the inhabitants of a city at specified rates and to use the streets for mains does not authorize the company to charge consumers for service connections, but requires the holder of the franchise to furnish such connections free of charge; the consumers having no right or authority to use the streets for such purposes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

2. Waters and Water Courses (§ 203*)—Public Water Companies—Water Supply—Service Connections—Statutes.

Civ. Code, § 549, declares that all corporations formed to supply water to cities or towns must furnish pure fresh water to the inhabitants thereof for family uses, on demand, and that the proper authorities may prescribe rules as to the delivery of water, not inconsistent with the laws of the state. Held, that such section makes it the duty of water companies to deliver the water to the consumer, which includes the installation of service connections in the street at their own expense, which duty they cannot avoid while enjoying their franchise by showing that their articles of incorporation did not give the authority to engage in the service.

3. Waters and Water Courses (§ 203*)—Public Water Supply — Regulation — Railroad Commission—Powers.

Const. art. 12, § 23, as amended (see St. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. xlviii), defines public utilities, including companies furnishing water to the inhabitants of cities and towns, and then declares that the railroad commission shall have jurisdiction to supervise and regulate such utilities and fix rates, etc., provided that the section shall not affect such powers of control over any public utility vested in any city and county or incorporated city or town, as, at an election to be held pursuant to laws to be passed, a majority of the electors voting thereon shall vote to retain, and until such election such powers shall continue unimpaired. Held that, since a city of the sixth class, organized under the general Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 93), had full power to regulate and control rates and service by water companies furnishing water to its inhabitants, such authority could not be exercised by the railroad commission prior to an election voting to delegate such power to the commission.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

4. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 203*)—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY—METERS—DUTY OF WATER COMPANY TO FURNISH.

Const. art. 11, § 19, article 14, § 1, and St. 1881, p. 54, each conferring on cities power to fix rates for water to be delivered to the inhabitants of the city by any company engaged in that service, conferred on a city power to compel such companies to install meters to measure the service at their own expense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 203*)—PUBLIC WATER SUPPLY — CITIES — WATER COMPANIES — DUTY TO PROVIDE SERVICE CONNECTIONS—STATUTES.

Const. art. 11, § 11, declares that any city may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws, and Civ. Code, § 549, gives city authorities power to prescribe proper rules relating to the delivery of water. Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 270) § 862, subd. 14, authorizes cities of the sixth class to punish violations of ordinances by fine and imprisonment as misdemeanors. Held, that a city of the sixth class, incorporated under the general Municipal Corporation Act, had authority to require a municipal water company to furnish consumers with service connections and meters at its own expense, to forbid such companies to charge for meters, and to declare a violation of the ordinance a misdemeanor punishable by fine and imprisonment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

In Bank. Certiorari by the Title Guaranty & Trust Company and another against the Railroad Commission of California, to review an order requiring plaintiffs, as public service water companies, to install meters without charge to consumers. Order annulled.

W. G. Cooke, Tanner, Taft & Odell, and E. W. Sargent, all of Los Angeles, for petitioners. Max Thelen and Douglas Brookman, both of San Francisco, and Jones & Evans, of Los Angeles, for defendant.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding in certiorari, under the provisions of sections 67 and 68 of the Public Utilities Act of 1911 (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 55), to review an order of the state railroad commission requiring the plaintiffs, as public service water companies, to install meters and lay service connections in the city of Glendale, without charge to the consumers.

The plaintiffs, respectively, on October 10, 1911, were and ever since have been engaged in the business of supplying water to the inhabitants of portions of the city of Glendale. They had each made and were enforcing a rule whereby each consumer of water from them, respectively, was charged and compelled to pay $15 for installing a meter and making service connection between the water main of the company in the street and the property line of the consumer. On the application of the city of Glendale, the railroad commission made the order complained of, which is as follows:

> "It is hereby ordered that said rule or regulation be and the same is hereby abrogated, and that said defendants be and they are hereby ordered to make service connections to the property line and install meters free of charge for persons living in the city of Glendale along the mains or pipe lines of said companies and desiring connection for the service of water."

It is contended by the plaintiffs that the railroad commission has no power to supervise or regulate, in this respect, corporations or persons engaged in supplying water to the inhabitants of cities of the sixth class, to which class Glendale belongs.

The powers of the railroad commission over such public utilities are derived from the Public Utilities Act of 1911, enacted in pursuance of the authority given to the Legislature by section 23 of article 12 of the Constitution, as amended on October 10, 1911. Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, xlviii.

[1] A franchise giving the right to furnish water to the inhabitants of a city, at rates to be fixed, and to use the streets as a place in which to lay the necessary pipes, does not authorize the holder to charge consumers for the expense of laying service pipes from the main to consumers along the street, unless such right is conferred by some clause of the franchise or by some provision of law applicable to such service. The franchise to furnish water to the inhabitants includes the duty of conveying the water to the consumer. The inhabitants have been given no right to use the streets at all for the laying of pipes therein. Their use of the streets for that purpose would be a private use. They could not make the connection without unlawfully obstructing the public street. The company, therefore, does not perform its full duty except by laying the service pipes to the premises of the consumer. See Hatch v. Consumers' Co., 17 Idaho, 204, 104 Pac. 670, 40 L. R. A. (N. S.) 263; Consumers' Co. v. Hatch, 224 U. S. 148, 32 Sup. Ct. 465, 56 L. Ed. 703; Pocatello W. Co. v. Standley, 7 Idaho, 155, 61 Pac. 518; Bothwell v. Consumers' Co., 13 Idaho, 568, 92 Pac. 533, 24 L. R. A. (N. S.) 485; Montgomery v. McDade (Ala. App.) 60 South. 798; Pine Bluff v. Toney, 96 Ark. 345, 131 S. W. 680, Ann. Cas. 1912B, 544; International W. Co. v. El Paso, 51 Tex. Civ. App. 321, 112 S. W. 816; Cleveland v. Malden W. Co., 69 Wash. 541, 125 Pac. 769; State ex rel. v. Hoquiam W. Co., 70 Wash. 682, 127 Pac. 304. It is not claimed that there is anything in the nature of a contract between Glendale and either of the plaintiffs that would exempt them, or either of them, from the operation of this rule.

[2] There is no provision of the law of this state making it the duty of the consumer to lay the service pipe, or to pay the expense thereof. Section 549 of the Civil Code implies, if it does not actually express, the doctrine above stated. It declares that:

> "All corporations formed to supply water to cities or towns must furnish pure fresh water to the inhabitants thereof, for family uses, so long as the supply permits, at reasonable rates and without distinction of persons, upon proper demand therefor. * * * The board of supervisors, or the proper city or town authorities, may prescribe proper rules relating to the delivery of water, not inconsistent with the laws of the state."

This makes it the duty of such corporations to deliver the water to the consumer and brings them within the rule. Any corporation actually engaged in supplying water to the inhabitants of a city must be deemed to be a corporation formed for that purpose, in any controversy between it and the consumer, or between it and the city, with regard to its duty under that section. While it continued to enjoy the franchise, it could not escape the duty by showing that its articles of incorporation did not give it the authority to engage in the service. It follows that the regulation was one which could lawfully be imposed on the plaintiffs by the public agency to which the regulating power may be delegated by law.

[3] The opening sentence of said section 23 of the Constitution defines public utilities, including therein almost every conceivable variety of public service, and giving the Legislature power to include others, and declares that every person or corporation in the state engaged in any such service is "subject to such control and regulation by the railroad commission as may be provided by the Legislature." It then declares that the commission "shall have and exercise such power and jurisdiction to supervise and regulate public utilities in the state of California and to fix the rates to be charged for commodities furnished or services rendered as may be conferred upon it by the Legislature, and the right of the Legislature to confer such powers upon the railroad commission respecting public utilities is hereby declared to be plenary and to be unlimited by any provision of this Constitution." This, if not qualified by any other part of the section, would give the Legislature authority to confer upon the commission the power to regulate public utilities in cities, as well as elsewhere. It is not left without qualification, however. The second paragraph of the section, after declaring that, upon the passage of laws conferring upon the railroad commission powers respecting public utilities, all the powers of like character conflicting therewith and previously vested in municipalities shall cease, continues with the following:

> "Provided, however, that this section shall not affect such powers of control over any public utility vested in any city and county, or incorporated city or town as, at an election to be held pursuant to laws to be hereafter passed by the Legislature, a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon of such city and county, or incorporated city or town, shall vote to retain, and until such election such powers shall continue unimpaired; but if the vote so taken shall not favor the continuation of such powers they shall thereafter vest in the railroad commission as provided by law."

Section 82 of the Public Utilities Act is in the same terms as the above proviso.

The effect of these two provisions is that the powers of control over existing public utilities which were vested in any city at the time of the adoption of the amendment and of the taking effect of the Public Utilities Act on March 23, 1912, are still retained by such city, and that such powers do not pass to the railroad commission until, at an election for that purpose pursuant to the act of January 2, 1912 (Stats. Ex. Sess. 1911, p. 168), the qualified electors of the city, voting thereon, shall have voted not to retain such power or powers. The question whether this rule applies to public utilities which have come into existence or have entered a city since the passage of the Public Utilities Act is not here involved, and, as it has been argued in another case pending, we here express no opinion concerning it. No election has been held in Glendale on the question. Therefore Glendale still retains such powers of control over public utilities as it had at the dates of the adoption of the amendment and the passage of the Public Utilities Act, and the railroad commission will not possess them until there is such an election with a result favorable to the transfer thereof to it. The question is therefore fairly presented whether or not, prior to October 10, 1911, the date of the adoption of said constitutional amendment, cities of the sixth class possessed the power to regulate water corporations engaged in supplying water to the inhabitants thereof, with respect to their operations and service within such cities, and in so doing to make such orders or regulations as that made by the commission and above set out. If these cities had such power, then it still remains vested in the city of Glendale; the railroad commission did not have the power; and the order is void.

[4] Section 19, art. 11, and section 1, art. 14, of the Constitution, and the act of March 7, 1881 (Stats. 1881, p. 54), each confer upon the cities in this state the power to fix the rates at which water is to be delivered to the inhabitants of a city by any company engaged in that service. So far as the order forbids a charge for meters, it is a part of this rate fixing power. In order to fix rates according to the exact quantity of water supplied, a meter is necessary. The power to fix rates in that manner must include the power to say who shall provide and pay for the meter to be used to determine the amount the consumer shall pay.

> "The requirement that the party furnishing water shall provide the means necessary for its measurement, so that the quantity furnished and to be paid for may be known, is not an unreasonable regulation. The expense of the meter could not be imposed on the consumer." Spring V. W. W. v. San Francisco, 82 Cal. 316, 22 Pac. 917, 6 L. R. A. 756, 16 Am. St. Rep. 116.
> "A meter is a contrivance to regulate the distribution of water by adjusting the quantity and price. It is therefore within the province of the city board's duties to enable them to fix their rates with exactness, instead of by uncertain estimate, and to deal justly with the consumers" to install such meter. Red Star, etc., Co. v. Jersey City, 45 N. J. Law, 249.

The New Jersey case holds that the city could not charge the consumer for meters. The passage quoted shows, however, that the installation of the meter is directly connected with the rate charge, from which it follows that the requirement that a meter shall be used is an incident of the process of fixing the rate. The power to direct that the company shall not charge the consumer for the meter necessary to determine the amount of water used and the rate to be paid is within the scope of the powers of the city and cannot be vested in the railroad commission, except by a vote of the city.

[5] The regulation of charges for service connections is not so directly related to the fixing of rates. We need not determine whether it is a part of that process or not, for it is included in other powers that were vested in cities at the time stated. Section 549 of the Civil Code, above quoted, gives the city authorities power to "prescribe proper rules relating to the delivery of water." Inasmuch as it is the duty of the water company to deliver the water to the premises of the consumer and to lay the necessary service pipes for that purpose, as a part of the water system of the company, it is also the duty of the company to bear the expense of these pipes. It would be a proper rule for the delivery of the water to prohibit the company from charging this expense to the consumer, or from imposing payment of the charge as a condition precedent to the delivery of water to him. The city of Glendale had exercised this power. It passed an ordinance in 1912 requiring water companies to lay service connections at their own expense on demand, giving them authority to install meters at their own expense, forbidding such companies to charge the consumer for meters, and declaring a violation of the ordinance to be a misdemeanor punishable by a fine, or imprisonment, or both.

Section 11 of article 11 of the Constitution provides that:

> "Any county, city, town, or township may make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws."

There may be some room for doubt whether this would include the power to prohibit charges for service connections within the limits of the city, if it were considered apart from the foregoing clause of section 549 of the Civil Code, giving power to prescribe rules for the delivery of water. Subdivision 14 of section 862 of the Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 270) empowers cities of the sixth class to punish violations of ordinances by fine and imprisonment as misdemeanors. This, in connection with the constitutional provision and the Civil Code, makes it plain that the city of Glendale has ample power to make and enforce the regulation.

It follows that the railroad commission has not yet acquired the power to make regulations of this character for the government of water companies serving the inhabitants of the city of Glendale, and that the order complained of is in excess of its power and for that reason invalid.

It is ordered that said order of the railroad commission be annulled.

The right interpretation having been put on a contract, admission of parol evidence to aid in its construction, when it was not ambiguous or uncertain, was harmless.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by the Provident Gold Mining Company against the Manhattan Securities Company. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Thomas C. Job and Joseph E. Hannon, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover the sum of $88,791.94, alleged to be due it as the purchase price of certain shares of the capital stock of plaintiff, subscribed for by the defendant. Judgment was given for plaintiff, and from that judgment, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The appellant states that the whole controversy centers on the interpretation of the subscription contract. The contract was in the form of a communication by defendant to plaintiff. This communication declared that defendant had given full consideration to the mining operations which plaintiff was conducting, and believed that it would be for the best interest of plaintiff if it expended from $75,000 to $100,000 in the development of the mine; that by so doing the mine would be opened up and its possibilities become certainties. The communication then proceeds in the following language:

"We beg to make you the following offers for blocks of the capital stock of your company; stocks to be delivered to us in amounts as called for and as paid for:

100,000	shares at	25	cents net to your company.
50,000	" "	62½	" " " " "

"It is to be understood between us, if our offer is accepted, that no sales of stock are to be made by your company except to us, and that, unless special arrangements are made, for the first 60 days after operations on the property are commenced, no demands are to be made upon us for amounts exceeding $5,000 per month; that for the next 90 days no demands are to be made upon us for amounts exceeding $7,500 per month, and from that time forward no demands exceeding $10,000 per month are to be made upon us. If this offer is satisfactory to you, we ask that you instruct the proper officers of your company to accept the same by signing the sheet in the space provided below."

[1, 2] This offer of defendant was accepted in writing by plaintiff. Certain payments were made by defendant, as provided in the contract, and, upon its failure and refusal to make later payments, this action was brought. Appellant's contention is that the offer, with its acceptance, amounted to but an option to purchase the stock given by plaintiff to defendant, with the right to defendant to proceed with the purchase of the stock or to decline to proceed, at its pleasure. The trial court, entertaining the view that the language of the contract was somewhat ambiguous and uncertain, admitted evidence touching the circumstances surrounding and attending the contract when it was made. Civ. Code, § 1647, and Code Civ. Proc. 1860. Appellant complains that the introduction of this evidence was error, because the contract is in no respect uncertain or ambiguous, so as to justify the introduction of these explanatory matters, insisting, as has been said, that the contract was a mere option. We agree with appellant's first proposition that the contract is not ambiguous or uncertain, but we disagree with its second contention. The contract was clearly a contract of purchase and sale, as the court found it to be. The admitted evidence, the nature of which it is unnecessary to discuss, is strongly confirmatory of this construction. Since the court set the right interpretation upon the contract, the introduction of this evidence was not injurious. The same result would have been reached necessarily without that evidence.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

1. Statutes (§ 76*)—Special Laws—Practice.

As Const. art. 4, § 25, subds. 3, 33, prohibiting special laws regulating the practice of the courts of justice or in any case where a general law can be made applicable, does not require the Legislature to prescribe uniform provisions for appeals, Act March 21, 1905, § 6 (St. 1905, p. 567), requiring appeals in proceedings to vacate assessments for the lighting of streets to be taken within 30 days after judgment, is not invalid, though prescribing a different limitation from the general law.

Act March 21, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 564), entitled "An act to provide for the lighting of public streets, etc., and for the assessment of the expenses upon the property benefited," is sufficiently broad to include provisions fixing the time for appeals from judgments denying a suit to vacate an assessment for street lighting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by Emily G. Cohen against the City of Alameda. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Jordan, Rowe & Brann, of San Francisco, for appellant. A. F. St. Sure, of Alameda, and Samuel Poorman, Jr., of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The appeal is by the plaintiff from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The defendant moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that it was not taken within the time prescribed by law.

The appeal was taken within less than 60 days, but more than 30 days, after the entry of judgment. Under sections 939 and 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure, this would be within the time prescribed. The contention of the respondent is that the case is governed by the provisions of section 6 of the act of March 21, 1905, providing for the levy of assessments upon a district to pay for lighting the streets therein. Stats. 1905, 567; Deering's Gen. Stats. 645.

The plaintiff began the action in behalf of herself, her children, and all other persons interested in the relief asked. The object of the action was to declare void an assessment under the aforesaid act, levied upon property within an assessment district in the city of Alameda, including property of plaintiff and her children and other persons, and to enjoin a threatened sale of her own property to enforce payment of the sum assessed against it.

[1, 2] The complaint alleges that the assessment was void because of divers defects in the proceedings, and also upon the ground that the act is unconstitutional.

Section 6 of the aforesaid act is as follows:

> "The validity of an assessment levied under this act shall not be contested in any action or proceeding unless the same is commenced within thirty days after the time said assessment is levied, and any appeal from a final judgment in such an action or proceeding must be perfected within thirty days after the entry of such judgment."

It is contended by the appellant that this section is contrary to the mandate of the Constitution of this state prohibiting special laws regulating the practice of courts of justice, or in any case where a general law can be made applicable. Article 4, § 25, subds. 3, 33. She therefore claims that an appeal may be taken in this case, as in other cases, within six months after the entry of the judgment.

It has never been considered that these provisions of the Constitution required the Legislature to prescribe a uniform and single limitation of actions or proceedings, applicable alike to all cases. The Code of Civil Procedure is full of special provisions applicable only to particular classes of cases. Appeals from ordinary final judgments must be taken within six months after entry; from a judgment of forcible entry and detainer in the superior court upon an appeal from an inferior court, in the cases specified in section 964 of the Code of Civil Procedure, within 90 days after entry; from orders in ordinary actions or probate proceedings, within 60 days after entry. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 939, 1715. Appeals from judgments or orders, under section 941b, must be taken within 60 days after service of notice of entry thereof. So also, in the matter of limitation of actions, many different periods are prescribed for the different kinds of actions. As to some of these it might be difficult to discover substantial reasons for the different periods fixed. It has not been supposed that these varying provisions were special laws, such as are forbidden by the above provisions of the Constitution. In general, it may be said that the legislative discretion as to the different modes of procedure or rules of practice to be prescribed for the numerous and various actions and proceedings allowed in courts of justice is very wide, and that its judgment on the question whether or not a particular provision shall be made for any class of cases, and as to the classification thereof, is not to be interfered with, except for very grave causes, and where it is clear beyond reasonable doubt that no sound reason for the legislative classification, and for the different provisions regarding the same, exists. Rep. 199; Gridley v. Fellows, 166 Cal. 765, 138 Pac. 355.

Sufficient reasons for the shorter period of limitation of appeals prescribed by this section appear in the law itself. It provides for the lighting of public streets and public places in cities by assessing the expense thereof upon the owners of property benefited thereby. The assessment may be for either or all of three purposes: First, to construct and erect the necessary poles, wires, conduits, lamps, and the other apparatus constituting what may be designated the permanent part of the improvement; second, to provide for the maintenance of these lighting works and appliances after the same are erected; third, to provide the necessary gas or electricity for use to furnish the light. The permanent works for this purpose would, in general, be much less expensive than other kinds of public improvements, and the assessment to each person would be correspondingly smaller. For the cost of maintenance and cost of light the assessments in each case would be still less to each individual. With regard to the second and third classes, the act provides that the assessment for each shall be for periods not exceeding two years, and a new assessment must therefore be made and collected every two years for these purposes, if the public service is to be maintained under this law. Ordinary street improvements, such as grading, paving, or sewering, are permanent structures which, when completed, the public may immediately and continuously use without further expense and for many years thereafter. Ample time is afforded for the settlement of all questions concerning the validity of such assessments before the improvement has become worn so that a new improvement becomes necessary. Two reasons therefore appear for the shorter limitation in this statute upon the right of appeal. The first is that the sums involved will be trifling and that protracted litigation should not be indulged over the validity thereof. The second is that the short period covered by the assessments for maintenance and light makes it to the interest of all concerned that there should be a speedier settlement of disputes over the validity of such assessments than is required in the larger assessments for improvements of longer duration involved in other kinds of public improvements. These considerations form a sufficient basis for the distinction between assessments under this act and those for the general class of public improvements authorized by other statutes, and justify the limitation of the time for appeal to 30 days after the entry of judgment in any action or proceeding in which the validity of such assessment is contested.

[3] It is further claimed that this particular provision of the act is not embraced within the title thereof. The act is entitled:

> "An act to provide for the lighting of public streets, lanes, alleys, courts and places in municipalities, and for the assessment of the costs and expenses thereof upon the property benefited thereby."

The point does not deserve elaborate consideration. The provision for a special limitation upon appeals in suits involving the validity of assessments under the act is a matter clearly germane to the general subject and appropriate to carry out its object. Robinson v. Kerrigan, 151 Cal. 50, 90 Pac. 129, 121 Am. St. Rep. 90, 12 Ann. Cas. 829; Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 635, 29 Pac. 251; Davies v. Los Angeles, 86 Cal. 43, 24 Pac. 771; Deyoe v. Superior Court, 140 Cal. 488, 74 Pac. 28, 98 Am. St. Rep. 73.

The appeal is dismissed.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, J.; SLOSS, J.; MELVIN, J.; HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. [4] The appellants ask a rehearing of the application for an order dismissing the appeal. Their petition is based on the proposition that section 6 of the assessment act in question does not apply to an action in equity, or to a defense, attacking the validity of an assessment on the ground that the act itself is unconstitutional as a deprivation of property without due process of law. The attack made upon the assessment by the appellants in this action is based wholly upon objections which do not go to the constitutionality of the act under which the assessment was levied, but which involve only the regularity of the proceedings leading up to the assessment. The question whether section 6 is embraced in the title does not affect the validity of the other provisions of the act, and it was not raised, except in resisting the motion to dismiss the appeal. Hence the question whether the limitation of the section applies to actions in equity or other proceedings in which the assessment is alleged to be void because the act under which it is made is void is not involved here, and the decision dismissing the appeal is not to be understood as applying to such question.

PEOPLE v. LAUGENOUR. (Civ. 1192.)

1. DEDICATION (§ 19*)—OFFER TO DEDICATE—SURVEY AND PLATTING.

The survey, platting, marking, and mapping of lands showing a strip through the same for highway purposes, and the filing of the map with the county recorder, constitutes an offer of dedication of the land for a highway as delineated on the map.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37–47; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

2. DEDICATION (§ 19*)—PLATTING—ACTS OF VENDEE—RATIFICATION.

The act of a vendee under a contract of sale, in platting, mapping, and recording a map of land showing a strip for a highway, was sufficient to constitute a valid offer to dedicate, where the vendors acquiesced in and ratified the platting by subsequently making deeds of conveyance by reference to the map and the highway in question as delineated thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37–47; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

3. DEDICATION (§ 16*)—OFFER TO DEDICATE—ACCEPTANCE—PROOF.

Offer of a landowner to dedicate a highway and its acceptance by the public may be manifested in any number of ways indicating an intent to dedicate and to accept.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 15–49; Dec. Dig. § 16.*]

4. DEDICATION (§ 29*)—LAND FOR HIGHWAY—ACCEPTANCE.

Where a binding offer to dedicate land for a highway has been made by the owner, and before revocation of the offer an acceptance by the public is manifested, either by a formal act of the authorities, or by habitual user by the public, long enough to show clearly that it was thus recognized, used, and accepted by the public as a highway, a valid dedication is fully consummated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. § 79; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

5. DEDICATION (§ 19*)—CONSTRUCTIVE DEDICATION—WHAT CONSTITUTES.

Where the owner of land has platted it, laid out streets or roadways, and has sold the land by reference to the plat, or in selling smaller subvisions has described them as bounded by a road laid out through the larger tract, a constructive dedication arises.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37–47; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

6. DEDICATION (§ 19*)—HIGHWAYS—ACCEPTANCE—USER—EVIDENCE.

Owners of land had it surveyed and subdivided, with a roadway running through it, on which smaller subdivisions abutted. As so subdivided and marked, the land was platted, and the owners caused the map to be filed as a public record. They sold many of the smaller subdivisions according to the plat, with the road delineated thereon, and for at least 20 years the roadway was customarily and continuously used by purchasers of the smaller tracts and by any part of the public having occasion to travel over it, without objection. Held, to show a valid dedication, notwithstanding the fact that the road was closed by a gate at both ends and parts of the land in the road were cultivated and planted to trees, cereals, or vegetables, or used as pasture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dedication, Cent. Dig. §§ 35, 37–47; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

7. DEDICATION (§ 51*)—HIGHWAYS—WIDTH OF WAY.

Where there is a finding or indisputable evidence that a roadway as dedicated was of a specified width, the fact that the main travel was customarily confined to narrower limits is not conclusive of the width of the road, nor did the fact that the sides of the road were otherwise used for agriculture constitute any evidence of an intention to revoke the dedication, or limit the road to the track customarily traveled.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by the People against Charles T. Laugenour, to establish the existence of a public highway and to compel the removal of obstructions therefrom, etc. From a judgment in favor of defendant, complainant appeals. Reversed.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, for appellant. Arthur C. Huston, of Woodland, for respondent.

HART, J. This is an action instituted in the name and on behalf of the people of the state of California by the district attorney of Yolo county against the defendant, for the purpose of securing a decree that a certain strip of land situated in said county and specifically described in the complaint be declared a public highway, that certain obstructions alleged to have been placed and to be maintained on said land be abated or removed, "and that the defendant be enjoined from further maintaining said obstructions, or any of them upon, over, across, or along said highway, and for costs of suit." The strip of land in dispute is described as being a roadway 60 feet wide, running west from the Knight's Landing and Woodland road, across Coward's subdivision of the Marston tract, and bounded on the north by lots 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17 and on the south by lots 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, and 11 of said Coward's subdivision of the Marston tract, according to the map or plat thereof on file and of record in the office of the county recorder of said county of Yolo. It is alleged in the complaint that said strip of land "is now, and for more than 24 years last past has been, a public highway, dedicated and abandoned to the public, and accepted and used by the public during all of said time as a public highway"; that the same "is a public highway, duly and legally accepted as a public highway by the board of supervisors of the county of Yolo," etc. The complaint then charges that the defendant, on or about the 16th day of May, 1912, and prior to the filing of the complaint herein, "plowed up said highway, and erected, constructed, built, and maintained a levee and other embankments, excavations, cuts, and ditches over and across said highway, and that said defendant tore up the roadway and the roadbed of the said highway and left said roadbed in great lumps and clods," that said highway is still being maintained by the defendant in the condition as thus described, and that thereby the right of the public to travel over and along said highway in the usual and customary manner is interfered with. The answer denies that the land described in the complaint was ever a public highway, dedicated or abandoned to the public, or accepted or used by the public at any time for that purpose; denies that said land was ever dedicated for the purpose of a public highway, or duly or legally accepted for such purposes by the board of supervisors of the county of Yolo; admits that the defendant did, at about the time mentioned in the complaint, make certain excavations in and erect certain embankments on said land, and that he is still maintaining thereon said embankments, etc., but avers that the defendant had a legal right to do said work "and to do or perform any act done or performed by him on said lands and premises, and referred to in said complaint." Further answering said complaint, the defendant "alleges that the said lands and premises do not constitute a public highway, and the said plaintiff herein has no interest whatever in said right of way, and the public has no interest therein, and the same does not constitute a highway." The findings of the court coincide with the denials and admissions of the answer, and the defendant was accordingly awarded judgment, from which this appeal, supported by a transcript of the testimony, is prosecuted by the plaintiff, said appeal having been taken under the new or alternative method prescribed by sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure.

The undisputed facts are: That, on the 12th day of November, 1886, W. W. Brownell and J. D. Laugenour, having previously purchased from one H. F. Marston a certain tract of land, situate in Yolo county, entered into the following agreement respecting said land with one W. M. Coward:

> "The parties of the first part [Brownell and Laugenour] bind themselves to deed said land above referred to, in tracts or parcels as the same shall be sold by the party of the second part [Coward], and to make good and sufficient deeds to the purchasers, provided that no expense for conveyancing shall accrue to the parties of the first part. The party of the second part agrees not to sell any of said land at less than one hundred dollars per acre, without the consent of said parties of the first part, and to apply the entire proceeds of each sale at the time such sales may be made to the payment of a certain promissory note of even date herewith given by said second party to parties of the first part for the sum of thirteen thousand dollars, with ten per cent. interest, and due on or before two years from date. As soon as complete payment shall have been made of the principal and interest of said described note, the parties of the first part agree to convey all of said land that may remain unsold to the said party of the second part, or to his heirs or assigns, free from all incumbrances. This agreement is for the security of the said sum of money and it is intended as a bond for a deed to the party of the second part, but the obligations of the parties of the first part under this agreement to the party of the second part shall cease at the expiration of two years from the date hereof or at the date of the expiration of the above described note. * * *
> "And it is further agreed by and between the said parties that all rents, issues and profits arising from the said above described premises shall accrue to the said W. M. Coward, the party of the second part, for the term of two years from the date of this agreement."

The foregoing agreement, duly signed and acknowledged by the parties thereto, was recorded in the office of the county recorder of Yolo county, on the 15th day of December, 1886. Subsequently to the filing for record of the said agreement, Coward caused the tract of land described therein to be surveyed, and subdivided the same into smaller tracts. This survey called for and located a roadway across said entire tract, 60 feet in width, and running east and west, and connecting on the east with the county road running in a northerly and southerly direction from the town of Knight's Landing to the city of Woodland. A map or plat of said subdivision, including the roadway in question, as so surveyed and laid out, was, at the instigation and under the supervision of said Coward, made and completed by the surveyor on the 28th day of January, 1887, and said Coward caused the same to be filed for recordation with the county recorder of Yolo county on the 10th day of June, 1887, and it was on that day duly recorded by that officer. The roadway so laid out and delineated on said map was fenced off. The smaller tracts or subdivisions were then placed upon the market for sale, and all that were sold, of which there were many, were conveyed by reference and according to the said map or plat. Among the lots of said subdivision conveyed by J. D. Laugenour and W. W. Brownell, under their agreement with said Coward, was one to F. M. Price. The deed to Price reserved "to the grantors one acre in the S. W. corner of the tract described, to be laid out as nearly square as may be, and a right of way over the tract sold to the tract reserved." On June 11, 1887, said Laugenour and Brownell, in pursuance of their contract with Coward, conveyed to Messrs. Allison & Treat portions of the Coward subdivision, and which embraced 172.69 acres. The deed to Allison & Treat contained, as in effect do all the deeds conveying portions of said subdivision, the following provisions:

> "* * * Also a roadway over the route heretofore reserved in the deed to F. M. Price, and the right to use the acre reserved in said deed in common with all purchasers of portions of said Marston tract and right of way for irrigating ditches as designated on the plat of said subdivision."

On August 9, 1889, Allison & Treat conveyed the land described said deed to one George Poinsett, the said deed containing the same language concerning a roadway, etc., as that above quoted, and, on May 31, 1893, Poinsett conveyed the same land or tract to the defendant in this action, C. T. Laugenour, the deed to the latter following the language relative to the roadway, etc., contained in the two previous deeds referred to. On the 7th day of March, 1905, the board of supervisors of Yolo county adopted a resolution purporting to be and intended as a formal acceptance of the avenue or roadway in controversy as a public highway. It will thus be noted that there elapsed between the date of the recordation of the map of the subdivision and the date of the purported acceptance by the board of supervisors of the roadway as a public highway a period of almost 18 years. The undisputed evidence shows that the avenue in question was, at all times and continuously after the sale of lots in the subdivision through which it passes, used by the purchasers of said lots and their successors in interest and such other persons as had business or other relations with those residing in said subdivision. The evidence further shows that the county never did any work on said roadway or otherwise recognized it as a public highway until about and after the time of the adoption by its board of supervisors of the resolution purporting to accept said roadway as a public highway, and above referred to. It appears that, some time prior to the year of 1893, a fence had been erected along the entire north boundary line of the roadway. It also appears to be an undisputed fact that the defendant or his predecessors in interest planted a row of olive trees in the road some six or eight feet south of the fence just mentioned. Others owning lots abutting upon the roadway also cultivated portions of the same in one form or another. There remained at all times, however, an open and unobstructed track in the roadway of about 20 or 25 feet in width, and it was this track or way over which the people traveled back and forth through the Marston or Coward subdivision. The people owning property in said subdivision occasionally, or whenever it was necessary to facilitate the convenient use of the road, worked on and improved the roadway. It was shown that some of the owners of property in the Diggs subdivision had on various occasions worked on and graded the road. The evidence shows that for quite a period of time a fence was maintained across the west end of the avenue or roadway, or at a point where what was known as the "Diggs Subdivision" adjoins the Coward subdivision. This fence had been removed prior to the time at which the defendant became the owner of his tract of land in the latter subdivision. At the east end of the roadway, where it intersects with the county road running between Woodland and Knight's Landing, a gate or a "panel" had always been maintained. This gate was generally kept open until the defendant came to the subdivision, after which he aimed and endeavored to keep it closed. A controversy arose between the owners of property in the subdivision and the defendant over the matter of the closing of the gate, the defendant insisting that the gate should be kept closed and the other owners of land in the subdivision claiming that to keep the gate closed would be in violation of their rights. This controversy led to the proceedings by the board of supervisors whereby the county attempted formally to indicate its acceptance of the roadway as a public highway. It is admitted that the road was constantly used for a period of about 20 years before the institution of this action, not only by the residents of the Marston or Coward subdivision, but also by those residing on the Diggs subdivision, which, as seen, joins the former subdivision on the west. The defendant himself testified that the road was and had been for many years used by the residents of the Coward subdivision and by other people having business with or occasion to visit the residents of said subdivision.

The foregoing embraces a statement, in substance, of all the important evidence produced at the trial, and, as before stated, it is admitted that the facts thereby established are true.

The defendant contends that, while he has never denied, nor does he now deny, that the road in question constitutes a private way for the use of the owners of the lands situated in the Coward subdivision, said roadway is not a public highway. Indeed, in his testimony, the defendant goes so far as to declare that ownership of the land constituting the roadway was in him, but that he did not "deny the people the privilege of passing over it." In support of his position, the defendant emphasizes the following propositions of fact developed by the evidence: That the county never worked the road and never made any attempt to accept it as a highway until about 18 years after the map of the Coward subdivision was recorded; that, at the time of the filing of said map, both ends of the roadway were inclosed, either with a fence or a panel; that at all times the east end was closed with either a panel or a gate; that, since said "strip of land does not touch a county road on the west, the same was not thrown open to the public" at any time from the date of the filing of the map to the present time; that the avenue has been used for pasture purposes, and that "it has never been traveled except by persons residing on the subdivision and those who had business with them."

[1] It cannot be doubted that the survey, platting, marking, and mapping of the lands concerned here, and the filing of said map with the county recorder, constituted an offer of dedication of the roadway delineated on said map as a public highway. People v. Reed, 81 Cal. 70, 22 Pac. 474, 15 Am. St. Rep. 22; Forsyth v. Dunnagan, 94 Cal. 438, 441, 29 Pac. 770; Prescott v. Edwards, 117 Cal. 298, 49 Pac. 178, 59 Am. St. Rep. 186; City of Los Angeles v. Kysor, 125 Cal. 463, 58 Pac. 90; Davidow v. Griswold, 137 Pac. 619.

[2] The point first urged by the defendant that the acts of Coward in platting, mapping, and recording the map cannot be held to be an offer of dedication for the reason that he was not the owner of the land, and therefore had no right or authority to make the offer, is without force, inasmuch as it is undisputed that the tract was subdivided and the road in question laid out by Coward under his agreement with Laugenour and Brownell and by the authority of the latter, and since, furthermore, Laugenour and Brownell acquiesced in and ratified the act of platting the tract as delineated on the map by making their deeds of conveyance by reference to said map and the road in question as outlined thereon.

[3] The single question remaining is: Does the evidence disclose that there was an acceptance of said offer of dedication of said road by the public? It is very doubtful whether the purported formal acceptance of the offer of dedication of said road as a public highway by the board of supervisors under the circumstances as above indicated may be held to be a legal acceptance. This question need not, however, be decided here.

> "The offer of the owner to dedicate may be manifested in a hundred different ways; and the acceptance of the offer by the public may be manifested in a like number of ways." City of Los Angeles v. Kysor, supra.

[4] If a binding offer to dedicate has been made by the owner and before revocation of such offer by any act or acts of the donor an acceptance of the offer by the public is manifested either by a formal act of the public authorities or by habitual user by the public a sufficient length of time clearly to show that it was thus recognized, used, and accepted by the public as a public highway, then the dedication is fully consummated.

[5] And it has been held that where the owner of land has platted the same and laid out streets or roadways and has sold the land by reference to said plat, or where he has a map or plat made and, in selling the smaller subdivisions, has described them as bounded by a road laid out through the larger tract, a constructive dedication arises. It is true that some of the cases hold that the acts last referred to do not in strictness constitute a dedication, but that their effect is to work an estoppel in pais, precluding the donor or owner of the lands through which the way passes, and all claiming under him, from asserting any ownership inconsistent with the use of the way as such. Elliott on Roads and Streets (3d Ed.) p. 147; Brown v. Manning, 6 Ohio, 298, 27 Am. Dec. 255; M. E. Church v. Mayor, etc., of Hoboken, 33 N. J. Law, 13, 97 Am. Dec. 697; Oregon City v. Oregon Street Railroad, Oregon Supreme Court, 44 Or. 446, 74 Pac. 926; Davidow v. Griswold, supra. But whether the acts mentioned amount strictly to a dedication or merely work an estoppel in pais, precluding the owner from claiming rights in or over the street or roadway inconsistent with their use by the public as a public way, is immaterial, for, as is said in Davidow v. Griswold, supra, the result is the same.

In Smith v. San Luis Obispo, 95 Cal. 463, 30 Pac. 591, it is said:

> "Independently of the statute, however, we think the use of the street by the public for a reasonable length of time, where the intention of the owner to dedicate is clearly shown, is sufficient, without any specific action by the municipal authorities, either by resolution or by repairs or improvements. A common-law dedication operates against the dedicator by estoppel, and this estoppel may be invoked by or on behalf of the public at large, as well as by the municipal authorities of the city; for a street is a highway for the use and benefit of the public at large, though under the immediate care of the municipality."

In Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L. R. A. 145, it is said:

> "Dedication is an ultimate fact, dependent upon the establishment of other facts, and is to be found from the evidence presented to the court. Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 648. It results from the acts of the owner of the land, coupled with the intent with which he does those acts. It may be express, and completed by a single act, as when the land is dedicated by deed, or it may be implied from a series of acts, as when the owner subdivides a tract of land into blocks and streets, and causes a map of such subdivision to be recorded, and sells the several subdivisions which front upon those streets. Whenever the dedication is complete, the property thereby becomes public property, and the owner loses all control over it or right to its use. Even though the acceptance presumed from an express dedication may not impose upon the public all the obligations that an express acceptance would impose, yet the owner is as much concluded by his dedication in the one case as in the other. If the dedication is complete by his act, whether express or implied, it is thereafter irrevocable by him, and the effect of such dedication cannot be qualified by any act or declaration thereafter made on his part. The property dedicated has become public property, impressed with the use for which it was dedicated, and neither can the public divert it from that use, nor can it be lost by adverse possession. Nor is the effect of such dedication impaired by any delay in the use of the land for which it was set apart. Such failure to make use of the land does not authorize the owner to resume possession. The public can thereafter appropriate the land to the use for which it was dedicated whenever convenience or necessity may suggest."

After quoting the foregoing excerpt from the Archer Case, this court, in Davidow v. Griswold, supra, adds:

> "A very large number of cases from other jurisdictions holding similarly is cited by respondents, but we may forego specific consideration of them. In some it is assigned as a sufficient reason for saying that the dedication is complete that the purchasers represent the public; that the latter is not a distinct class from the former; that the purchasers are as much a part of the public as those who use the streets for the purpose of travel; and that they have equal authority to accept a dedication of the street for the public."

[6] We can see no escape from the conclusion that the facts of the present case bring it clearly within the rule enunciated in the foregoing cases.

It is true that the question of dedication "is an ultimate fact, dependent upon the establishment of other facts, and is to be found from the evidence presented to the court." Harding v. Jasper, 14 Cal. 648; Archer v. Salinas City, 93 Cal. 43, 28 Pac. 839, 16 L. R.

A. 145. In this case, however, as we have shown, the facts are undisputed. The filing of the map with the county recorder constituted a clear and unquestionable manifestation by the owners of the subdivision of an intention to dedicate the roadway in question to the use and benefit of the public. The evidence undoubtedly shows, and, indeed, it is admitted, that the public continuously used the road from the time that it was laid out and the map was filed. To recapitulate briefly the evidence, we find this situation presented in this case: That owners of a tract of land had the same surveyed and subdivided into smaller tracts, with a roadway running through the larger tract and upon which the smaller subdivisions abutted; that, as so subdivided and marked out, the land was platted and mapped and the owners caused the map to be filed as a public record; that they sold many of the smaller subdivisions according to the plat as indicated by said map, the road in question being delineated thereon; that for at least 20 years said roadway has been customarily and continuously used by the purchasers of the smaller tracts and by any part of the public having occasion to use or travel over the same, no objection, until the defendant objected, ever having been made against the use of the road by the public.

The fence across the west end of the Coward subdivision was there when the tract was subdivided, platted, and mapped, as was likewise the gate at the east end. These circumstances cannot therefore be regarded as evidence of an intention in the owners of the tract to revoke the offer of dedication.

[7] Nor, under the circumstances of this case, can the fact that certain parts of the roadway as delineated and described on the map filed with the public recorder were cultivated and planted to trees and cereals or vegetables or used as pasture be accorded any significance as proof of the revocation of the dedication. The roadway as laid out was 60 feet in width, and it was so outlined on the map. The uncontradicted evidence shows that it was the purchasers of lots in the subdivision, and not the original owners or dedicators, who cultivated portions of the roadway, and there is no claim by any who so cultivated said roadway, except the defendant, that they did so as a matter of right, or with any intention of indicating a revocation of the dedication. Where there is a finding or, as here, indisputable evidence that a roadway dedicated to the use of the public is, as so dedicated, of a certain width, the fact, if it be a fact, that the main travel has customarily been confined to narrower limits than the width of the road as marked out and dedicated is not conclusive of the width of the road. S. P. Co. v. City of Pomona, 144 Cal. 339, 77 Pac. 929. And in this case, as stated, the circumstances under which portions of the roadway were so used do not constitute the slightest evidence of an intention to revoke the dedication or to limit the width of the road to the track which has been customarily traveled.

It seems to us that it would be difficult to conceive how a much stronger case of constructive dedication than the present could well be developed. As is said in Davidow v. Griswold, supra, so it is true here:

> "The owner has voluntarily placed himself in a position where equity will not permit him to deny thereafter that the said streets and parks are as represented by him; and, independent of the statement that they have been dedicated to public use, the other acts of the owner, considered in connection with the said purchases under conditions mentioned, would preclude the said owner from contending, at least as far as said purchasers are concerned, that they are not streets and parks. *And if they are to be considered as really streets * * * when we regard the rights of the purchasers, it is difficult to understand how their status would be changed when we regard the rights of the public generally.*"

Our conclusion is that the uncontroverted evidence and admitted facts beyond doubt show that there was in this case a fully completed dedication, that the findings are not justified, and that the judgment is, consequently, erroneous.

The answer admits that the defendant has excavated and otherwise obstructed the highway in question, and it follows from the conclusion at which we have arrived that he has done so without any legal authority.

The judgment is reversed.

FITZSIMMONS v. WILKS. (Civ. 1473.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 30, 1914.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 188*)—BALLOTS—CONSTRUCTION.

While the intent of a voter must in the first instance be ascertained from the ballot, the ballot, if ambiguous, must be construed as any other paper writing, and hence evidence of the surrounding circumstances is admissible.

2. ELECTIONS (§ 293*)—BALLOTS—VALIDITY.

In view of Pol. Code, § 1205, providing that an elector may vote for a candidate whose name is not printed on the ballot by writing the name of such person in the blank space left therefor, ballots marked merely with the surname of a candidate at a recall election will be counted in his favor, where the candidate was the only one of that name, and the only other persons of that name in the locality were members of his family, who were not seeking the office.

Daugherty & Lacey, of Salinas, and S. W. Mack, of Monterey, for appellant. H. G. Jorgensen, of Monterey, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. At a special election held in Pacific Grove township, Monterey county, the plaintiff and defendant were candidates for the office of justice of the peace in the event that the then incumbent of the office should be recalled. The election resulted in the recall of the then incumbent, and, upon a canvass of the returns, the defendant was declared elected to the office for the unexpired term. Subsequently plaintiff instituted proceedings in the superior court of Monterey county, under the provisions of part 3, tit. 2, of the Code of Civil Procedure, contesting the right of the defendant to the office. The lower court rendered and entered judgment in favor of the plaintiff, declaring him to have been elected to the office, and directing that a certificate to that effect be issued to him by the county clerk. The defendant has appealed from the judgment.

A recount in open court of the admitted legal ballots cast at the election in question disclosed beyond dispute that 176 votes were cast for A. M. Fitzsimmons, the plaintiff; 217 for Joseph Wilks, the defendant; and 3 votes for one R. M. Fitzsimmons. In addition, however, to the undisputed ballots, the recount showed that there were 49 ballots cast at the election, bearing merely the surname "Fitzsimmons," which, over the objection of the defendant that it was impossible to ascertain for whom they were intended, were admitted in evidence and counted for the plaintiff, thereby increasing his total vote to 225, and giving him a majority over the defendant of eight votes. The correctness of the court's ruling in counting these particular ballots is the only point presented for review.

[1, 2] We are of the opinion that, under all of the particular and peculiar facts and circumstances surrounding the election in controversy, the lower court did not err in the ruling complained of. Those facts and circumstances, as revealed by the bill of exceptions accompanying the judgment roll, may, in so far as they are pertinent to the point under discussion, be briefly stated as follows: The plaintiff became a candidate for the office in question by simply making an announcement of his candidacy and personally soliciting the support of voters throughout the township in which the election was held. His candidacy was announced daily, for a period of about 30 days preceding the election, in two daily newspapers printed and published in Monterey county, and which had in the aggregate a regular daily circulation of 495 copies in the township in which the election was held. Prior to and at the time of the election, there were but four persons bearing the surname Fitzsimmons residing in the township, all of whom were duly registered electors and eligible to the office of justice of the peace. They were the plaintiff, A. M. Fitzsimmons, his wife, Mary J. Fitzsimmons, and his two sons, R. M. Fitzsimmons and E. W. Fitzsimmons. The plaintiff, however, was the only one person of the name of Fitzsimmons, who sought the office in question and announced his candidacy therefor; and all the aforesaid members of his family sought and endeavored to bring about his election. The surname Fitzsimmons was written upon each of the 49 ballots in question by the voter casting the same. It does not appear in the bill of exceptions or elsewhere in the record how or in what manner the defendant became a candidate for the office in question; that is to say, the record before us does not show whether the defendant was nominated for that office by petition or otherwise, or whether he, as did the plaintiff, merely announced his candidacy and trusted to the voters to write his name upon the ballots. Incidentally it appears that R. M. Fitzsimmons, who, notwithstanding that he was not a candidate for the office, received three votes, had for four years held the office of city treasurer of Pacific Grove, and had been defeated for that office at an election held in June, 1912.

It is the general rule that the intent of a voter must be in the first instance ascertained from the ballot itself; and that such intent cannot, by proof of extrinsic circumstances, be shown to be other than that plainly and unequivocally expressed upon the face of the ballot. Maddux v. Walthall, 141 Cal. 412, 74 Pac. 1026. This general rule, however, is subject to the exception that, where the intent of the voter is doubtful, the ballot must be construed as any other paper writing; and therefore evidence of facts and circumstances of public notoriety concerning the candidates and connected with the election may be resorted to for the purpose of ascertaining the intention of the voter. Rutledge v. Crawford, 91 Cal. 526, 27 Pac. 779, 13 L. R. A. 761, 25 Am. St. Rep. 212; Payne's Law of Elections, § 550. Section 1205 of the Political Code provides that an elector may vote "for a candidate or person whose name is not printed in the ballot by writing a name for such office in the blank space left therefor." The plaintiff, A. M. Fitzsimmons, was the only person of that name who was an avowed, known, and active candidate for the office in controversy. There was no evidence to show that any person by the name of Fitzsimmons other than the plaintiff, or that any member of the plaintiff's family, was known or understood by the electors of the township to be a candidate for the office; and, in the absence of competent evidence to the contrary, the presumption must be that the electors intended to vote for the only Fitzsimmons who was either known to or heard of by them as a candidate for that office. It is a fair inference from all the facts and circumstances of the present case that the 49 voters who wrote in the name of Fitzsimmons in the blank space left in the ballot for voting for the office of justice of the peace intended thereby to vote for the only Fitzsimmons who was announced and known as a candidate for the office. This inference is fortified, we think, by the fact that the only other persons bearing the name of Fitzsimmons and residing in the township in which the election was held were the wife and two sons of the plaintiff, all of whom sought and endeavored to accomplish the election of the plaintiff. It is not improbable that the three voters who cast their votes for R. M. Fitzsimmons had in mind the plaintiff, because he was the only person by the name of Fitzsimmons residing in the township who was a candidate for that office. However that may be, having written upon their ballots the surname and initials of a person who resided within the county and who was eligible to the office, the law conclusively presumes that those voters intended to do that which they actually did. But assuming, aside from the presumption of law, that these voters actually intended to vote for R. M. Fitzsimmons and not for the plaintiff, it does not necessarily follow that there exists such an uncertainty as to the intent of the 49 voters who merely wrote in the name of Fitzsimmons on their ballots as would preclude such ballots from being counted for the plaintiff. Of course, if R. M. Fitzsimmons as well as the plaintiff, A. M. Fitzsimmons, had been an avowed and announced candidate for the office, the uncertainty as to which Fitzsimmons the 49 ballots in controversy were intended for would have been so pronounced as to require a ruling refusing to count them at all. No such situation, however, confronts us in the present case.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Lassen County; H. D. Burroughs, Judge.

John Pedde and John Hendricks were convicted of assault with intent to murder, and appeal. Affirmed.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, R. M. Rankin, of Susanville, and T. Selvage, of San Francisco, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CHIPMAN, P. J. It was charged in the information that Wilson Duke, John Pedde, and John Hendricks, at Lassen county, on the 26th day of April, 1913, with a deadly weapon, to wit, a rifle, made an assault upon the person of F. P. Cady, and did then and there shoot and wound, with intent then and there to kill and murder, him (the said Cady). Duke had a separate trial, with what result does not appear. Pedde and Hendricks were jointly tried, and the jury rendered a verdict of guilty as charged, recommending them to the mercy of the court. Judgment of conviction followed, and they were each sentenced to imprisonment for the term of three years at San Quentin. The appeal is from the judgment.

The only claim made for reversal is that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, and that no greater offense was shown than simple assault.

The defense of the Indians seems to have been in charge of Mr. T. H. Selvage, deputy United States attorney, and the prosecution was conducted by the district attorney of the county.

F. P. Cady and Joseph R. Nelligan were, on April 26, 1913, fish and game wardens. On that day they arrested a party of 11 Indians, old and young, whom they found, about the hour of noon, fishing and having fish in their possession, in violation of a county ordinance, at Cedar creek, about eight miles from the town of Madeline. After being placed under arrest, Nelligan searched each one of the party for arms and fish and found no weapons but all had fish. They left the fishing ground, Cady and Nelligan on foot and the Indians on horseback, Cady in front and Nelligan at the rear of the party. They had gone about one mile to a point, near some buildings, without anything noticeable occurring. What then took place was testified to by Cady and Nelligan. Cady testified that at this point defendant Hendricks was riding beside him, defendant Pedde immediately behind Hendricks, and Duke directly behind witness Cady. What occurred will be given in the witness' language:

"When you arrived at these buildings, what happened there? A. Some one behind and to my right said, 'How far are we going?' I looked over my shoulder and said, 'To Madeline.' The defendant John Pedde replied, 'Can't go to Madeline, too far.' I then stopped and turned partially around and said, 'You have to go to Madeline; that is the nearest place; no other place to take you.' He replied, 'Can't go to Madeline; got to talk that over,' and commenced to get off his horse. Q. What did you do then? A. I immediately turned to my left and found Wilson Duke off his horse and so close to me, just putting his hands on me. So close to me that I couldn't get the muzzle of my rifle down to shoot. I then, when I found I could not shoot, raised the rifle to strike him, and he caught the barrel of the rifle. Q. Where was John Hendricks and John Pedde at that time? A. Almost at the same instant or so close to it that I could not tell any difference in the time, the defendant John Pedde jumped on my back and caught me around the shoulders, and Hendricks caught me by this arm. Q. Go on and relate what happened. A. The rifle was taken away from me. Wilson Duke had it and then stepped back sideways from me with the gun in this position, looking back toward the rear where Nelligan was. Q. Toward the rear of the column? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was John Pedde and Hendricks doing then? A. They held on to me, and sometimes I was down on my knees and sometimes up until I finally got loose from them. All the time I was trying to get my pistol out that I had in a scabbard. When I got loose they immediately ran. I looked for Wilson Duke, and he stood behind a little pile of lumber about perhaps 15 steps from me. I can't estimate the distance correctly. He was in an upright position, with the gun in this position looking back somewhere towards the rear of the column. I looked to see where Nelligan was. Mr. Selvage: We object to this on the ground it is immaterial and irrelevant. There is no charge here in this case against Wilson Duke. Duke is not on trial, and the testimony as to what Duke did from this point on is immaterial. The Court: Overruled. A. And saw Nelligan lying on the ground, face downward, apparently dead. I then shot at Wilson Duke twice without any apparent effect, and didn't even make him look around and notice me. The third time I took a deliberate aim and saw the bullet hit the ground between he and I close to his feet. He immediately turned and raised the gun to shoot, and I started and ran for a little building directly below the road and a little distance off to get behind that. As I ran I heard the report of a rifle once when I was part way to the house. Just as I got to the corner of the house and started to turn, I heard the report again, and the bullet struck me. Q. Where did it strike you? A. In back here, and came out here in the side. Q. How were you armed, Mr. Cady? A. With a 30-30 Winchester rifle and 32 caliber automatic Colt's revolver. * * *"

A map was used and different positions of the parties noted on it, but no map was sent up with the record.

"* * * Q. Now, Mr. Cady, you say that Wilson Duke succeeded in getting this rifle away from you? A. The three of them did. Q. What was John Pedde and John Hendricks doing? Relate what they were doing at that time. A. John Pedde had me around the shoulders partially on my back and round the shoulders, and John Hendricks had me pulling on this arm, and Hendricks pulling me back from the shoulder, or Pedde on the shoulder. Q. Did you succeed in getting away from them? A. Yes, after a little time. Q. What became of them after you got loose; do you know? A. I don't know. Q. Can you indicate on the map the object there that would represent the little house behind which you ran? A. This one down here. Q. Are you able to approximate the distance of that house from the place where this occurrence took place? A. Approximately —you say where the occurrence took place; you mean from this point? Q. Yes, sir. A. Approximately between 45 and 50 yards. * * * Q. At the time of this skirmish there, what became of the other Indians? A. I don't know. Q. When this shooting or when this shot struck you in the back as you state, did you fall? A. I made one or two short steps and then—I shouldn't say fell. I lay down behind the house. Q. Did you see any of the Indians after that? A. I saw one. Q. Do you know which one it was? A. I could not say positively. To the best of my knowledge it was Hendricks. Q. Where was he? A. Riding a white horse going along the hillside along here and leading a dark colored, bay or brown, horse with an empty saddle."

The testimony of the Indians was that they all took to flight as soon as the shooting commenced.

On cross-examination Cady was asked what Duke did when he got the gun, and replied:

"Stepped right out still facing me this way. He stepped off sideways with the gun this way, looking back in this direction. Q. How did you come to notice he was facing in that particular position when two men had you down or forcing you down? A. It was all in an instant's time, and when he got the gun I naturally kept my eye on the gun, expecting to see him use it on me. Instead of that he kept looking back the other way and took no further notice of me that I saw. Q. How far did he go? A. I couldn't tell how far it was. Q. There is a lumber pile marked here. A. That represents a lumber pile. Q. We will mark that X5. How far from that point was it to where Wilson Duke went after he got the gun from you? A. How far from which point? Q. From X5."

The question was not answered, but later along he estimated it:

"* * * Q. How long was it after John Pedde and John Hendricks grappled with you that they left you? A. I couldn't tell you. Q. Do you know where they went? A. No, sir. Q. Why didn't you watch them? A. I was too busy. Q. They were the ones you were busy with? A. Not after they left me. Q. Why did they leave you? A. I got loose and got the pistol and saw them go. I didn't know where they went; I didn't watch them. Q. Had you forced them loose from you? A. I couldn't tell you. Q. Do you know whether they left you alone and run away? A. I could not say. Q. Did you pay any further attention to them? A. No, sir. Q. Why didn't you? A. I was looking for the man with the gun. Q. You knew they were harmless was the reason you didn't pay any further attention to them? A. No, sir. The reason was I wanted to see where the man with the gun was. Q. The man with the gun wasn't looking at you? A. Not when I looked at him he wasn't. Q. You pulled a pistol and fired at him? A. Yes, sir. Q. He was still looking the other way? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you fired again? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he was still looking the other way? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you fired a third shot? A. Yes, sir. Q. And struck the dirt at his feet and threw up dirt at his feet? A. Somewheres in the neighborhood of his feet. Q. And threw up dirt all around him? A. No, sir; it didn't throw up dirt all around him. There is sand there, and it threw up a little cloud of sand at his feet. Q. How close did it strike to his feet? A. I couldn't estimate. Q. And that attracted his attention? A. I presume so; something did. * * * Q. Did you hear any shots during that time? A. None but my own. Q. When you saw the dirt fly up and his attention was called to your shot, what did he do? A. I didn't say his attention was attracted by my shot, but what he did was to turn toward me and start to raise the rifle. Q. Show me where you were standing at the time, as near as you can. I want you to tell us as near as you can. A. As near as I could judge, when I think it over, about 15 steps from there in this general direction. That is practically somewhere near the line between this cabin and the lumber pile below the road. Q. Mark the place, as near as you can, where you think you were. A. Somewheres in this neighborhood. I don't know. Q. We will call it X7. The point where you were at the time you did the shooting was at X7. During all this time you were shooting there at Wilson Duke you stood about at the point that you mentioned, about that point? A. Somewheres in that neighborhood. Q. During that time you didn't move? A. I have no recollection of moving during the time I was shooting. Q. Did you shoot as rapidly as you could or take pretty careful aim? A. The first two shots I shot pretty quick. When I saw I had not hit him, I stopped and took deliberate aim. I saw he was not looking at me, and that was the one that struck the ground. Q. How far did you say you were from him at the time? A. It is a matter of guess only. A man don't estimate distances on occasions of that kind, but somewheres from 15 to 20 steps. * * * Q. When he turned toward you and brought his gun up on a level, did you think he was going to shoot you then? A. Yes, sir. Q. And you ran? A. I did; yes. Q. When you were shooting at him and saw that he paid no attention to your shots, why didn't you run closer to him and make certain? A. I thought I was close enough. I thought I was a good enough shot to hit him if the pistol would shoot all right."

He testified that he heard two rifle shots before he got behind the cabin. The last shot struck him.

"I presume I fainted, as I didn't see anything for some time. * * * Q. You didn't hear any shots except—up to the time you quit shooting you didn't hear any shots except your own? A. No, sir. Q. And from that on you heard no shots except two rifle shots behind you? A. That is all. I swooned immediately. Q. In other words, if there was a battle going on between Wilson Duke and Nelligan, you didn't hear a shot fired? A. If I did it didn't make any impression on my mind so I could testify to it. Q. At no time did you hear any shots until you commenced firing yourself? A. No, sir; I have no recollection of hearing a shot. Q. Up to that time you yourself had not been shot? A. No, sir. Q. You don't know whether or not Nelligan was shot when he was laying there? A. No, sir. I didn't at that time. I know now. Q. You only know by hearsay now? A. I saw his condition. Q. But you don't know when he was shot? A. No, I don't know the time he was shot. Q. When you got through shooting, did you see any Indians about there? A. Only Wilson Duke."

Nelligan testified that, when the party stopped near the building and lumber pile mentioned above, he was back 70 or 80 feet and heard some conversation in front but distinguished only the word "Madeline."

"They were talking among themselves, but I didn't understand them. Q. What did you see? A. I saw Wilson Duke rush off his horse and rush in on Mr. Cady, and then Pedde and Hendricks, one had him by the arm, and I saw the other on his back struggling with Frank the last I saw. Q. What did you do? A. I started to rush up there and just took a few steps, and this Wilson Duke had the gun already and stepped out to the side, and I run in back of Smokey Charlie's horse, and just as I stepped around behind the horse he shot me in the leg. Q. Wilson Duke shot you? A. Yes, sir. Q. What did he shoot you with? A. A 30-30, Frank's gun. Q. What did you do? A. It turned me, and when I came around I shot at him. Q. Did you fall? A. Yes, sir. Q. What was done then? A. The shooting went on. He run for the lumber pile. Q. He—who do you mean by he? A. Wilson Duke. He went in back of that lumber pile and shot me again in the breast. Q. The first time he shot you in the— A. Leg. * * * Q. What else happened? A. I kind of dazed off after that, and don't know exactly how long it was, but in a few seconds I was in a daze, and when I come to he was standing watching me with the rifle up to his shoulder watching me, and I slipped my hand in my pocket and took out a shell and inserted it in the automatic and fired and shot him. He dropped the rifle. Threw up his hands and dropped the rifle. Q. Before this, did you see Frank Cady? A. I did. Q. Where? A. Ahead of me. Q. What was he doing? A. Scuffling with John Pedde and John Hendricks. Q. After this scuffle, did you see him after that? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where? A. He started to run toward a building in that direction. Q. Tell what you saw. A. I saw Wilson Duke shoot at him twice. Q. When he was running toward the building? A. Yes, sir. Q. Wilson Duke was standing at the lumber pile? A. Yes, sir. Q. What happened after that? A. I come to and crawled up and got the rifle and started to crawl toward the lake. Q. You say he shot you once in the leg, and then shot your little finger off? A. The second shot hit me in the breast. Q. Explain where that shot hit. A. It hit here and come out down in here over my heart. That is where the hole was. They was showing me my heart thumping. Q. In what position were you when this second shot hit you? A. Laying down. Q. Laying on the ground? A. Yes, sir. Q. Watching Wilson Duke? A. Yes, sir. Q. And he was standing near the lumber pile? A. Yes, sir."

was that Pedde reported the affray to some white men who went to the place and carried Cady and Nelligan away. It also appeared that some of the Indians returned and carried Duke to his home. Witnesses testified, and it was admitted by the prosecution that the defendants bore a good reputation for peace and quiet, and it appeared that they were engaged in farming and lived a quiet and peaceable life. The jury, however, were authorized to accept the testimony of the two prosecuting witnesses, and from their description of the encounter arrive at a conclusion.

[2-4] The question is: Does the evidence warrant the inference that Pedde and Hendricks made the assault on Cady with intent to murder him? So far as the assault on Nelligan is concerned, it is no part of the crime charged, and the facts relating to it are material only as they shed light upon the charge that Cady was assaulted with murderous intent.

Cady's testimony was that, when he saw Nelligan down, Duke was paying no attention to Cady and did not do so until Cady had fired three times at him. Duke then turned upon Cady, who ran for cover, and Duke shot him in the back. It is not clear from Nelligan's testimony whether all the shots fired at him (Cady) by Duke were from the lumber pile. He thought the first shot that wounded him in the leg was when Duke was about halfway from Cady to the lumber pile.

There was no evidence of any concerted action on the part of these three Indians until they were told that they were being taken to Madeline. They replied, "Too far; got to talk it over; can't go to Madeline;" and, without further parley, according to Cady's testimony, the three immediately dismounted and pounced upon him, and Duke got the rifle. Cady testified that they did not try to get his revolver, and he did not know whether they knew he had one. Pedde and Hendricks were undoubtedly guilty of an assault, and they were guilty of resisting a lawful arrest by an officer in the discharge of his duty and of making their escape from lawful arrest. The tragedy was of short duration, and the events followed each other quickly. It was but a few seconds after Duke got the rifle that he commenced firing on Nelligan, and the fusilade between the parties was rapid until all three were down. And the testimony of Nelligan was that Duke fired the first shot, from which the jury might well have inferred that he at least intended to use the weapon when he took it from Cady. That the gun was taken pursuant to the concerted purpose of all three Indians, as an aid to their escape from arrest, though that purpose was instantly formed after they were told they must go to Madeline, we think fairly inferable from the evidence. At one point in his testimony Nelligan testified as follows:

> "Q. Where did you last see Pedde and Hendricks? A. Struggling with Frank Cady. Q. After Wilson Duke had the gun or before? A. After and before both. Q. And you never saw them after that? A. After they were struggling with Frank? Q. Yes. A. Yes, when I was laying on the sand here alongside of the road they were struggling with Frank. Q. After that did you see them? A. No, I didn't."

If this be true, defendants must have been struggling with Cady while Duke was shooting at Nelligan. It was for the jury to reconcile this statement with Cady's, who testified that Pedde and Hendricks ran away, or that he did not know where they were after Duke got his rifle. We cannot say that Nelligan was mistaken in this, and, if true, it connects Pedde and Hendricks so intimately with the consequences which followed as to make them responsible and equally guilty as aiding and abetting Duke in his part of the conspiracy.

> "All persons concerned in the commission of a crime, whether it be a felony or misdemeanor, and whether they directly commit the act constituting the offense, or aid and abet in its commission, * * * are principals in any crime so committed." Pen. Code, § 31.

It was said in People v. Brown, 59 Cal. 345, 352:

> "Where men confederate together to commit crimes of a nature or under such circumstances as will, when tested by human experience, probably result in taking human life, if such necessity should arise to thwart them in the execution of their unlawful plans, it must be presumed that they all understand the consequences which might be reasonably expected to flow from carrying into effect their unlawful combination, and to have assented to the taking of human life if necessary to accomplish the object of the conspiracy."

The circumstances in the case at bar are not so incriminatory as they were in the case cited, yet defendants were engaged in acts punishable as a crime. Pen. Code, §§ 69, 148. We feel compelled to hold that the facts were sufficient to justify the verdict. The argument of counsel is based on the statement of Cady that defendants ran away as soon as Duke got the gun and had no part in the shooting. But, as we have seen, there was evidence that they held Cady while Duke was shooting at Nelligan. Nelligan was in position to observe the movements and acts of these men and better able to judge of what was taking place prior to his being himself shot than was Cady, who was engaged in a personal encounter and being roughly handled by the Indians. It was for the jury to decide, in view of all the circumstances, whether the Indians intended to escape from lawful arrest, even though it might become necessary to kill one or both of the officers.

It is suggested that the feelings of the community at the place of the trial were highly inflamed towards the defendants, and that this public sentiment found its way to and influenced the jury, to defendants' prejudice. There is no evidence in the record pointing in the slightest in that direction.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DE MARTINI. (Cr. 492.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. June 22, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 21, 1914.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 110*)—LANGUAGE OF STATUTE.

An allegation of the offense of pandering in the charging part of an information in the language of the statute is sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 289–294; Dec. Dig. § 110.*]

2. PROSTITUTION (§ 3*)—INFORMATION—PARTICULAR HOUSE.

In a prosecution for pandering, it is not necessary that the information allege the particular house of prostitution of which the female was induced to become an inmate.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prostitution, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 3.*]

3. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 175*)—VARIANCE — VENUE — CRIME COMMITTED PARTLY IN TWO COUNTIES.

Under Pen. Code, § 781, providing that, when a public offense is committed partly in one county and partly in another, or the acts or effects thereof constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense occur in two counties, the jurisdiction is in either county, the fact that an information charged the crime of pandering to have been committed in the city and county of San Francisco, while the evidence showed that it was committed partly in that county and partly in another, did not constitute a fatal variance.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 544–547; Dec. Dig. § 175.*]

4. PROSTITUTION (§ 4*)—PANDERING — CHARACTER OF HOUSE—REPUTATION—EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for pandering, the character of the house which it is claimed the female was induced to enter may be proved by reputation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Prostitution, Cent. Dig. § 4; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

5. PROSTITUTION (§ 4*)—CHARACTER OF HOUSE—PROOF—REPUTATION—STATUTES—EFFECT.

Pen. Code, § 315, as amended by St. 1905, p. 668, providing that in all prosecutions for keeping disorderly houses common reputation may be received of the character of the house and the purpose for which it is kept and used, does not limit proof of the character of a disorderly house by reputation to prosecutions for keeping such houses.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Joe De Martini was convicted of pandering, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Nathan C. Coghlan and B. I. Bloch, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Attorney General U. S. Webb and Asst. Atty. Gen. John H. Riordan, for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant was charged by information with the crime of pandering, committed in the city and county of San Francisco, in that he did willfully and feloniously, and by promise of a salary of $35 per month, and by other devices, cause, induce, persuade, and encourage a certain woman (naming her) to become an inmate of a house of prostitution. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced. The appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

[1] The information charges the offense in the language of the statute, stating also the place where it was committed, and in fact every other element necessary to constitute the completed crime, defendant's contention to the contrary notwithstanding. The offense designated is what is termed generally a statutory crime, and it was sufficient to describe it in the charging part of the paper in the words of the statute. People v. Gordon, 133 Cal. 328, 65 Pac. 746, 85 Am. St. Rep. 174; People v. Frigerio, 107 Cal. 151, 40 Pac. 107.

[2] It was unnecessary for the information to show the particular house of prostitution of which the woman was induced to become an inmate.

[3] While the information alleges that the crime was committed in the city and county of San Francisco, the evidence shows that it was committed partly in that and partly in another county. This did not constitute a variance between the information and the evidence. The offense having been committed partly in each of two counties, it was sufficient, we think, under the terms of section 781 of the Penal Code, to allege the venue as was done, and to show by the evidence that the crime was partly committed in the county designated. That section reads:

> "When a public offense is committed in part in one county and in part in another, or the acts or effects thereof constituting or requisite to the consummation of the offense occur in two or more counties, the jurisdiction is in either county."

[4] The court correctly received evidence of the reputation of the house in question, for it may be said that the rule, though not universal, is well established that the character of a house of prostitution may be established by evidence of its reputation as such. De Martini v. Anderson, 127 Cal. 33, 37, 59 Pac. 207; People v. Nitta, 17 Cal. App. 152, 118 Pac. 946; State v. Hoyle, 98 Minn. 254, 107 N. W. 1130; State v. Smith, 29 Minn. 193, 12 N. W. 524; State v. Bresland, 59 Minn. 281, 61 N. W. 450.

[5] Counsel for the defendant seems to attach some significance to the fact that the Legislature in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 668), in amending section 315 of the Penal Code, provided that, in all prosecutions for keeping houses of prostitution, "common repute may be received of the character of the house" and the "purpose for which it is kept and used"; the argument being that the Legislature having expressed in what cases such evidence may be admitted, has excluded it from all others. The maxim here relied upon is applied as a means only of discovering the legislative intent, and is never permitted to defeat the purpose of the Legislature when the purpose is otherwise plain. terpretation of Laws, p. 219; 36 Cyc. 1122. At the time this amendment was enacted, the better rule as to the admission of this sort of evidence was, and it still is, that it is admissible, but, doubtless, at that time, being one of judicial construction and not being universal, was lacking in the element of certainty; and therefore, for the purpose of making the rule definite as to the class of cases then under consideration, section 315 of the Penal Code was amended in the particular stated. But there is nothing in the amendment indicating that the Legislature intended that the rule then announced should apply only to that class of cases; nor is there any reason why the amendment should be given this limited construction. Black on Interpretation of Laws, 222. It will be noted that the case of People v. Nitta, supra, was decided after the amendment, and there it was held that the general reputation of a certain premises as being a house of prostitution was admissible.

The criticism of the instructions of the court to the jury is not well founded, and does not require consideration.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

GRATZ v. SCHULER et al. (Civ. 1330.)

1. Fraud (§ 58*)—Actions—Evidence.
In an action for damages for deceit in the sale of a panorama, evidence held insufficient to show that defendants represented that the panorama would in the future earn a specified sum each day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 55–59; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. Fraud (§ 9*)—Misrepresentations—Actions.
Representations made in a sale, to be the foundation of an action for damages, must have been falsely made with intent to deceive and must have been relied upon by the buyer while acting with reasonable prudence.

3. Fraud (§ 22*)—Actions—Defenses.
The right of a party to a contract to recover damages for false representations is not destroyed because he did not avail himself of the means of knowledge at hand; but, if he did avail himself of an opportunity to test the truth of the representations and discovered their falsity, there can be no recovery.

4. Fraud (§ 22*)—Actions—Defenses.
In an action for damages for misrepresentations made in the sale of a panorama, plaintiff cannot recover, where, after discovering the falsity of some of the representations, he made no effort to ascertain the truth of others, although the means of knowledge was at hand.

5. Fraud (§ 49*)—Actions—Pleading.
In an action for damages for deceit in a sale of a panorama, plaintiff cannot recover on the theory that he was intoxicated when the purchase was made, where no such matter was pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 44, 45; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

6. Fraud (§ 35*)—Actions—Right of Recovery.
Though plaintiff was inveigled into purchasing a panorama from defendants while under the influence of intoxicating liquors supplied by them, the fact of his intoxication is no ground for recovery in an action for deceit, where plaintiff, some time after the negotiations, voluntarily consummated his bargain.

On Rehearing.

7. Fraud (§ 13*)—Actions—Defenses.
In an action for damages for deceit in the sale of a panorama, plaintiff, who purchased it, cannot recover for defendants' misrepresentations that it would earn $20 a day, where before the consummation of the bargain a test exhibition was had and the receipts fell much below that sum.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Ernst W. Gratz against Jacob Schuler and others. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

F. J. Castelhun, of San Francisco, for appellants. Henry H. Davis, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this action the plaintiff sought and recovered damages for fraud and deceit alleged to have been perpetrated upon him by the defendants in the negotiation and consummation of an agreement for the purchase and sale of a picture machine, known as the "Kaiser Panorama," which the defendants owned and, at the time of the sale, were exhibiting at a place of public amusement in the city and county of San Francisco. The fraud and deceit complained of in the plaintiff's complaint consisted of the following alleged false representations by the defendants: (1) That the defendants had paid the sum of $1,900 for the panorama; (2) that because of its earning capacity it was worth the sum of $1,900 for exhibition purposes; (3) that the panorama had been earning $20 a day; (4) that the defendants had been offered $100 per month to exhibit it at Idora Park in the city of Oakland; (5) that it was a valuable device for exhibition purposes, and would earn for the plaintiff the sum of $20 per day. Plaintiff's complaint further averred that the defendants willfully and knowingly made such alleged false representations with the intent and for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff; and that, believing such false representations and relying solely thereon, he purchased the panorama and paid therefor the sum of $1,100. All of the material allegations of the plaintiff's complaint were denied by the answer of the defendants. The issues thus raised were tried with a jury, and a verdict rendered for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000. From the judgment entered thereon and from an order denying a new trial the defendants have appealed.

[1] The insufficiency of the evidence to support the verdict is the principal point relied upon for a reversal. The point is well taken. The case of the plaintiff, in so far as the making and falsity of the representations were concerned, was rested entirely upon his own testimony, and such testimony did not in the slightest degree tend to show the falsity of the defendants' alleged representations concerning the original cost of the panorama. Upon the other hand, the testimony of the defendants, uncontradicted and unimpeached either by direct or circumstantial evidence, was to the effect that they had paid $1,900 for the panorama. Plainly, therefore, the verdict cannot be supported upon the theory that the evidence shows that the defendants falsely represented the original cost of the panorama.

We have searched the record in vain for any evidence which even remotely tends to support the allegations of the complaint that the defendants represented to the plaintiff that the panorama would earn for him the sum of $20 per day. In this behalf the plaintiff's testimony in its entirety reveals nothing more than that the defendants said to him when negotiating the sale that they had been offered $100 per month to exhibit the panorama at Idora Park, and that "it makes lots of money; * * * you can bring it to Idora Park and * * * rent it out."

Conceding that the false representation concerning the future earning capacity of the panorama would, under all of the circumstances of the present case, constitute a good cause of action for fraud and deceit, nevertheless it is clear that the plaintiff's testimony upon this phase of the case would not support a finding that the defendants had falsely represented that the panorama would earn a specified sum per day. Stripped of immaterial matters, the sum and substance of plaintiff's testimony upon direct and cross-examination is that he was induced to pay the sum of $1,100 for the panorama solely because of the representation that it had in the past earned $20 per day, and that he could place it in Idora Park at a monthly rental of $100. Further testifying in this behalf the plaintiff in effect said that, while the statement as to past earnings influenced him to buy the panorama, nevertheless the representation that he could rent it to Idora Park had to a greater extent influenced him, because there it "would pay more interest on the money than the German Bank."

It follows that the verdict and judgment can be sustained only upon the theory that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was induced to purchase and part with his money solely by reason of the false representation that the panorama had been earning $20 per day, and that he could rent it to the management of Idora Park for $100 per month. While the conflict in the evidence upon this phase of the case was resolved in favor of the plaintiff, we are satisfied that, under all of the circumstances of the transaction in suit, such representations, even if falsely made, were not as a matter of law sufficient to warrant a verdict and judgment for damages upon the ground of deceit.

[2-4] Fraud is the basis of an action for damages for deceit; and when such action arises out of alleged false representations of a material fact the plaintiff, in order to prevail, must ordinarily show not only that such representations were knowingly false and made with intent to deceive, but that the plaintiff, relying upon such false representations and while acting with reasonable prudence, was thereby deceived into doing something to his detriment.

It may be conceded that the undisputed fact in the present case, that the panorama never at any time after the plaintiff finally purchased it earned more than $5 per day, was sufficient to warrant the finding of the jury implied from the verdict that the representations of the defendants as to its previous earnings were false and fraudulent. Del Vecchio v. Savelli, 10 Cal. App. 79, 101 Pac. 32. Therefore we would have but little difficulty in sustaining the judgment if the evidence upon the whole case was sufficient to warrant the inference that the plaintiff relied upon and was in fact deceived by such representations. But the evidence will not justify any such inference. To the contrary, the evidence clearly and without conflict shows that the plaintiff did not rely upon and was not deceived by the statement that the panorama had been earning $20 per day while owned and operated by the defendants. That this is so is shown by the plaintiff's own testimony to the effect that, upon the payment of $50 on account, he was given possession of the panorama, and during the three weeks following gave three exhibitions at the original stand "to see what it was earning." The receipts of the first exhibition amounted to $12.50; the second exhibition a week after brought but 75 cents to the box office; the receipts of the third exhibition given a week after the second amounted to but 15 cents. Notwithstanding this actual demonstration of the real earning capacity of the panorama, the plaintiff, without further representations of the defendants, completed the purchase by the payment of the balance of the price originally agreed upon. Surely, under these circumstances, it cannot be said that the evidence shows that the plaintiff was justified in relying solely upon the representations of the defendants that the panorama had been earning $20 per day. Generally speaking, if one party to a contract is justified in relying and does in fact rely upon false representations, his right of action for rescission or for damages for deceit is not destroyed merely because he did not avail himself of the means of knowledge immediately at hand as to the truth or falsity of the representations (Ruhl v. Mott, 120 Cal. 668, 53 Pac. 304; Neher v. Hansen, 12 Cal. App. 370, 107 Pac. 565; Tarke v. Bingham, 123 Cal. 163, 55 Pac. 759; Willey v. Clements, 146 Cal. 91, 79 Pac. 850); but if he does avail himself of an opportunity to test the truth of the representations made, and thereby discovers prior to the consummation of the contract that such representations were false, he will not be heard to say that he was deceived by them. We take it that this proposition needs no authority to support it. Assuming that the plaintiff was justified in relying and acting upon the representation that the defendants had been offered $100 per month to exhibit the panorama at Idora Park, and that the plaintiff, if he purchased the panorama, could rent it to that park, still these were facts which were readily susceptible of verification, and under the particular circumstances of the present case, should have been verified by the plaintiff before he purchased and paid for the panorama. Ordinarily perhaps this might not be so; but, having ascertained that the defendants falsely represented one material matter in the transaction, this was notice that the defendants may have been false in all else that they said; and therefore it was incumbent upon the plaintiff thereafter to make a full investigation as to the truth or falsity of every other material representation. This is so, because the law does not undertake the care of persons who, with notice of a fraud and the means of prevention at hand, will not take care of themselves. Ruhl v. Mott, supra; Bacon v. Soule, 19 Cal. App. 428, 126 Pac. 384.

[5,6] During the course of plaintiff's testimony it was incidentally developed that during the negotiations for the sale of the panorama the plaintiff became intoxicated from drinking beer supplied to him by the defendants, and that while so intoxicated he made the first payment of $50 on account. We are at a loss to conceive how this fact can be availed of in support of the verdict. In the first place, the plaintiff's complaint did not plead or attempt to plead such fact as a part of his cause of action; in the second place, the uncontradicted evidence is to the effect that the purchase of the panorama was not completed until some three weeks after the deposit had been paid on account; and the evidence does not show, nor is it contended here, that the plaintiff was intoxicated at that time. Conceding that the plaintiff may have been so intoxicated during the original negotiations for the sale of the panorama that he did not realize what he was doing, nevertheless, having completed the same when he was undoubtedly sober, this was a ratification of the original agreement, which precludes the plaintiff from repudiating the transaction, or asserting that advantage was taken of his intoxicated condition to defraud and deceive him.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

On Rehearing.

LENNON, P. J. In fairness to the plaintiff (respondent) in the above-entitled action, the statement of the facts of the case in the opinion heretofore rendered, reversing the judgment of the lower court, should be modified in certain particulars.

[7] While the testimony of the plaintiff is in part at least somewhat confused and uncertain, as to whether or not he personally conducted one or three exhibitions of the panorama purchased from the defendants, prior to the payment of the full purchase price, upon a further consideration of the record, still before us, we must confess that the plaintiff's testimony, when considered in its entirety, and liberally construed, is to the effect that after the payment of $50 as a deposit, and before the payment of the full purchase price of the panorama, he personally conducted but one exhibition, the receipts of which, as stated in the opinion heretofore rendered, amounted to $12.50. The other two exhibitions mentioned in that opinion apparently were given by the plaintiff after he had paid the full amount of the purchase price. This correction of the statement of the facts of the case will not, however, operate to alter or in any wise impair the conclusion previously reached, that the plaintiff's testimony shows that he did not rely upon and was not deceived by the defendants' statement that the panorama had been earning twenty dollars per day while owned and operated by them. The result of the single exhibition given by the plaintiff prior to the payment of the purchase price should have been sufficient, we think, to put him upon further inquiry concerning the past earning capacity of the panorama. Moreover, the testimony of the plaintiff shows further that before he made the full payment of the purchase price, he called upon the defendants, and asked for the return of the $50 deposit paid on account, because, as he said: "I did a very foolish thing to buy that thing. I made a very foolish bargain." It will thus be seen that, notwithstanding an actual demonstration of the earning capacity of the panorama, and knowledge of the fact that he had made a bad bargain, plaintiff completed the contract of sale by paying the balance of $1,050, due on the purchase price.

Under these circumstances, it cannot be fairly said that the plaintiff was deceived into parting with the bulk of his money by the statements of the defendants that the panorama had previously earned for them the sum of $20 per day; and therefore, in so far as the conclusion reached and heretofore expressed upon this phase of the case is concerned, it is immaterial whether the plaintiff gave more than one exhibition prior to the time he made the final payment on the purchase price of the panorama.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

BAUCOM v. BAUCOM. (Civ. 1388.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 6, 1914.)

1. EVIDENCE (§ 598*)—WEIGHT OF EVIDENCE.
Under Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5, directing that the decision must be according to the preponderance of the evidence, the weight of the testimony is not determined by the number of the witnesses but their apparent credibility.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2450–2452; Dec. Dig. § 598.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*) — TRIAL — FINDING.
A finding by the trial court on conflicting evidence will not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935–3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Cruz County; Lucas F. Smith, Judge.

Action for divorce by Thomas Baucom against Hester B. Baucom, who cross-complained. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

James A. Hall, of Watsonville, for appellant. Wykoff & Gardner, of Watsonville, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. In this case the plaintiff prayed for a divorce from the defendant upon the single ground of extreme cruelty. The defendant denied in her answer the acts of cruelty charged against her in the plaintiff's complaint, and, in addition, interposed a cross-complaint, alleging habitual intemperance and extreme cruelty on the part of the plaintiff, and prayed that a divorce be granted to her upon those grounds. All of the material allegations of the defendant's cross-complaint were denied in an answer thereto by the plaintiff. Upon the issues thus raised the court below found against the plaintiff upon the allegations of his complaint, and found for the defendant in substantial accord with the allegations of her cross-complaint. Judgment was accordingly entered, granting the defendant an interlocutory decree of divorce, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, plaintiff has appealed.

In support of the appeal plaintiff relies solely upon the contention that the findings of fact made against him upon the issues raised by his complaint and the defendant's answer are contrary to the evidence, and that the findings of fact made in favor of the defendant upon the issues raised by her cross-complaint and the plaintiff's answer thereto are not supported by the evidence. This contention is rested solely upon the reasoning that because the testimony of the defendant relative to the paramount issues in the case was in one instance contradicted by two witnesses for the plaintiff, and in another instance by the plaintiff and three witnesses, "her testimony is to be disregarded, and there remains no substantial conflict in the evidence."

[1] Perchance this contention is seriously made; but, if so, it need not be seriously considered, further than to say that the settled and generally understood rule of evidence (Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, subd. 5), which directs that when the evidence in a civil case is contradictory the decision must be made according to the preponderance of evidence, contemplates that the court will be controlled by the weight of the evidence, as indicated by the apparent credibility of the witnesses, rather than by their mere numerical preponderance. In brief, it is axiomatic "that witnesses are not counted, but that their testimony is weighed." Jones on Evidence, § 900.

[2] Inasmuch as the very statement of the point presented for a reversal involves an admission of a conflict in the evidence adduced upon the whole case, it will suffice to say that the testimony of the defendant alone, if believed by the court, was sufficient to support the finding that she had not been guilty of the extreme cruelty charged against her. On the other hand, her testimony and the corroborating testimony of other witnesses was, if believed by the trial court, sufficient to support the finding that the plaintiff had been guilty of extreme cruelty towards her. The latter finding alone is in turn sufficient to sustain the judgment in favor of the defendant upon her cross-complaint. The trial court apparently gave full credence to the testimony on behalf of the defendant, and accordingly resolved whatever conflict there may have been in the evidence upon the whole case in favor of the defendant. This the trial court had the right to do; and its decision upon the facts of the case, resting as it does upon conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed here.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Ex parte MASCOLO. (Cr. 339).

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 3, 1914.)

1. STATUTES (§ 110½*)—SUBJECT AND TITLE—AMENDATORY ACT.

St. 1913, p. 988, entitled an act to amend an act dividing the state into six fish and game districts, by adding a new section thereto, is void; the amendment purporting to divide the state into seven districts and to change every section of the original act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 139, 161, 162, 163; Dec. Dig. § 110½.*]

2. STATUTES (§ 143*)—AMENDMENT—VOID STATUTE.

St. 1913, p. 988, purporting to amend Act March 21, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 425), dividing the state into fish and game districts, being wholly void, Act 1911 remained in force.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. § 211; Dec. Dig. § 143.*]

3. STATUTES (§ 64*)—PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

St. 1913, p. 979, which added a new section to the Penal Code, making it illegal to use certain nets in the waters of the Sixth fish district and in Monterey Bay, which included part of the Fifth district, is not bad as special legislation, in so far as it applies to the Sixth district, because its application to that part of the fifth district included in Monterey Bay might be special legislation, for a statute though invalid in part will be upheld when the valid portion can be separated from the invalid part.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 58–66, 195; Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

4. STATUTES (§ 77*)—SPECIAL LEGISLATION—UNIFORMITY OF OPERATION.

Nor is it in violation of Const. art. 1, § 11, requiring all laws of a general nature to have a uniform operation; the statute not purporting to be a general law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 79–82; Dec. Dig. § 77.*]

5. STATUTES (§ 110½*)—TITLE OF ACT.

Neither is it in violation of Const. art. 4, § 24, declaring that every act shall embrace but one subject which shall be expressed in its title, because the title was broader than the act, mentioning nets not specified in the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Cent. Dig. §§ 139, 161, 162, 163; Dec. Dig. § 110½.*]

6. STATUTES (§ 77*)—SPECIAL LAWS—VALIDITY.

Likewise it is not in violation of Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 2, prohibiting the passage of special laws for the punishment of crimes and misdemeanors, for section 25½ of that article, authorizing the Legislature to create fish and game districts and provide for the protection of fish and game therein, having been adopted subsequently, qualified the earlier provision.

8. CONSTITUTIONAL LAW (§ 15*)—CONSTRUCTION—SPECIAL POWERS.

A special provision authorizing the exercise of particular powers will override a general prohibition.

In the matter of the application of V. Mascolo for a writ of habeas corpus. Application denied.

C. W. Pendleton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. J. D. Fredericks, Dist. Atty., and John L. Richardson, Deputy Dist. Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Petitioner was arrested and held upon a warrant charging him with a violation of the provisions of section 636½ of the Penal Code.

Section 25½ of article 4 of the Constitution, which was adopted in 1902, provides:

> "The Legislature may provide for the division of the state into fish and game districts, and may enact such laws for the protection of fish and game therein as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts."

Pursuant to this provision the Legislature adopted an act, approved March 21, 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 425), entitled "An act to divide the state of California into six fish and game districts." In 1913 this act was amended by an act approved June 16, 1913, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to divide the state of California into six fish and game districts,' approved March 21, 1911, by adding a new section thereto." Stats. 1913, p. 988.

[1, 2] Petitioner attacks this act claiming that it is unconstitutional and void. According to the title, the only change proposed in the amendment was the addition of a new section to the act of 1911, otherwise leaving it as originally enacted. Instead of merely adding a new section, the bill purports not only to divide the state into seven fish and game districts, but in fact otherwise materially changes and amends every section of the act of 1911. There was nothing in the title to indicate any such intent or purpose. The act itself is confusing in that the proposed new section is to be numbered seven, while the act which it was proposed to amend contains a section so numbered. The subject of the amendment was not expressed in the title, which, in view of the attempted legislation, was well calculated to mislead and deceive both the public and the members of the Legislature. We therefore hold the act of 1913 to be void. Ex parte Liddell, 93 Cal. 633, 29 Pac. 251; Wood v. Commissioners, 58 Cal. 561. Being void, it was inoperative for any purpose and effected no change whatsoever in the act of 1911 (Lewis v. Dunne, 134 Cal. 291, 66 Pac. 478, 55 L. R. A. 833, 86 Am. St. Rep. 257), whereby Los Angeles county was designated as being in the Sixth fish and game district.

[3, 4] The Legislature, having by the act of 1911 divided the state into six districts, proceeded as authorized by section 25½, art. 4, of the Constitution, to adopt a law deemed appropriate for the protection of fish and game in the counties comprising the sixth district. This act, entitled "An act to add a new section to the Penal Code of the state of California, to be numbered six hundred and thirty-six and one-half, to prevent the use or possession of lompara nets, paranzella nets, trawl or drag nets, and providing the penalty therefor" (Stats. 1913, p. 979), provides that:

> "Every person who at any time shall cast, extend, set, draw, use, or continue or assist in casting, extending, setting, drawing, using, or continuing, any paranzella or trawl net, for catching fish, shellfish, shrimp, or crabs in the waters of fish and game district six or in the waters of Monterey bay shall be guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction shall be punishable by a fine of not less than two hundred and fifty dollars, or by imprisonment in the county jail in the county in which the conviction shall be had, not less than one hundred and twenty-five days, or by both such fine and imprisonment."

Petitioner insists that section 636½, Penal Code, under which he is charged with the offense, is unconstitutional for the reasons: First, that it is special and class legislation; second, that it is not uniform in its operation; and, third, that it is in contravention of certain provisions of the Constitution, to wit: (a) section 11, art. 1, requiring that all "laws of a general nature shall have a uniform operation"; (b) section 24, art. 4, which provides that "every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title"; and (c) subdivision 2, § 25, art. 4, which prohibits the passage of local or special laws "for the punishment of crimes or misdemeanors." These objections to the validity of section 636½ are largely answered by the constitutional provision which in express terms authorizes the Legislature to create fish and game districts and "enact such laws for the protection of fish and game therein as it may deem appropriate to the respective districts." The law as passed, in so far as it affects the petitioner, applies with uniformity to all persons within the Sixth district, and, while local in that it applies to such district alone, it is not special, since it applies to the entire district. The validity of the act, in so far as it purports to legislate for that part of the Fifth district consisting of Monterey Bay, is not here involved. Even were it conceded to be special legislation as to the Fifth district, such fact does not affect the validity of that part of the act applicable to the Sixth district. The rule is that, although a statute may be invalid or unconstitutional in part, the part that is valid will be sustained where it can be separated from that part which is void. It is not obnoxious to section 11, art. 1, since, as stated, it does not purport to be a general law applicable to the entire state.

[5] Section 24, art. 4, is directed against the omission to express the subject of the legislation in the title, not to the fact that the title is broader than the subject of the act.

> "A law might be invalid for want of compliance with this section, if it contained matter not expressed in the title, but it would not be where the title contains more than is necessary to point out the object of the law." Davis & Bro. v. Woolnough, 9 Iowa, 104.

While the title prohibits the use of lompara, paranzella, trawl, or drag nets, the inhibition in the body of the act is directed to paranzella and trawl nets only. The fact that the title is broader than the act itself does not render the act obnoxious to the section of the Constitution here invoked. Boyer v. Grand Rapids Fire Ins. Co., 124 Mich. 455, 83 N. W. 124, 83 Am. St. Rep. 338.

[6-8] Petitioner insists that by subdivision 2, § 25, art. 4, the Legislature is prohibited from passing local or special laws "for the punishment of crimes or misdemeanors." This provision is general, and in point of time precedes the adoption of section 25½, art. 4, which is special. A construction which raises a conflict between parts of the Constitution is inadmissible when by any reasonable interpretation they may be made to harmonize, and in case of irreconcilable repugnancy the provision last in order of time should prevail. Says Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (page 92):

> "One part may qualify another so as to restrict its operation, or apply it otherwise than the natural construction would require if it stood by itself; but one part is not to be allowed to defeat another, if by any reasonable construction the two can be made to stand together."

It is clear that in adopting the later provision the intention was to qualify and limit the effect of subdivision 2 of section 25, thus giving the Legislature, as therein stated, the power to enact penal laws, and provide for the enforcement thereof, appropriate to the several fish and game districts throughout the state. Even if the provisions should be deemed repugnant, then the one first in point of time must yield to the later. If in one section a power is specifically conferred or a duty specially enjoined, which in general terms is prohibited by other sections, the power or duty specially conferred or enjoined constitutes an exception to the general rule. The direction to employ the power or discharge the duty in the particular instance is as mandatory as the general prohibition. San Francisco, etc., R. R. Co. v. State Board, 60 Cal. 12.

Petitioner's objections to the validity of the act under which the warrant for his arrest was issued are highly technical and, in our opinion, without merit. It is therefore ordered that the petition be dismissed and petitioner remanded to the custody of the sheriff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by Clem H. Seals and another against O. W. Davis. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. L. Cory and M. B. Harris, both of Fresno, for appellant. Geo. Cosgrave and L. B. Hayhurst, both of Fresno, for respondents.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs for the recovery of the sum of $1,250, claimed to be due from the defendant as the result of the rescission of a contract for the sale of a certain piece of real estate by the defendant to the plaintiffs; the amount so recovered by the plaintiffs being the first payment made by them on account of said transaction.

The evidence, which is practically uncontradicted, shows the following state of facts: On April 10, 1911, the plaintiffs and the defendant entered into a contract for the purchase and sale of a tract of land, embracing 80 acres and lying in Merced county, for the purchase price of $6,000, of which the plaintiffs were to pay, and did pay, the sum of $1,250 cash. They also assumed the payment of an outstanding lien of $1,600, secured by a deed of trust upon the property executed by the seller, and bearing interest at 6 per cent. per annum. The balance of the purchase price was to be paid in annual installments of $500 each, beginning March 15, 1912. There were also certain water assessments accruing during 1911, which the purchasers agreed to pay. In case of default of any payments to be made under the contract, the seller could declare the contract at an end and retake possession of the property, in which case all payments which had been made by the purchasers were to be retained by the seller as reasonable compensation for the use and rental of the property during its incumbency by the purchasers. The plaintiffs took possession of the land in April, 1911, and remained until the fall; but apparently did not make much of a success at farming, and hence were not able to make the payments of interest upon the obligation secured by the deed of trust and of the water assessments, and were on the point of leaving the property when the parties to the contract met and, according to the plaintiffs' testimony, had an oral agreement, by which the defendant was to keep the interest on the trust deed and the water assessments paid up until the following March, and that the plaintiffs were not to be in default until that time. That some such arrangement was made can be gathered from the terms of a letter which the defendant wrote the plaintiffs during October, 1911, which contained the proposition that the plaintiffs should execute a release of their contract and place the same in escrow with a Fresno bank, in consideration of which they were to have possession of the land until the following March in order to allow them to dispose of the property and get their money out of it. Upon receipt of this letter the plaintiff C. H. Seals saw the defendant and agreed to its terms. It was understood that the defendant was to have his own lawyer draw up the form of the document to be placed in escrow, and he got from the plaintiffs their copy of the original contract for that avowed purpose. Thereafter on several occasions during the next few weeks the plaintiff C. H. Seals came to Fresno and saw the defendant with respect to having the escrow papers signed, but the defendant put him off on various pretexts, and quieted his fears of losing his interest in the land by assuring him that he could not be beaten out of what interest he had in it so long as his name was on the contract. The plaintiffs also wrote the defendant one or possibly two letters in regard to the papers so to be prepared and signed, but got no reply; and finally during December came over from Coalinga, where they were living, and met the defendant, when he told them that he would have nothing more to do with them, and when they also learned that he had sold the property to another purchaser for a larger sum than their original purchase price. Thereupon they brought this action.

There are some slight conflicts in the evidence with reference to the foregoing facts, but these were resolved by the lower court in favor of the plaintiffs, and with its discretion in that respect we shall not undertake to interfere.

[2] The plaintiffs brought their action in two counts, the first of which was based upon allegations to the effect that the plaintiffs had performed all the obligations of the written contract to be by them performed; and that the defendant, having attempted to work a rescission of the contract through the sale of the property to a third person, in the absence of any default on their part, the plaintiffs were entitled to accept such rescission and bring suit to recover their payment. The second alleged cause of action was in the form of a common count for money had and received by the defendant to the plaintiffs' use. The appellant contends that the findings of the court to the effect that the averments of the first count were true, was not supported by the evidence. This might seem to raise the question as to whether proof of the waiver of certain terms and conditions of the contract would operate to justify a finding that the plaintiffs had performed such obligations. But conceding this to be true under the cases cited by appellant, the presence and proofs of the plaintiffs' second cause of action would seem to make that question immaterial to this case; for even if the court erred in its aforesaid finding as to the facts proven in support of the first count, its judgment would still be sustainable under the second count based, as it evidently is, upon the accepted proofs of the plaintiffs establishing a waiver of their unperformed obligations, and an estoppel against the assertion of their default therein by the defendant as a ground of forfeiture of the money payment which the plaintiffs seek to recover.

[3, 4] In this connection, however, the appellant urges that the plaintiffs were not entitled to offer proof of either a waiver of their unfulfilled obligations under the contract, or of the estoppel of the defendant's right to insist upon them, because of the plaintiffs' failure to tender either of these issues by direct averments in their complaint. The answer to this proposition again is that in the second count of the plaintiffs' complaint consists the saving grace of their pleading. When a plaintiff seeks to recover money which he has paid upon a contract which the defendant has attempted to rescind, he may accept such rescission, and bring his action in the form of the common count for money had and received by the defendant to his use and benefit. Glock v. Howard, etc., Co., 123 Cal. 1, 55 Pac. 713, 43 L. R. A. 199, 69 Am. St. Rep. 17; Duncanson v. Walton, 111 Cal. 516, 44 Pac. 174; Joyce v. Shafer, 97 Cal. 335, 32 Pac. 320; Chatfield v. Williams, 85 Cal. 518, 24 Pac. 839; Carter v. Fox, 11 Cal. App. 67, 103 Pac. 910. In such an action the plaintiff is not bound to anticipate the defendant's plea of his right to work a rescission of the contract, with the resultant right of forfeiture of the payments which were made under its terms, based upon the plaintiff's failure to perform certain of its conditions, and to plead in advance of these affirmative defenses matter of waiver or estoppel; but in such a case the plaintiff may rely upon the replications which the Code makes for him, and proffer his proof of waiver or estoppel upon the trial of the case. Sutherland on Code Pleading, § 235, and cases cited. In the case at bar there is sufficient evidence to have justified the court in finding that the defendant was estopped by his own acts and conduct, especially with reference to the matters referred to in the letter of the defendant regarding the placing in escrow by the plaintiffs of their quitclaim deed to the property, and hence that the defendant could not be heard to assert that the plaintiffs had not performed the conditions of the contract to be by them performed; and if this be true, the finding of the court as to whether the plaintiffs had or had not performed the conditions of the contract becomes an immaterial factor in the case.

The judgment is affirmed.

JOHNSTON et al. v. TEJUNGA ROCK CO.

(Civ. 1409.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 3, 1914.)

BROKERS (§ 43*)—ACTION FOR COMMISSIONS—DEFENSES.

Where plaintiffs, though not authorized in writing as required by statute, sold rock for the defendant corporation, and it was actually delivered and paid for, the corporation is estopped from questioning the contract, after performance, on the ground of plaintiffs' want of written authority or the lack of authority of the road supervisors to enter into the contract for the district which purchased the rock.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by John T. Johnston and George W. McComber, copartners as Johnston & McCumber, against the Tejunga Rock Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Flint, Gray & Barker, Gray, Barker & Bowen, and William A. Bowen, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Wm. G. Griffith, of Santa Barbara, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The plaintiffs as partners bring this action against the defendant, a corporation, to recover money claimed as commissions for the sale of personal property. Defendant appeals from the judgment which was rendered in favor of the plaintiffs, and also appeals from an order denying a motion for a new trial.

In the complaint it is alleged that from the 19th day of May, 1911, until on or after the 1st day of September, 1911, the plaintiffs were agents employed by the defendant to sell and contract for the sale of crushed rock for the defendant for an agreed compensation of 10 cents per ton; that on September 1, 1911, the plaintiffs as such agents contracted for the sale of and sold on behalf of the defendant to one Deaderick, supervisor of the first supervisor district of the county of Santa Barbara, acting under authority of the board of supervisors of said county, all of the road material, consisting of certain sizes of crushed rock, to be used on 5½ miles of macadam road thereafter to be built in the Montecito valley in said district at the price of $1.30 per ton, to be delivered as specified, which contract was in writing and was signed on behalf of said defendant by Ben C. Brock, its superintendent thereunto duly authorized, and by the said Deaderick on behalf of said county; that thereafter, commencing on or about September 9, 1911, the defendant began delivery to said Supervisor Deaderick of said crushed rock under and pursuant to said agreement, and continued such delivery until the road was fully completed; that the total amount of rock so furnished was 15,890 tons, and the amount of the agreed compensation of plaintiffs thereof at said rate of 10 cents per ton was $1,589. The answer of defendant contains a denial of the employment of plaintiffs and of the agreement for compensation and of the alleged agreement for sale of rock; denies that Ben C. Brock was authorized to execute any such agreement on behalf of the defendant; denies that the defendant delivered any material to said Deaderick under or pursuant to the alleged agreement; and denies that defendant agreed to pay any compensation to plaintiffs, or that any commission is due from defendant to plaintiffs on account of said transaction. The findings of the court on each of the disputed issues are in favor of the plaintiffs, and the defendant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support those findings.

During the year 1911, until about September 15th, one Frank G. Hogan was president and general manager of the Tejunga Rock Company and owned all of the stock, except a few shares which were distributed among four other persons to qualify them for the office of directors of the corporation. S. M. Crawford was a director and was secretary; Ben C. Brock was a director and was employed as superintendent at the quarry of the company which is located in the county of Los Angeles. The company was active in the business of selling crushed rock, and the duties delegated to Brock and Crawford were described in the testimony of Mr. Hogan as follows:

> "The management, or rather the handling of the orders, was left jointly to Mr. Brock and Mr. Crawford, as my representatives, with instructions that if anything came up of any magnitude at any time that they would consult with me before taking any action; in fact, I was consulted with time after time over the telephone and by repeated visits to the office. I told them to go ahead and make the business pay and to get out rock as cheap as they could, and sell it as high as they could. I never at any time gave to Mr. Brock authority to sell material independent of the approval of Mr. Crawford. The usual course of business in the sale of material called for the approval both of Mr. Crawford and Mr. Brock of all orders. The course of business, with reference to the sale of material prior to September 15, 1911, was, the material was to be gotten out and sold to the best possible advantage by Crawford or Brock. My understanding is that they were both endeavoring to sell material and were acting in full knowledge of each other and consulting regarding the sales. That was the actual course of business."

In May, 1911, and thereafter, the defendant was selling rock in Santa Barbara county, and on and after May 19th the plaintiffs acted as its local agents, engaged for that purpose by the defendant through Brock with the knowledge and consent of Crawford, and at an agreed commission of 10 cents per ton on material sold through the agency of the plaintiffs. Sales to various purchasers were made from time to time and settled for on this basis. In August plaintiffs conducted certain negotiations with Supervisor Deaderick, having in view the furnishing of rock for the road work above mentioned. This was known to both Brock and Crawford. On September 1st the plaintiffs prepared in duplicate the document of which a copy is attached to the complaint and brought it to the office of defendant at Los Angeles. There it was signed in duplicate by Brock who mentioned that fact to Crawford, but Crawford did not read the papers. These were taken back by Johnston to Santa Barbara, and on the next day were delivered by plaintiffs to Deaderick.

No record of the proceedings of the board of supervisors of Santa Barbara county concerning the Montecito road were shown in evidence, but Supervisor Deaderick was permitted to testify, without objection thereto, that prior to September 1st the board of supervisors had advertised for bids for the proposed work and received no bids; had then re-advertised for two weeks, and on the first Monday in September (September 4th) all bids were rejected, and Deaderick, who was supervisor for the district in which the Montecito road was located, was ordered by the board to proceed and complete that work. Within two or three days after September 4th Deaderick signed the alleged contract in duplicate and returned both copies to the plaintiffs. One of these copies remained in the possession of plaintiffs until the trial of this action. The other copy was delivered by Brock to an officer of the defendant on September 26, 1911. The evidence does not show when it was received by Brock, but does show that Brock's employment by the defendant ceased on or about September 15th, at which time Hogan completed a sale of all the stock of the corporation to new owners who were stockholders of a rival concern known as the Acton Rock Company. On September 15th one W. S. Heaton became vice president of defendant and was employed as its sales agent. Both prior and subsequent to that time Heaton was sales agent for the Acton Rock Company.

The alleged contract provided that the vendor would furnish at least 150 tons per day during the time of construction of the Montecito road. The evidence indicates that this would be approximately three full car loads per day. On September 6th the plaintiffs sent to the defendant an order for the first shipment and accompanied the same by a letter dated the previous day, referring to the same as "our order for the county of Santa Barbara, Miramar Switch; three (3) cars each day, until ordered stopped, beginning shipment at your earliest convenience." The letter then refers to Mr. Deaderick as supervisor in charge and gives further instructions as to the desired course of business respecting the shipments. There were some further orders and shipments made during the next few days. On September 23d Mr. Heaton went to Santa Barbara in response to a suggestion from A. R. Edmondson, the Santa Barbara agent of the Acton Rock Company who had now been engaged by Heaton as the Santa Barbara agent of both companies. A meeting then occurred at the office of the district attorney at which there were present, among others, Supervisor Deaderick, Edmondson, McComber, Heaton, and District Attorney Squier. Deaderick made some complaint that his orders for rock were not being filled, and Heaton stated:

> "We are not going to deliver the rock on any contract. We are not delivering you rock on any contract, * * * nor do we propose to pay 10 cents to McComber & Johnston."

The alleged written contract was not produced, and Heaton's uncontradicted testimony is that he had no knowledge of such contract at that time, except that Edmondson had told him that he had heard that "somebody had signed up," and that defendant had been paying 10 cents per ton to the plaintiffs on rock sold by them. At that interview on September 23d it was arranged that the defendant would proceed to deliver rock for the Montecito road for 70 cents, f. o. b. at the quarry. This was practically the same as $1.30 at point of delivery, as the current freight rate was 60 cents per ton. Subsequently in December, Deaderick obtained a reduction of 5 cents per ton on the freight rate of which reduction the county obtained the benefit. Deliveries continued to be made until January, when the road was completed, and the total amount of rock delivered was as charged in the complaint and found by the court. Some of this rock was furnished by the Acton Rock Company from its plant at Acton, 43 miles from Tejunga, and for some of it of a certain quality an additional price of 5 cents per ton was paid. The court found, and there is evidence to support the finding, that the rock furnished from Acton was so furnished at the request of the defendant. In view of this fact, there is no doubt of the correctness of the amount of the judgment, if the defendant is liable at all for these commissions.

The plaintiffs have alleged, and the court finds, that plaintiffs as agents of the defendant contracted for the sale of said road material by a contract in writing, signed on behalf of the defendant by Ben C. Brock, its superintendent. It is contended on behalf of the defendant that this finding is wrong, because Brock had no authority to bind the defendant by the execution of such a contract. Section 2309 of the Civil Code provides:

"An oral authorization is sufficient for any purpose, except that an authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can only be given by an instrument in writing."

Under section 1624, subd. 4, Civil Code, the following must be in writing:

"An agreement for the sale of goods, chattels, or things in action, at a price not less than two hundred dollars, unless the buyer accepts or receives part of such goods and chattels or the evidences, or some of them, of such things in action, or pays at the time some part of the purchase money."

While no definite amount or total price is mentioned in the writing in question, the magnitude of the work as described and the rate per ton that was to be paid clearly establish that the contemplated price was many times $200. The evidence shows that no written authority was ever given by the corporation to Brock or to the plaintiffs authorizing either of them to make sales. Such authority as they had with respect to sales of rock must be derived from the oral instructions given by Hogan to Brock and the oral agreement of agency resulting from conversations between Brock and the plaintiffs and from the course of business established by the transactions connected with plaintiffs' agency on and after May 19, 1911, and the course of business of the defendant with respect to the transaction of business for it by Brock and Crawford.

It is next contended that the writing in question did not constitute a contract because it was not delivered to the defendant and because the fact that it had been signed by Deaderick was never brought to the knowledge of the defendant until after the above noted transactions of September 23d. This point is of no importance, unless it be first held that Brock had authority to enter into such contract. If he did have such authority, then we think that the return of the writings by Deaderick to the possession of plaintiffs and the subsequent transactions to which Brock, as representing the defendant, was a party, were such that the writings must be considered as delivered to the defendant at least as soon as the time when the defendant began to deliver orders of material for the Montecito road, which, as we have seen, was prior to September 15th.

It is next contended by appellant that there was no sale, because Supervisor Deaderick had no authority to represent the county of Santa Barbara in purchasing such materials. We will assume from the record, as shown by the testimony above noted, that the board of supervisors had acted regularly and in accordance with law in its proceedings with reference to the Montecito road down to and including the time when, on September 4th, it rejected bids and ordered that Supervisor Deaderick proceed and complete the work. Pol. Code, § 2643, subd. 11; section 2645, subd. 1; section 4041, subd. 4. The road work involved in this case was in a permanent road district, and for this reason the defendant contends that the board of supervisors had no authority except to let the work to the lowest responsible bidder, as provided by sections 2767, 2768, Political Code. But considering section 2767 with section 2643 to which it refers, it is reasonably indicated that the board may order such work done by the road commissioner when, after due publication and posting of notices inviting bids, the bids have been rejected for the reasons given in section 2643, subd. 11.

The evidence in this case shows that Supervisor Deaderick and all other officers of the county of Santa Barbara concerned in the matter at all times considered said writing of September 1, 1911, as a valid contract. The district attorney and the supervisor insisted upon the contract. Changes were made from time to time in the rate of delivery of the rock; and for convenience, in arranging for freight payments, the freight charges were paid by the county and 70 cents per ton paid to the defendant. Until the slight reduction in freight rates that was obtained by the county in December, the 70 cents per ton plus the freight rate was exactly the same as the $1.30 per ton provided in the contract. Without any objection whatever by Supervisor Deaderick to the terms of the contract, he received the materials and the county paid the consideration therefor. We find in the evidence no sufficient reason for declaring that the purchaser did not act pursuant to the contract, or that the contract was not fully performed. As already noted, it is a fact that at least until as late as September 15, 1911, plaintiffs were the agents of the defendant for the sale of rock in Santa Barbara county at an agreed commission of 10 cents per ton; that a purchaser was found by them for rock to be delivered for use in building 5½ miles of Montecito road; that some deliveries of rock were made by the defendant after the writings had been signed by Brock with the knowledge of Crawford and before plaintiffs had been dismissed from their agency; that Brock and Crawford were the active representatives of the corporation in the transaction of its business under direct authorization from the president and general manager of the corporation, who was also the real owner of the entire business; that on or about September 15th said owner caused the stock to be transferred to other parties who attempted to repudiate the contract as a contract without repudiating the substantial part of the transaction which was delivery of the rock and receiving the price therefor; that the principal advantage which the defendant and its new owners sought to obtain by such repudiation was that they might avoid the payment of this commission; that their representative, Mr. Heaton, had heard of a contract, but did not take the trouble to inquire for it and ascertain its exact terms; that thereupon the plaintiffs within a reasonable time gave notice that they would demand their commission, and at the proper time commenced this action to enforce such demand.

It is true that on September 13, 1911, in a letter to the defendant, the plaintiffs, referring to a statement made to them by Mr. Brock that "two car loads a day, to begin would be all this company of men could handle," said:

> "So please fill the order for the county with 2 cars each day, and only 2 cars until further orders. * * * Please allow this written order to supersede all conversations and writings."

But this was nothing more than a request referring to the rate of deliveries. In our opinion, it was not an attempt to cancel the alleged written contract. Such cancellation could not be made by a writing between the principal and agent on one side of a contract, and the subject-matter of the letter is not such that it should be construed as superseding the entire contract, if such contract existed.

Under the circumstances above noted, this case should be determined upon the assumption that Superintendent Brock had authority to make the contract which he undertook to make on behalf of the defendant. The defendant accepted the benefits of that contract and performed it; also accepted the benefit of the services of the plaintiffs, who were its agents, with reference thereto. The statements and actions of Mr. Heaton on September 23d and the defendant's claim that it was not delivering rock under the contract do not neutralize the fact that the defendant proceeded to deliver the same quantities of rock, and for the same compensation, that had been provided for in that contract. Even if it were conceded that defendant might have refused to deliver the rock, and might have exacted different terms, basing its position upon Brock's lack of authority, yet it is estopped to deny such authority, as against these plaintiffs, who as actual and undenied agents relied upon Brock's due authorization and obtained for defendant the benefits which it has accepted. The same reasoning and the same conclusion apply to defendant's claim that Supervisor Deaderick had no authority to represent the county of Santa Barbara in purchasing rock for the Montecito road. The county recognized his authority by accepting and paying for the rock as delivered by the defendant, and that is sufficient for all purposes of the present case.

Some exceptions to the rulings on evidence are discussed in the briefs of appellant, but, so far as they have importance, they are involved in the foregoing discussion and are determined thereby.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

UNION LUMBER CO. v. J. W. SCHOUTEN CO. (Civ. 1353.)

1. PLEADING (§ 248*)—AMENDMENT.

Where the original complaint seeking recovery of the purchase price of lumber sold to defendant was merely for goods sold, an amended complaint, which added a count for an account stated, alleging that owing to a mistake the item for the goods sold was not inserted in the account stated, does not state a new cause of action; both counts being for the same matter.

2. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 127*)—STARTING OF RUNNING OF STATUTE.

An action is begun when the original complaint is filed, and hence though an amended count, upon which plaintiff recovered and which was on a different theory from the original, was not filed until after the action would have been barred, defendant cannot defeat recovery by plea of limitations.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 543–547; Dec. Dig. § 127.*]

3. ACCOUNT STATED (§ 8*)—EFFECT.

Where, through mistake, plaintiff did not include in an account stated all of the items due from defendant, and defendant must have either been party to the mistake or have paid the account suspecting it, plaintiff is not estopped to claim the omitted amount; an account stated, which is an account examined and accepted by the parties, not working an estoppel.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by the Union Lumber Company, a corporation, against the J. W. Schouten Company, a corporation. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

L. H. Brownstone, of San Francisco, for appellant. Charles A. Strong, of San Francisco (Charles E. Wilson, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

These are the facts of the case: For several years prior to the 18th day of April, 1906, the plaintiff and defendant were engaged in the lumber business, plaintiff as a manufacturer, and defendant as a retailer, in the San Francisco market. Prior to the 11th day of April, 1906, the plaintiff had sold the defendant at various times large quantities of lumber, and on that date sold and delivered to it a further quantity amounting in value to the sum of $1,121.06. June 9, 1906, the defendant, being unable to meet its obligations as they matured, made an assignment for the benefit of its creditors of its entire business.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

About the time of the assignment, the plaintiff presented its claim to the committee of creditors to whom the assignment had been made, for the sum of $5,553.53, which was $1,121.06 less than the defendant actually owed plaintiff. This mistake and omission occurred by reason of the fact, so it was alleged and proved, that plaintiff's books were not completely written up or posted on said 9th day of June, 1906, owing to the confusion resulting from the fire and earthquake on the 18th day of April of that year. The creditors' committee paid plaintiff the sum of $5,553.53, and thereafter, the plaintiff, learning of the mistake just referred to, and the defendant having again resumed control of its business, requested of defendant payment of said sum of $1,121.06, which payment the defendant having refused to make, this action was commenced, resulting in the judgment indicated. The original complaint was for goods sold and delivered; and subsequently, a few months before trial, plaintiff, over an objection of the defendant, filed an amended complaint, setting forth two causes of action, the first being identical with that pleaded in the original complaint, and the second alleging an account stated, that there was an error therein, subsequently discovered, amounting to the sum claimed to be due under the first cause of action, and praying for equitable relief and judgment for said sum.

[1] Defendant now asserts that permission to file the amended complaint containing the second cause of action should have been denied, for the reason, so it is stated, that it was wholly a new and different cause of action, and also for the reason that it appears that it was filed more than two years after the filing of the original complaint.

Neither of these objections is good. The amended complaint did not set up wholly a new and independent cause of action. Both causes of action were to recover the value of the same consignment of lumber, the charge for which, through an inadvertence, was omitted from the account as stated. Both causes of action had the same and identical purpose; hence the amended complaint cannot be held to have set forth a new cause of action. The authorities abundantly support this position. Born v. Castle, 16 Cal. App. Dec. 1051, 134 Pac. 347. The test as to what constitutes a new cause of action is laid down in Anderson v. Wetter, 103 Me. 268, 69 Atl. 110 (15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1003), as follows:

> "The new count, offered under leave to amend, must be consistent with the former count or counts, that is, it must be of the like kind of action, * * * and such as might have been originally joined with the others. It must be for the same cause of action, that is, the subject-matter of the new count must be the same as of the old; it must not be for an additional claim or demand, but only a variation of the form of demanding the same thing."

[2] As both complaints were for the recovery of the price of the same lot of goods, the action itself, irrespective of the theory on which the right to recover is based, must be regarded as having been commenced when the original complaint was filed. There is no merit therefore in defendant's point that the statute of limitations had run against the cause of action set forth in the amended complaint. Bogart v. Crosby & Van Haren, 91 Cal. 278, 281, 27 Pac. 603; Smullen v. Phillips, 92 Cal. 408–411, 28 Pac. 442.

[3] The evidence clearly sustains the view that the omission to include the amount herein sought to be recovered in the claim originally presented was due to an oversight and mistake, which was either mutual or suspected by the defendant. In either event, the account stated did not work an estoppel, and the court was warranted in surcharging the account.

An account stated does not bar a recovery for items not within the contemplation of the parties when the settlement was made. Waldron v. Evans, 1 Dak. 11, 46 N. W. 607; Clarke v. Kelsey, 41 Neb. 766, 60 N. W. 138; Pavie v. Noyrel, 5 Mart. N. S. (La.) 92; Fox v. Sturm, 21 Tex. 407.

> "The 'account stated' is defined by Bouvier to be 'an agreed balance of accounts; an account which has been examined and accepted by the parties.' * * * It does not, however, operate as an estoppel, and it may be impeached for fraud or mistake. Judge Story says: 'If there has been any mistake, or omission, or accident, or fraud, or undue advantage, by which the account stated is in truth vitiated, and the balance is incorrectly fixed, a court of equity will not suffer it to be conclusive upon the parties, but will allow it to be opened and re-examined.'" Green v. Thornton, 96 Cal. 67, 71, 30 Pac. 965, 966.

Defendant's points that the books of account were improperly admitted in evidence, and that the court failed to find on the third and separate defense, are without merit, and for that reason will not be discussed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

4. Abandonment (§ 2*)—What Constitutes.

Abandonment cannot be made in favor of a particular individual nor as a means of transfer from one party to another. Hence where respondent acquired a tax deed to property upon which his mother entered under a contract to purchase, and which was used as the family home, and the mother informed respondent that she relinquished the property to him, but the family continued to use the premises as before, there was no abandonment by her, and, the son's title being based on that of his mother, he cannot, after the vendor's recovery of judgment against her in a suit to quiet title, assert his rights by reason of the tax deed and adverse possession against the successful party.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Dresser against Sylvester Kipp and others. There was a judgment for defendants, and, a writ of possession being issued against plaintiff, the property was claimed by James S. Dresser. From an order vacating an order upon James S. Dresser to show cause why an alias writ of possession should not issue against him, defendant Kipp appeals. Order reversed and remanded with directions.

See, also, 17 Cal. App. 508, 120 Pac. 65.

Sylvester Kipp and Haines & Haines, all of San Diego, for appellant. E. S. Torrance, of San Diego, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. The defendant Sylvester Kipp presents this appeal from an order made and entered on August 2, 1912, whereby the court vacated a certain order of date April 29, 1912, upon James S. Dresser to show cause why an alias writ of possession should not issue against him on the judgment entered in said action, in so far as said order to show cause related to or affected the right of said James S. Dresser to the possession of the premises described in the judgment in this action; and whereby the superior court ordered that said alias writ of possession against said James S. Dresser should be denied and that he should recover his costs.

This action was commenced by Mary E. Dresser against Levi Allen, Sylvester Kipp, and H. F. Weis for the purpose of quieting plaintiff's title against the defendants. Defendant Kipp answered claiming title to the property described in the complaint, and the judgment of the court established his title against the plaintiff and awarded him a writ of possession against her. That judgment was affirmed in this court on November 20, 1911 (17 Cal. App. 508, 120 Pac. 65). A writ of possession having been issued on February 21, 1912, the same, with the sheriff's return indorsed thereon, was filed on April 20, 1912. The return shows that on March 16, 1912, the sheriff entered upon said premises and found said Mary E. Dresser upon the same and notified her that if she did not vacate said premises within ten days after said date he would dispossess her of said premises by forcibly removing her from the same; that on the 26th day of March, 1912, the sheriff again entered upon said premises described in said writ for the purpose of executing the same, and found that said Mary E. Dresser had vacated the said premises and that James S. Dresser and M. C. Dresser were upon said premises and claimed that they had adverse possession of said premises under a tax title, and claimed that such title was not derived from the plaintiff in said writ named. For said reasons the sheriff did not place the defendant Kipp in possession of the premises. In response to the order to show cause, which was issued against Mary E. Dresser, James S. Dresser, and Mary Caroline Dresser, the said Mary E. Dresser answered that within ten days after March 16, 1912, she did wholly vacate and abandon said premises and does not claim any right to the possession thereof; and Mary Caroline Dresser answered that she has never claimed and does not claim any possession or right of possession of said premises. The questions at issue herein rest wholly between the defendant Kipp and the respondent James S. Dresser.

The respondent was not a party to the action, and his claim of right to retain possession of the premises is based upon the contention that he is, and since a time long prior to the commencement of this action (which was on October 20, 1909) he has been, in possession of the described real property adversely to the plaintiff and all others; that ever since the 19th day of November, 1900, he has been in the exclusive possession of said premises for himself in his own right under a claim of title thereto made by him in good faith under a certain tax deed presented to the court as a part of his answer to the order to show cause.

[1, 2] It is conceded that in this proceeding the court could not try or determine any proprietary rights which the respondent may have under his claim of title. We are here concerned only with the matter of right to possession under the writ. If respondent came into possession at any time after the commencement of this action, it is presumed that he came in under the plaintiff, and upon the issue pertaining to his right to remain in possession the burden is upon him to show affirmatively that his possession is rightful and under a title that has not been determined in the action, and that such possession was not taken by collusion with the plaintiff. The fruits of a successful litigation cannot be wrested from the prevailing party and the process of the courts evaded upon a mere claim set up under suspicious circumstances, resting upon affidavits alone, unless the case made by that kind of proof is reasonably satisfactory. Baum v. Roper, 1 Cal. App. 435, 439, 82 Pac. 390, and cases there cited.

The order of the superior court made after hearing on the order to show cause carries with it the implied finding that the respondent's possession began prior to the commencement of this action, or that, if it began subsequent thereto, he has satisfactorily shown to the court that his possession has been taken and maintained in good faith without collusion with the plaintiff and adversely to her.

[3, 4] On his application for the order to show cause the appellant presented a typewritten transcript (not certified) of the official court stenographer's minutes of the trial of this action, the said transcript being attached to an affidavit of the applicant in which he stated that he was present at the trial, heard all of the evidence and proceedings therein, and has a clear and distinct recollection of the same, and that said transcript is a true and correct statement of the evidence given by the witnesses Mary E. Dresser, James S. Dresser, and Mary Caroline Dresser, and of the whole thereof, "as affiant now remembers the same." Counsel for respondent insists that this affidavit is not sufficient to establish the transcript as a correct statement of the evidence, and that at all events the testimony then given by Mary E. Dresser and Mary Caroline Dresser is not binding upon him. Giving the respondent the full benefit of his objection to the testimony of others than himself, we have for consideration the testimony given by the respondent and his explanation thereof as contained in his affidavit filed in this proceeding. Mary E. Dresser is the mother of respondent, who is an unmarried man. In 1896 Mrs. Dresser made a contract of purchase of the land in controversy whereby, upon certain payments being made, the land was to be conveyed to her. Full payment never was made, and a deed of conveyance has never been made to the purchaser or any one claiming under her. Mrs. Dresser obtained possession from the agent of the vendor in 1896. She established her home upon the premises with her son, the said James S. Dresser, then about 27 years of age. Various improvements were made, in which the respondent took an active part, and in his affidavit he admits that his mother went into possession under the contract and remained in possession thereunder until the delivery to him of the tax deed under which he claims; said deed having been delivered to respondent in November, 1900. At the trial of this action and while the plaintiff was endeavoring to establish the fact of her long-continued possession of this property, the respondent (on December 13, 1909) testified as a witness in her behalf and stated, among other things, that he was a member of his mother's family and had been such for the last 14 years; that in making sundry improvements on the premises in controversy he did that work for his mother and was acting for her; "she bought the place for her home and I was fixing it up for her;" that his mother had gone into possession under the agreement of 1896; "Q. And she has been in possession ever since? A. Yes, sir. Q. Under that contract? A. Yes, sir."

The present claim of the respondent is that, ever since November 19, 1900, when said tax deed was delivered to him, he has been in the exclusive possession of said premises for himself and in his own right under a claim of title thereto made by him in good faith under said deed; that in the summer of 1900 his mother, the plaintiff, informed him that she intended to abandon said contract and would not make any further payments thereunder; that he purchased said tax title after receiving such information from his mother, and that his intention was that he "would endeavor to obtain a tax title to said premises and acquire title thereunder by adverse possession"; that, having purchased the certificate of sale from the original purchaser at the tax sale, the respondent, on October 9, 1900, made service upon Mary E. Dresser of a written notice to redeem and thereafter in due time said tax deed was issued to him; that upon receiving said deed respondent informed his mother of his intention as above stated, and that he then claimed and would continue to claim possession of said premises adversely to all persons whomsoever; "that thereupon his said mother declared to him that she had abandoned her right to possession of said premises under her contract with H. S. Mulford, and that she recognized the right of said James S. Dresser to the exclusive possession of said premises as against herself, based on his claim of title under said tax deed; that his mother then agreed to live with him on said premises as his housekeeper." Respondent further stated in his sworn answer and in his affidavit certain other facts slightly tending to support his claim of adverse possession since November, 1900. As the testimony is shown to be conflicting and inconsistent, we are bound to accept the conclusion of the superior court thereon, unless this result is controlled by admissions contained in respondent's said answer. But in our opinion the facts stated by the respondent in his answer contain admissions which preclude him from holding possession against the writ awarded to the appellant by the judgment herein. When Mrs. Dresser declared to respondent that she "had abandoned her right to possession" and that she "recognized the right" of respondent to "exclusive possession as against herself," she did not in fact abandon her actual possession in any manner whatever, except this, that without removing from the premises she attempted to abandon the same to the respondent. Abandonment cannot be made in favor of a particular individual, nor as a means of transfer from one party to another. Stephens v. Mansfield, 11 Cal. 363; Richardson v. McNulty, 24 Cal. 339, 344. Relinquishment by one to another is not abandonment. Nothing more than this was done or attempted in the present case. It being thus established that Mary E. Dresser's possession of the land was never abandoned by her until on or after March 16, 1912, and that the only possession obtained by respondent was by means of and subordinate to that of his mother, he cannot be permitted to resist the enforcement of the judgment in favor of appellant.

The order appealed from is reversed, and the superior court is directed to enter an order granting appellant's application for the alias writ.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

LUMMER v. UNRUH et al. (Civ. 1581.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 3, 1914.)

1. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 85*)—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In a suit to quiet title to land, which plaintiff claimed by adverse possession, evidence held sufficient to support a finding that plaintiff had, during most of his occupancy, paid rent to defendant's testator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 313, 498–503, 656, 657, 660, 668, 688–690; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1002*)—REVIEW—VERDICT.

An appellate court will not, where the evidence is substantially conflicting, weigh the credibility of the witnesses in determining whether the verdict was supported by the evidence, and it must stand if there be substantial evidence in its favor.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3935–3937; Dec. Dig. § 1002.*]

3. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 60*) — HOSTILE CHARACTER OF POSSESSION—ACQUIESCENCE.

Though plaintiff entered upon land believing it to be unappropriated property, his subsequent acquiescence in the assertion of title by defendant's testator and his payment of rent to the testator creates the relation of landlord and tenant between them.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 282–312, 323, 328; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

4. ADVERSE POSSESSION (§ 95*)—EVIDENCE—ADMISSIBILITY.

In a suit to quiet title, the return of land for assessment and payment of taxes on the land as therein described by defendant's testator is admissible in evidence, where the designation was sufficient to identify the land.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 530–532; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

5. DEEDS (§ 192*)—EXCEPTIONS—EFFECT.

Notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 3538, providing that that is certain which can be made certain, one, relying upon a deed containing an exception, to show his title to the land in controversy, is bound to show that the land did not fall within the exception.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Deeds, Cent. Dig. §§ 562, 563; Dec. Dig. § 192.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 854*)—REVIEW—HARMLESS ERROR.

Where the evidence clearly showed that defendant's testator had acquired title to the land in suit by adverse possession, if he did not have a good title otherwise, the fact that the paper title offered by defendant was insufficient is immaterial, and judgment for defendant, though based on his paper title, will not be reversed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3403, 3404, 3408–3424, 3427–3430; Dec. Dig. § 854.*]

7. DEEDS (§ 192*)—PROPERTY CONVEYED—PRESUMPTION.

In a suit to quiet title, where it was not shown that the land in controversy did not fall within the exception in defendant's deeds, proof that defendant's testator had been in possession of and had paid taxes on the land for over 30 years raises a presumption that it was not included in the exception.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Frederick Lummer against H. A. Unruh, as executor of Elias J. Baldwin, deceased, and others. From a judgment for defendants and an order denying a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney Dell, of Glendale, and Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for appellant Bradner W. Lee and Force Parker, both of Los Angeles (Gavin McNab, Garrett McEnerney, and Andrew F. Burke, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents.

SHAW, J. Action to quiet title to real estate. Judgment went for defendants, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

Defendant Unruh was sued as executor of the last will and testament of Elias J. Baldwin, deceased, who died March 1, 1909, and defendants Stocker and McClaughry were sued as the residuary legatees under the will of said deceased, all of whom, with the other defendants named, it is alleged, claim some interest, right, or title to the property in dispute.

The land involved, comprising 80.35 acres, is situated in and constitutes a part of the west two-thirds of the San Francisquito Rancho in Los Angeles county. Plaintiff's claim thereto is based solely and alone upon the adverse possession thereof; it being alleged in the complaint filed September 12, 1910, that on or about the 25th day of November, 1887, at which time the said tract was wild and uncultivated, covered with cactus and other desert growth, he entered into possession thereof, claiming it as his own property, since which time he has been in the open, notorious, exclusive, continuous, peacable, and adverse possession of the same, claiming title thereto, which, up to the 1st day of January, 1909, at which time he was in possession, had not been disputed; that by virtue of the premises plaintiff became and was the owner of the legal title to the same on and prior to the 1st day of January, 1896, and ever since said date has been and now is the owner of said land. The answer of defendants Unruh, Stocker, and McClaughry alleged that at the time of his death, and for many years prior thereto, Elias J. Baldwin was the owner in fee simple of all the lands and property described in plaintiff's complaint and claimed title thereto adversely to plaintiff, and that at the time of the death of said decedent defendants Stocker and McClaughry, as residuary devisees of said decedent, became entitled to said property and the whole thereof in fee simple, subject to the administration of the estate of said Baldwin, deceased; and that plaintiff during all of the time that he occupied said land did so as a tenant of said Baldwin and said Unruh as executor, from whom said plaintiff leased the same from year to year and up to the year ending October 1, 1909, paid a crop rental therefor.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Among other things, the court in substance found that at the time of the commencement of the action, and on Jaunary 1, 1909, plaintiff as a tenant, and not otherwise, of said Elias J. Baldwin and the estate of said Elias J. Baldwin, deceased, occupied the tract of land in controversy, but never was in the possession thereof, except as a tenant of said Elias J. Baldwin during his lifetime, and of his estate since his death; that on October 13, 1875, and up to and at the time of his death, said Elias J. Baldwin was the absolute owner, seised in fee simple, in the possession and entitled to the possession of said real property, and from said date up to November 25, 1887, in the actual occupation of said premises; that, while in the occupation and possession thereof, plaintiff, on November 25, 1887, with Baldwin's permission and consent, and as the tenant of said Baldwin, and not otherwise, entered into the occupation of said property as a yearly tenant of said Baldwin, which occupation and relation continued up to the time of his death, and thereafter as a tenant of the estate of said Baldwin, deceased; that during said time plaintiff paid yearly rents to said Baldwin for the use and occupation of said real property, except for the year ending October 1, 1909, when he refused to pay rent for that year and for the first time asserted an adverse claim of ownership to said real property; that at no time was plaintiff in possession of the real estate or any part thereof other than as a tenant of Elias J. Baldwin; that it is not true that said tract of land was uncultivated at the time the plaintiff entered into the occupation thereof, but small portions of said land were at said time covered with cactus and other growth. These findings are vigorously assailed upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the same.

[1, 2] The evidence offered in behalf of respondents and upon which the findings are based clearly tends to prove that in 1867 one Henry Dalton, by United States patent, acquired the entire Rancho San Francisquito; that on March 8, 1873, Dalton by deed conveyed to Lewis Wolfskill "all the unsold portion of that certain tract of land known as San Francisquito Rancho"; that on October 13, 1875, Wolfskill by deed conveyed to Elias J. Baldwin "the westerly two-thirds portion of the Rancho Francisquito, * * * excepting those portions heretofore sold and conveyed by John O. Wheeler and Henry Dalton, or Dalton and F. L. A. Pioche, or Lewis Wolfskill, the conveyances of which are of record in the county recorder's office in and for said county of Los Angeles." The parcel of land involved is an irregular-shaped tract containing 80.35 acres, uninclosed by a fence and conceded to be a part of the westerly two-thirds portion of the San Francisquito Rancho; and it is likewise conceded that from 1875 down to the date of his death Baldwin made return thereof and paid the taxes assessed against the property, though appellant claims the assessment upon which the tax levy was made was void for uncertainty of description. Prior to plaintiff's entry upon the land, November 25, 1887, it was occupied by some Mexicans, who farmed it as tenants of Baldwin. There is no direct evidence that plaintiff's entry in 1887 was under and by virtue of any contractual relations with Baldwin, or his agents; but it does clearly appear from a preponderance of the evidence that, commencing with the year 1887, down to 1908, and every year during said period, plaintiff as to the land in dispute recognized Baldwin as his landlord by annually paying him, through several superintendents and rent collectors, a certain portion of the crop grown thereon, as rental for the use of the property; that at times he sublet portions of it, and these subtenants paid to Baldwin a rental for such portion as they farmed. There was also testimony to the effect that plaintiff had stated he was paying rent to Baldwin for the use of the property, and plaintiff admits that Baldwin contributed a considerable sum towards the construction of a well in developing water upon the premises. Evidence was introduced that in 1908 plaintiff failed to pay the rent; whereupon Baldwin served notice upon him to quit and vacate the premises, pursuant to which plaintiff moved a part at least of his effects from the property, when, due to the intercession of a friend, Baldwin consented that plaintiff might continue as tenant in the occupation of twenty acres of the land, and leased the remainder of the tract to other parties made defendants herein. As against this testimony, and other established facts to which we have made no reference, but from which inferences favorable to respondents' contention are fairly deducible, plaintiff, to some extent corroborated by his wife, testified that he never at any time paid rent to Baldwin, or any other person, for the use of the land in dispute; that in 1890 or 1891 he did lease from Baldwin 60 acres of land adjoining the tract claimed by him, separated by an imaginary line only, which, up to 1908, he farmed and for the use of which he paid Baldwin a yearly crop rental. Appellant, while admitting the fact that plaintiff's testimony upon the vital point, as found by the court, is opposed to that of a half dozen or more witnesses testifying on behalf of defendants, strenuously insists that such testimony should for various and sundry reasons assigned be disregarded by this court. His counsel devote much of the greater part of a voluminous brief to what he terms an analysis of the testimony, in his effort to show why certain witnesses who gave evidence for plaintiff should be credited with telling the truth, while those testifying for defendants should be discredited. No purpose could be subserved by an extended review of the evidence. Suffice it to say that from a careful reading of the entire record we are forced to the conclusion that, while plaintiff may have entered upon the land or a part thereof believing, as he stated, that it was no man's land, he nevertheless, upon learning of his error, commencing with 1887, recognized Baldwin as the owner thereof and that his occupation was in subordination to the rights of Baldwin, and during all of the time down to 1908, at which time Baldwin caused to be served upon him notice to quit and vacate the premises, he annually paid to Baldwin a yearly crop rental for the use of the premises. Where the evidence is substantially conflicting, it is not the province of this court to weigh the same, or determine whether or not witnesses have sworn falsely. If there is any evidence upon which the court could have made the findings, or a jury could have found a verdict, the action of the trial court must be upheld. Meyer v. Great Western Ins. Co., 104 Cal. 387, 38 Pac. 82; Clopton v. Clopton, 162 Cal. 27, 121 Pac. 720; Carteri v. Roberts, 140 Cal. 164, 73 Pac. 818.

[3] As stated, there was no direct evidence that plaintiff entered upon the land pursuant to the terms of a lease, and it may be conceded that, as testified by him, he squatted thereon, believing it to be government land. A formal letting, however, is not necessary to create the relation of landlord and tenant.

> "After a person has entered upon land without right, the relation of landlord and tenant, of course, subsequently arises by implication." 18 Am. & Eng. Encyc. of Law, p. 165.
> "Where a person in the possession of land pays rent to one claiming as owner, a presumption of the relation of landlord and tenant arises." 24 Cyc. p. 888; Doe v. Jefferson, 5 Houst. (Del.) 477; Cressler v. Williams, 80 Ind. 367.

Under the evidence adduced, the payment of rent, as found by the court, could not be attributed other than to the fact that plaintiff's occupation was in subordination to the title recognized by him as vested in Baldwin, whose title, under the circumstances, he will not be permitted to deny. Section 1962, Code Civ. Proc. The case is to be distinguished from one where the owner in possession of land accepts a lease thereof from another, in which case his title is unaffected by such act. Baldwin v. Temple, 101 Cal. 396, 35 Pac. 1008.

[4] It is conceded that plaintiff never at any time made return of the property for assessment purposes, or paid any taxes thereon. On the other hand, it is conceded that Baldwin paid the taxes, but appellant insists that the assessment of the property was void for uncertainty of description therein. It appears that in 1869 John Goldsworthy made a survey and map of the westerly two-thirds of the rancho, subdividing it into lots designated thereon by number. While Baldwin had no interest in the property at the time this map was made, it appears that after the execution of the Wolfskill deed in 1875, whereby he claims to have acquired the property therein described, he, on August 3, 1901, filed and had recorded in the county recorder's office a full, true, and correct copy of the Goldsworthy survey and map, on which, among other lots delineated thereon, was a lot numbered 14 containing 80.35 acres, which is shown to be identical with the tract of land claimed by plaintiff. In 1891 to 1896, both inclusive, the assessment described the property as, "Lot 14 in San Francisquito Rancho, containing 80.35 acres." For the years 1897 to and including 1910, it was, with some slight variation, described as, "Lot 14, western ⅔ of Rancho San Francisquito, containing 80.35 acres." Prior to the filing of the map, and commencing with 1880, it was described as, "Lot 14 of Tract Rancho San Francisquito, county of Los Angeles, being subdivided and designated on map made by John Goldsworthy in January, 1869." It was shown without contradiction that this was the only map on file purporting to be a map of the rancho, and that it had delineated thereon a lot designated as lot 14. It was further conclusively shown that long prior to the filing thereof the Goldsworthy map was a well-known and generally recognized subdivision of the west two-thirds of the rancho, frequently referred to in deeds made by conveyancers as a means of describing lands located in the rancho. Other testimony was to the effect that as described the boundaries of the land could be readily located. Says Mr. Cooley, in his work on Taxation:

> "The designation of the land will be sufficient if it affords the owner a means of identification and does not positively mislead him, or is not calculated to mislead him."

To the same effect are the decisions of the Supreme Court of this state. See Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 736, 78 Pac. 293; San Francisco v. Pennie, 93 Cal. 465, 29 Pac. 66; San Francisco v. Flood, 64 Cal. 504, 2 Pac. 264. Leaving out of consideration any question as to whether or not Baldwin, by reason of having made the return, could have been estopped from pleading uncertainty in the description of the assessment in an action to enforce a lien for the taxes, we are clearly of the opinion that the assessment sufficiently described the property, and the objection urged by plaintiff to the admission of the evidence is therefore without merit.

[5] Appellant also insists that the court committed grave and prejudicial errors of law in admitting certain documents in evidence. These documents consisted of: First, a deed from Henry Dalton, who in 1867 by patent acquired the entire rancho from the United States government, which deed was executed March 8, 1873, by Dalton to Lewis Wolfskill, whereby the former conveyed to the latter "all the unsold portion of that certain tract of land known as the San Francisquito Rancho; second, a deed dated October 13, 1875, executed by Lewis Wolfskill and others whereby they conveyed to Elias J. Baldwin the "westerly two-thirds portion of the Rancho San Francisquito, * * * excepting those portions heretofore sold and conveyed by John O. Wheeler and Henry Dalton, or Dalton and F. L. A. Pioche, or Lewis Wolfskill, the conveyances of which are of record in the county recorder's office in and for said county of Los Angeles." The purpose of this evidence was to show that title of record to the land in question was vested in Baldwin. Appellant's contention is that, in the absence of evidence showing such fact, the deeds cannot be construed as embracing the land in controversy, and, while conceding that that is certain which can be made certain (Civ. Code, § 3538), no evidence was offered touching the question as to whether or not the lands in dispute had at the time of the execution of the Dalton deed been sold, nor whether they were included in the conveyance referred to in the Wolfskill deed. Since by introducing these deeds defendants sought to establish the fact that Baldwin was the record owner of the property, they must be deemed to have assumed the burden of showing that the tract of land was not within the exceptions therein contained. The deeds did not purport to convey the entire tract of land, the boundaries of which were specified therein, but excepted from the operation thereof such portions as had been sold and conveyed. True it may be that no sales had been made at the time of the execution of the Dalton deed, and likewise true that no conveyance of any of the lands had been made by the parties designated which were of record at the time of the execution of the Wolfskill deed; nevertheless, by reason of the language employed, a presumption arises that sales and conveyances had been made, and it was therefore incumbent upon defendants to either overcome such presumption by showing that no sales and conveyances had been made of lands within the exterior boundaries described, or, if sales and conveyances thereof had been made, to prove that the tract of land in controversy was not included therein. No evidence, however, was offered touching these questions. We conceive the law to be that, where a party claims under a deed describing a tract of land, the granting clause of which contains an exception, he must, if he relies upon such deed as establishing his title to land in controversy, show that the land claimed is not within the exception; otherwise the deed is ineffectual for the purposes offered. From the fact that certain lands within the exterior boundaries of the general clause contained in the deed were excepted from the operation thereof, it cannot be said, in the absence of proof, that the land in dispute is not within the exception. That such is the well settled law is supported by ample authority. See Harman v. Stearns, 95 Va. 58, 27 S. E. 601; Logan v. Ward, 58 W. Va. 366, 52 S. E. 398, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 156; Maxwell Land Grant Co. v. Dawson, 151 U. S. 586, 14 Sup. Ct. 458, 38 L. Ed. 279; Hawkins v. Barney, 5 Pet. 457, 8 L. Ed. 190; Reusens v. Lawson, 91 Va. 226, 21 S. E. 347; Corinne Mill, Canal & S. Co. v. Johnson, 156 U. S. 574, 15 Sup. Ct. 409, 39 L. Ed. 537. In the case of Maxwell Land Grant Co. v. Dawson, supra, it is said:

> "An exception in a grant is said to withdraw from its operation some part or parcel of the thing granted, which, but for the exception, would have passed to the grantee under the general description. The effect in such cases in respect to the thing excepted is as though it had never been included in the deed."

The deeds in themselves and standing alone were insufficient to show a record title vested in Baldwin.

[6, 7] If, however, we are correct in holding that during the period extending from 1887 down to 1908 Baldwin, claiming to be the owner, was in possession of the land through plaintiff as his tenant, paying all taxes levied thereon, then it may be assumed that he acquired a title by prescription. Hence the fact that the deeds on their face were insufficient to constitute a paper title would be immaterial, since in no event could plaintiff have been prejudiced by defendants' failure to prove a record title. Moreover, as stated, the evidence clearly tends to establish the fact that, until plaintiff in 1909 asserted his adverse claim thereto, Baldwin had for a period of 33 years been in the undisturbed possession of the land, exercising all the rights of ownership therein without challenge or question from any sources, during all of which time he had, as stated, paid all taxes levied thereon. Under these circumstances, if necessary to sustain the judgment, the law will presume the land was not within the exceptions made in the deeds. The failure of any person during this long period of time to make claim of ownership based upon a sale made by Dalton prior to his conveyance to Wolfskill, and like failure of any one claiming under a conveyance executed by Wolfskill prior to his conveyance to Baldwin was a strong circumstance indicating that no such sales or conveyances had been made of the tract here involved. Herndon v. Burnett, 21 Tex. Civ. App. 25, 50 S. W. 581; Cahill v. Cahill, 75 Conn. 522, 54 Atl. 201, 732, 60 L. R. A. 706. While it is unusual to invoke such presumption, since the statute of limitations generally constitutes a sufficient defense, nevertheless, if the circumstances of the case justify it, such presumption will be indulged regardless of whether or not the statute has run. "There is no absolute bar against the presumption of a grant, within a period short of the statute of limitations." Ricard v. Williams, 20 U. S. (7 Wheat.) 59, 5 L. Ed. 398. Therefore, upon the principle that when the possession and use of real property under a claim of right thereto have been long continued they create a presumption of lawful origin (Fletcher v. Fuller, 120 U. S. 534, 7 Sup. Ct. 667, 30 L. Ed. 759; Attorney General v. Horner, 2 Ch. Div. [C. A.] 140), the court is justified in indulging the presumption that the tract of land in dispute was not within exceptions specified in the deeds, and, notwithstanding the failure of defendants to make direct proof as to the land being without the exception, such fact, in the absence of any evidence to the contrary, will be presumed.

In discussing the case we have throughout the opinion assumed that the tract of land in controversy consisted of said lot 14, comprising 80.35 acres. It appears that at the close of the evidence plaintiff amended his complaint by adding to the description of land therein contained as claimed by him, another tract the boundaries of which were conceded to be identical with lot 13 delineated upon the Goldsworthy map, and it was stipulated that all of the evidence applicable to the case as alleged in the original complaint should be deemed to apply to the case as amended. Hence whatever is said with reference to lot 14, comprising 80.35 acres, is likewise applicable to the land as described in the amended complaint.

We find no prejudicial error in the record. The judgment and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial are therefore affirmed.

UNRUH v. LUMMER. PERRY v. LUMMER (UNRUH, Intervener). ROGERS v. SAME. (Civ. 1407.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 3, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; C. A. Raker, Judge.

Actions by H. A. Unruh, as executor of E. J. Baldwin, deceased, against Fred Lummer; by Carrie Perry, as administratrix of John Perry, deceased, against Fred Lummer, in which H. A. Unruh intervened; and by L. C. Rogers against Fred Lummer, in which H. A. Unruh intervened. From several judgments for H. A. Unruh as executor, and orders denying new trial, Fred Lummer appeals. Affirmed.

Sidney Dell, of Glendale, and Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Bradner W. Lee and Force Parker, both of Los Angeles (Gavin McNab, Garrett McEnerney, and Andrew F. Burke, all of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondents and intervener.

SHAW, J. The above-entitled actions grew out of the fact that defendant therein claimed ownership by adverse user to certain lands the title to which was involved in the case of Lummer v. Unruh et al. (Civil No. 1581), 142 Pac. 914, an opinion in which on appeal to this court was this day filed, affirming a judgment rendered by the trial court in favor of defendants therein.

During the trial of said case of Lummer v. Unruh, it was stipulated in open court by the attorneys for the respective parties that the above-entitled actions should abide and be controlled by the determination of the court in said case of Lummer v. Unruh, and that, upon judgment being rendered in said last-mentioned case, judgment in each of the above-entitled actions should, without trial, be rendered therein in accordance with said decision. The court having rendered a judgment in favor of defendants in the Lummer-Unruh Case, likewise, pursuant to said stipulation, rendered judgments in favor of plaintiffs in each of the above-entitled actions, from which, and orders denying his motions for new trial, the defendant has appealed. No briefs are filed herein by any of the parties to said actions; it being understood and agreed that said appeals shall be disposed of by this court in accordance with its decision in the case of Lummer v. Unruh et al., above referred to.

It is therefore ordered that the judgments and orders denying defendant's motion for new trial in each of the above-entitled cases be and the same are hereby affirmed.

LAPIQUE v. PLUMMER. (L. A. 3332.)

1. EXECUTORS AND ADMINISTRATORS (§ 315*)—DISTRIBUTION OF ESTATE—DECREE—JUDGMENT AGAINST DEBTOR.

A decree distributing to an heir or legatee a claim against one indebted to the decedent, while a judgment sufficient to pass title to the distributee, is not a judgment against the debtor for the money or property due on the claim on which the heir or legatee could sue as assignee.

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1043*)—JUDGMENT—ATTACHMENT — DISMISSAL — JURISDICTION —PREJUDICE.

Where plaintiff on his own showing had no case entitling him to an attachment, he was not prejudiced by an order discharging the attachment after he had appealed from a judgment of nonsuit.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; H. C. Gesford, Judge.

Action by John Lapique against E. R. Plummer. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in damages.

John Lapique, of Orange, in pro. per. Shirley E. Meserve and J. D. Taggart, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff brought this suit, and in his complaint alleged that he was the assignee of a judgment rendered on the 25th day of January, 1911, by the superior court, in favor of Dolores U. de Marquez against Eugene R. Plummer, for the sum of $3,700. His proof showed that to his said assignor had been distributed, as a part of the estate of Manuel Marquez, a claim against said Plummer for $3,700, and this claim had been assigned by her to plaintiff. There was no showing and no attempt to show that the claim had been reduced to a judgment. Indeed, it was the theory of the plaintiff that the decree of distribution itself operated as a money judgment against Plummer and in favor of Mrs. de Marquez. Defendant moved for a nonsuit at the conclusion of the testimony on behalf of plaintiff. The motion was granted, and from the judgment, as well as from an order discharging an attachment, plaintiff appeals.

[1] The learned judge of the superior court, who presided at the trial, carefully, courteously, and repeatedly explained to the plaintiff that a mere claim distributed to an heir or legatee in a probate proceeding was not a judgment for the money or property mentioned therein. Realizing that the plaintiff was not a lawyer, the learned judge took great pains to demonstrate that the theory which plaintiff had adopted was absolutely a false one. A few brief quotations from the record will serve to illustrate how thoroughly he analyzed the matter so that the most untrained and immature mind might easily have grasped the true situation. He said:

> "The superior court of this county, acting in the exercise of its jurisdiction as a probate court, has settled and distributed this estate, and in the distribution of that estate it has decreed, not that there is anything due from Mr. Plummer to this distributee, not a dollar, but has decreed that that claim that the estate has urged, and which has been inventoried possibly against this party, is distributed to the distributee. There is the distinction. Not that any claim has been adjudged to be a valid and existing claim against Mr. Plummer, but it has been adjudged that that claim be distributed to this party, so that the party may take such proceedings afterwards as she sees fit, to reduce that claim to a judgment, because, if it was a judgment, all you would have to do in this court would be simply to introduce the judgment roll and that would end it, and then it would be upon the other side to attack it for lack of jurisdiction or fraud, or on some other ground."

The plaintiff stoutly insisted that the decree of distribution was a judgment, and the court replied:

> "It is a judgment, but you want to make it a judgment for property that the law does not permit. It is a judgment decreeing that whatever that claim is against Mr. Plummer belongs to this distributee rather than to John Doe or Richard Roe or anybody else. If this distributee brought suit to reduce that claim to a judgment, you would have to introduce the decree to show that the probate court adjudged that that was a claim, whatever it amounted to; it may be worth $1 or $5 or $3,700 after it had been threshed out before a jury."

In granting the motion for nonsuit, this language was used by the court:

> "You have simply brought suit upon a wrong theory of the case. Mr. Plummer never had any day in court to contest that claim. He was not a party to that probate proceeding; never had any opportunity in any way to show any defense to that claim, either on the merits or otherwise, and there never has been a judgment in this case on which you could sue. Motion for a nonsuit granted."

In spite of the court's careful explanation of these elementary matters, the plaintiff has taken this most frivolous appeal from the judgment. It is unfair to litigants prosecuting appeals in good faith to have our time and a place on the calendar taken up by such an appeal, based on a theory so absurd as that which appellant affects to entertain. We are not unmindful of the fact that the plaintiff is a layman, but we cannot think that he believes, in good faith, that he is the owner of a judgment against Plummer, on which he has sued in this case.

[2] It is unnecessary to consider at length the appeal from the order discharging the attachment. It is asserted by appellant that the court was without jurisdiction to make the order because he had perfected his appeal. But it is really immaterial whether the court acted with or without jurisdiction. On appellant's own showing this was not a case in which an attachment ever was properly issued, as its facts did not bring it within the provisions of section 537 of the Code of Civil Procedure. He cannot be injured, therefore, because he is deprived of something to which he never was entitled.

The judgment and order are affirmed, and, as it appears to us that the appeals are frivolous and were made for delay, we direct that damages in the sum of $100 be added to the costs of appeal.

1. EVIDENCE (§ 594*)—WEIGHT AND SUFFICIENCY.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to quiet title to lots 9 and 11, block 137, in the city of Long Beach, and lot 190 in the town of Willowbrook, all in the county of Los Angeles. The defendant is his stepmother. Judgment passed for defendant, and plaintiff appeals.

Hulda R. Roberts, mother of this plaintiff and then wife of his father, Charles Roberts, owned lots 5 and 6 of block 10 of the California Co-Operative Colony Tract. She conveyed this property to her husband by deed, reciting a consideration of love and affection. Thereafter she died. Charles Roberts married Margerie M. Roberts, defendant herein. He and defendant conveyed away lots 5 and 6 of block 10 in consideration of the conveyance to Charles Roberts of lots 9 and 11, block 137, of the city of Long Beach, two of the lots title to which is here in controversy. Charles Roberts, by conveyance from the Willowbrook Company, obtained title to lot 190 in the town of Willowbrook. Thereafter Roberts conveyed to Margerie M. Roberts, his wife, lots 9 and 11 in the city of Long Beach and lot 190 in the town of Willowbrook. Plaintiff pleads an equitable title to the Long Beach lots and the Willowbrook lot, growing out of the following asserted facts: That they were taken by his father in exchange for lots 5 and 6 of block 10 of the California Co-Operative Colony Tract; that these lots in the colony tract were in fact the separate property of his deceased mother; that by her will she left all her real and personal property to plaintiff, with a life estate to her husband; that the better to consummate the purposes declared in her will she made the forementioned deeds to lots 5 and 6 to her husband, plaintiff's father, with the understanding that he in turn should make his deed to these lots in favor of plaintiff, and deposit this deed in escrow, to be delivered to him upon the death of his father; that his father did so place the deed in escrow, and thereafter, in violation of plaintiff's rights, made his deed conveying away these same lots, and receiving in return therefor the lots described in the complaint, which thus equitably belong to plaintiff.

[1] The findings of the court, and consequently its judgment, were against plaintiff upon all these matters. Upon his appeal he advances the argument that as he himself testified to the existence of these facts, and there was no opposing evidence, it was the duty of the court to have found in his favor, and its findings against him are unsupported. But the court was not under compulsion to accept the testimony of plaintiff, and while from the nature of the case it would be difficult to present direct evidence against plaintiff's positive statements, there were circumstances which manifestly to the mind of the court discredited plaintiff's evidence. Thus, as set forth by plaintiff in his original verified complaint, the nature of the deed was that it conveyed the fee to the plaintiff, reserving to the father a life estate, "with the right to trade said property." In his evidence he denies that the deed contained such provision. He testifies that the deed was acknowledged by his father upon a day certain and before a named notary. No deed was acknowledged by his father before any notary upon that day, and the deed, which had a different date, and which was acknowledged, in so far as the notarial entry bears evidence of its contents, was not to the lands in question. Again he declares that this deed was placed in escrow by his father at the Los Angeles National Bank with one F. G. Howes, an officer of the bank. Howes was dead at the time of the trial and evidence of the bank is that no such deed and no record of such an escrow could be found. We need not, however, pursue this further. Enough has been already set forth to show that the court was not under compulsion to accept the evidence of plaintiff.

[2, 3] Plaintiff's offer of introduction in evidence of the will of his mother was rejected. The offer was for the single and sole purpose of proving title to the land in plaintiff. Objection was made that title could not be proved in this way, in that the will had never been offered for or admitted to probate. The objection was properly sustained, and if for any conceivable purpose the will might have been admissible in evidence, it was not admissible for the offered purpose, and it was not therefore error upon the part of the court to refuse it admission for the single and specific purpose for which it was offered, even though it might have been admissible for some other purpose not indicated in the proffer. 1 Wigmore, Evidence, § 17b.

For these reasons, the judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

Oakland City Charter (St. 1911, pp. 1608, 1609) §§ 94, 95, provide for pension of aged, infirm, and disabled members of the police force, and section 96, subd. 1, provides relief for the family of an officer killed in the performance of duty, and declares: (a) That should he be married, the amount shall be paid to his widow so long as she remains single; and (b) if the officer left no widow, but left an orphan child or children under 16 years, or the widow die without marrying while the child or children were under 16, they should receive the pension; and (c) that if there was no widow or orphan child or children, parents dependent solely on the decedent for support should receive the pension during the time of necessity. Held, that sections 94 and 95 did not exclude the members of the family of an officer who had been retired and was receiving a pension at the time of his death from benefits under section 96, subd. 2, nor limit the benefits of the latter section to relatives of officers who had never received a pension.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; W. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by Sydney E. Mackey and others against Frank E. Mott and others, constituting the Board of Trustees of the Police Relief and Pension Fund of the City of Oakland. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

W. S. Angwin, of Oakland, for appellants. Ben F. Woolner and William H. O'Brien, both of Oakland, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to obtain a writ of mandate directed against the defendants, constituting the board of directors of the police relief and pension fund of the city of Oakland, requiring defendants to issue to plaintiffs a warrant for the sum of $1,000 against the police relief and pension fund of said city. A demurrer to the original complaint was sustained, and upon the filing of an amended complaint a demurrer was again interposed, and sustained by the court. Plaintiffs declined to further amend, and judgment was accordingly rendered in favor of defendants. This appeal is taken from the order of the court sustaining defendants' demurrer to plaintiffs' amended complaint.

The recitals in the amended complaint disclose the following facts: John S. Mackey was appointed a regular police officer of the city of Oakland on the 20th day of August, 1883, and was retired and pensioned on October 3, 1903, in accordance with the provisions of section 3 of the act creating a police relief, health, life insurance and pension fund in the several counties of the state, approved March 4, 1889, and amended 1891 (Stats. 1891, p. 287), and further amended on March 2, 1897 (Stats. 1897, p. 52). This act, so far as the city of Oakland is concerned, was thereafter superseded by provisions governing the retirement and pensioning of police officers, contained in a charter adopted by the city of Oakland, and which became the organic law of said city on July 1, 1911. The general provisions of the police pension fund act of 1889, as enacted into the city charter of Oakland, are found in sections 93, 94, 95 and 96 of that instrument (Stats. 1911, p. 1608). From the date of his retirement as aforesaid, John S. Mackey drew a pension from said fund until the date of his death, which occurred on the 25th day of December, 1911, at which time, under the terms of the charter, the pension ceased. At the time of his death he left surviving him as members of his family, two children, plaintiffs herein, both of whom are over the age of majority; and as he left no surviving widow, plaintiffs claim that, in accordance with the provisions of section 96 of the charter of the city of Oakland, by reason of the death of their father, they are, as surviving children of said deceased and as members of his family, entitled to receive the sum of $1,000 out of the police relief and pension fund of the city of Oakland. The respondents resist this claim; and in support of their contention that the decision of the lower court should be sustained urge: (1)

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

That under the charter of the city of Oakland the family of service-pensioned police officers are not entitled to participate in the police pension fund after the death of such officers; (2) that, even conceding this right to them, the appellants are not children of the deceased police officer within the meaning of subdivision 2, section 96, of the charter of Oakland; and (3) that a proper construction of subdivision 2 of section 96 of said charter limits its provisions to children under 16 years of age.

The charter provisions governing the retirement and pensioning of police officers are found in sections 94 and 95 of that act.

Section 94 provides for the retirement of any aged or infirm or disabled member who has arrived at the age of 60 years upon a pension of half his salary, provided he has been an active member of the department for 20 years preceding his retirement, such pension to cease upon his death.

Section 95 provides a similar pension to any member of the department disabled by any bodily injury received in the performance of his duty, the said pension to cease at his death.

Subdivision 1 of section 96 makes provision for the relatives of deceased officers who may be killed in the performance of their duty, and provides as follows:

Paragraph A declares that, should the deceased officer be married, his widow shall, so long as she remains unmarried, be paid a monthly pension equal to one-half of the salary attached to his rank at the time of his death.

Paragraph B under said subdivision provides that, under certain contingencies, "the orphan child or children under the age of 16 years" shall receive a pension, and concludes with the words, "provided that no child shall receive any such pension after attaining the age of 16 years."

Paragraph C of this same subdivision makes provision for pensioning the parent or parents of said officer if they are dependent upon him solely for support, in the event that such pensioner leaves no orphan child or children.

The above paragraphs of subdivision 1 of section 96, it will be noticed, refer to the relief granted in cases where the officer has been killed while in the performance of his duty. Then follows subdivision 2 of section 96, under which appellants claim, and which reads as follows:

> "When a member of the department shall die from causes other than those specified in subdivision (1) of this section after ten years of service, then his widow, and if there be none, then his children, and if there be no widow or children, then his mother, if dependent upon him for support, shall be entitled to the sum of one thousand dollars."

To sustain their first contention that, under the charter of the city of Oakland, the family of service-pensioned officers are not entitled to participate in the police pension fund after the death of such officers, respondents have cited the case of Edwards v. Sweigert, 15 Cal. App. 503, 115 Pac. 256. In that case the construction of the police pension fund provisions of the city and county of San Francisco (chapter 10, art. 8, Stats. 1899, p. 332) was under consideration. By section 3 of that charter, provision is made for the retirement and pensioning of any member of the department disabled by reason of any bodily injury received in the performance of his duty; the pension "to be paid to him during his life and to cease at his death." Section 6 thereof provides for the pensioning of certain dependent relatives of any member who, after 10 years' service, shall die from natural causes, and concludes as follows:

> "But the provisions of this section shall not apply to any member of the department who shall have received any pension under the ten terms of this charter."

It will thus be seen that the San Francisco charter in express terms denied the right of a pension to the family of an officer who had received a pension during his life; and it is upon these provisions that the decision in the Edwards Case was based. It is true that the charter of the city of Oakland provides that service pensions shall cease at the death of the member, but nowhere is there a provision similar to the one contained in section 6 of the San Francisco charter, denying the family the right to a pension for the reason that the officer had received one during his life.

[1] Here the appellants are not claiming a continuation of the pension received by the officer during his lifetime, but are seeking the benefit provided for under an entirely different section, which makes no reference to the fact as to whether or not the deceased officer had been in his lifetime the recipient of a pension. The only theory upon which the claim of the respondents can be upheld is that the charter of the city of Oakland, in providing, under sections 94 and 95, for the pensions therein specified, has the effect of excluding the members of the family of such officer from the benefits provided for under subdivision 2 of section 96 of the act, and limits this benefit to relatives of such officers who have never received a pension. This position cannot be maintained. The only purpose of the use of the phrase "and to cease at his death" was undoubtedly to restrain some relative from claiming the monthly pension provided for in subdivision 1 of section 96, where the officer was killed in the performance of his duty. Edwards v. Sweigert, supra.

[2] Irrespective of this conclusion, however, we are of the opinion that appellants are not entitled to the relief demanded, for the reason that they are not children within the meaning of subdivision 2, section 96, of the charter of the city of Oakland. The meaning of the word "children" in its primary significance is generally understood to have reference to minor sons and daughters of a person, and in cases where the word has received a larger and more extended construction, it has been based upon the intention of the lawmaking power to so extend it. In such cases the construction of the term depends upon the context and surrounding circumstances. Of course the word when used as expressive of relationship includes sons and daughters of whatever age, but when used in reference to age is confined to minors. There are, however, numerous cases where the exact meaning of the word has been questioned, and it has required judicial interpretation to determine in what sense it was used. This uncertainty has arisen in such actions as those prosecuted for the death of a person by wrongful act, under exemptions; statutes against the sale of liquor; poor laws; questions of heirship; adoption proceedings; citizenship; actions for injury to children; questions concerning descent; actions permitting a recovery in cases of homicide; actions by infirm and indigent children; and numerous other actions.

Courts of various jurisdictions are not in entire harmony in the construction to be given to the term when used in the particular character of cases above enumerated. Volume 2, Words and Phrases, p. 1115, etc. To arrive at the legislative intent the original purpose and object of the legislation must be considered. The term as contained in the act under consideration, in our opinion, was not intended to be used in the larger sense of sons and daughters, for it was certainly not contemplated by the framers of the charter that provision should be made for grown sons and daughters. Unmistakably the purpose of the whole act was to make provision for aged and infirm officers and certain necessitous relatives and minor children.

To permit adult children to enjoy or participate in a limited fund such as this is inconsistent with the general idea and purposes of its creation. Legislation of this character is designed to protect minors and necessitous dependents, rather than to create a system of benefactions for the advantage of relatives, and such design is indicated by the different provisions of the act, to which we must look for the legislative intent. Sections 94 and 95 of the act make provision for aged, infirm, and disabled members by providing for a pension. Section 96, subdivision 1, provides for relief for the family of an officer killed in the performance of his duty, and, as before stated, is as follows: (a) Should the decedent be married, his widow shall, as long as she remains single, be paid a pension equal to one-half of his salary. (b) Where decedent leaves no widow, but leaves an orphan child or children under the age of 16 years, and the widow dies without marrying while such child or children are under the age of 16 years, such child or children collectively shall receive a pension equal to one-half the salary attached to the decedent's position, provided that no child shall receive any such pension after attaining the age of 16 years. (c) Where there is no widow or orphan child or children but a parent or parents dependent solely upon decedent for support, they are entitled to a pension during such time as the board shall determine its necessity. And then follows subdivision 2 of section 96, under which appellants claim, which provides that where a member dies from causes other than those specified in subdivision 1, section 96, then his widow, and if there be none, then his children, and if there be no children, then his mother, if dependent upon him for support, shall receive $1,000.

It will be noticed in paragraph B provision is made for an orphan child or children under 16 years where there is no widow, while in subdivision C, in making provision for dependent parents, and referring expressly to such child or children in the preceding subdivision, the proviso that they shall be under 16 years of age is omitted. Subdivision 2 of section 96, under which appellants claim, merely refers to this class of relatives as "children." Clearly the meaning that the framers of the charter had in mind was that only minor children under 16 years of age as indicated in the preceding paragraphs should receive the benefits of the act. This interpretation is the only one that is consistent with the purpose of the act.

The order is affirmed.

HOGAN LUMBER CO. v. CITY OF OAKLAND. (Civ. 1360.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 10, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 8, 1914.)

1. Property (§ 4*)—Personalty or Realty—Temporary Wharf.

Where a temporary wharf built on piles was constructed between the land and a quay wall in process of construction, solely to pass materials over to facilitate the construction of the wall, and intended to be removed as soon as the wall was constructed, the wharf was personalty and not real estate.

2. Fixtures (§ 5*)—What Constitutes Fixtures—Temporary Structure.

A temporary wharf constructed on piles by contractors, and used to facilitate the construction of a sea wall was not a fixture under the rule that whether a structure is a fixture depends on the nature or character of the act by which it is erected, and the purpose it was intended to serve.

3. Fixtures (§ 5*)—Materials Attached to Building—Contracts—Failure to Perform—Statutes—Construction.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1196, provides that whenever materials shall have been furnished for use in the construction or repair of any building or other improvement, such materials shall not be subject to attachment or legal process, to enforce any debt due from the purchaser, except a debt due for the purchase money, so long as in good faith the same were about to be applied to the construction, alteration, or repair of such building or improvement. Section 1200 declares that if a contractor abandons his contract before completion, then from the value of the work and materials already done and furnished, including materials then actually delivered or on the ground, which shall thereupon belong to the owner, estimated as near as may be by the standard of the whole contract price, shall be deducted the payments then due and actually paid, according to the contract, etc., and the remainder shall be deemed the portion of the contract price applicable to liens. Held, that such sections applied only to materials furnished and intended to become a part of the structure or improvement, but did not operate to transfer to the owner of the improvement materials of which a temporary wharf was constructed to facilitate the contractor's work in constructing a sea wall; it being the contractor's intent to remove the wharf when the wall was completed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; N. D. Arnot, Judge.

Action by the Hogan Lumber Company against the City of Oakland. From a judgment in favor of defendant and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Reversed.

Stetson & Koford, of San Francisco, for appellant. Ben F. Woolner and Chas. A. Beardsley, both of Oakland, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial in an action of claim and delivery.

Very briefly the facts are these: Hansbrough Brothers Company entered into a contract with the city of Oakland to build a quay wall along a certain portion of the Oakland water front. For use in the construction of the quay wall, this company, with materials furnished by it, built a temporary wharf or platform on the land side of said wall, which was used to pass materials over, and to facilitate the work of construction. When the work was partially completed, the Hansbrough Bros. Company became insolvent and abandoned the work, and were adjudged bankrupt by the United States District Court. Upon abandonment, the city of Oakland took possession of the work, including the wharf, runway, or platform, as it was variously called, advertised for bids, and ultimately let a contract for the completion of the work to the Healy-Tibbetts Construction Company. The trustees in bankruptcy, under regular proceedings, sold to the plaintiff herein a quantity of lumber on the premises, including the lumber in the wharf or runway. Upon demand defendant refused to give up possession of the part of the lumber in controversy, whereupon this proceeding was commenced.

[1, 2] It is not claimed that the material of the wharf was to become a part of the quay wall; but defendant does claim that by reason of the manner of the construction of the wharf, it became real property, and that therefore an action in claim and delivery will not lie. It also claims that, under the terms of section 1200 (since repealed) and section 1196 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the materials, having been erected "on the ground," became the property of the defendant. Neither of these contentions commends itself to us with much force. As to the first contention, it is true that the wharf or substructure was built on piles driven into the ground; but it was plainly the intention of the parties, and conceded to be the fact, that it was of a temporary nature, and that, when the quay was finished, the wharf was to be cleared away, and the materials constituting the wharf were to be taken possession of by whoever at that time might be the owner thereof. Under these circumstances, the authorities support the conclusion that the materials are to be regarded as personal property. Whether a structure is a fixture or not depends upon the nature or character of the act by which it is erected and the purpose for which it was intended to be used. Hopewell Mill v. Taunton Savings Bank, 150 Mass. 519, 23 N. E. 327, 6 L. R. A. 249, 15 Am. St. Rep. 235; Binkley v. Forkner, 117 Ind. 176, 19 N. E. 753, 3 L. R. A. 33; 19 Cyc. 1045–1048; Lavenson v. Standard Soap Co., 80 Cal. 245, 250, 22 Pac. 184, 13 Am. St. Rep. 147; Jordan v. Myres, 126 Cal. 565, 569, 58 Pac. 1061; Stimson v. Los Angeles Traction Co., 141 Cal. 30, 74 Pac. 357.

[3] As to the other point, little need be said. Sections 1196 and 1200, Code of Civil Procedure, apply, and make the materials furnished the property of the owner of the structure when they are to become part of the structure, but where, as here, they are not to be used in and incorporated into the structure to be built, they cannot be said to belong to the owner. Steiger, etc., Pottery Works v. Sonoma, 9 Cal. App. 698, 100 Pac. 714; California P. C. Co. v. Wentworth Co., 16 Cal. App. 692–701, 118 Pac. 103, 113; Hamilton v. Delhi Mining Co., 118 Cal. 148, 50 Pac. 378.

Under the circumstances of this case the defendant, it would seem, has no more right to these materials constituting the temporary wharf than it would have to the tools or machinery of the contractor and mechanics. The circumstance that the wharf was to be wrecked and the materials taken away by the original contractor or his assignee shows, not only that they were not a fixture, but also that no property right therein passed to the defendant. The original contract was not incorporated in the record, and there is no circumstance in the case that will warrant the conclusion that there was any implied understanding between the contractor who erected the wharf and the defendant that the wharf was to remain on the premises any longer than its use was required by such contractor. Nor is there any ground in the record for the argument that the contractor abandoned the materials contained in the wharf and left them on the premises under such circumstances that he or his assignee would be estopped to claim them before the quay wall was finished.

EINERTSEN v. UNITED RAILROADS OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 1381.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1010*)—Review—Findings by Court—Rate of Speed.

Where plaintiff, injured while standing on the step of a street car in collision with a truck extending from the curb into the street, testified that the car was moving at a "terrible speed," while another witness estimated the speed at eight or nine miles an hour, a finding that at the time of the collision the car was being operated at a speed which was unsafe and dangerous to plaintiff, was not erroneous as a matter of law.

In an action for injuries to a street car passenger by being struck by a truck extending from the curb into the street, evidence held to sustain the trial court's finding that the car, as it passed the truck, was moving at a dangerous speed, that the carrier was negligent in permitting the steps of the car to become crowded, so that plaintiff when he boarded the car had to stand on the step, and that he was not therefore guilty of contributory negligence in assuming such position.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Action by Ernest Einertsen against the United Railroads of San Francisco. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Wm. M. Abbott and Wm. M. Cannon, both of San Francisco (Kingsley W. Cannon, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. McNair & Stoker, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff, and this appeal is from a judgment rendered in his favor and from an order denying a new trial.

The injuries were sustained by plaintiff while a passenger on one of the cars of the defendant company. The complaint recites: That, on the 21st day of October, 1907, plaintiff boarded a car at a point on Mission street, near the foot thereof, in the city and county of San Francisco, said car being operated by defendant for the convenience of passengers; that plaintiff tendered and the conductor of said car accepted and received his fare; that at the time plaintiff was standing at the bottom step of the rear platform on the northerly side of the car, which was west-bound, the steps and platform of which were crowded with passengers to such an extent that plaintiff was unable to enter the interior of the car, although he attempted so to do; that there was sufficient space in the interior of the car for all of the passengers thereon; and that, at the time of receiving his injuries, plaintiff was making an effort to gain an entrance therein from the outside step upon which he was standing; that, while still standing upon said step, and while attempting to gain an entrance to the interior of the car, plaintiff observed a truck or van backed up against the curbing of Mission street, with the front end thereof projecting out into said street, toward the track upon and over which the car was passing, and the plaintiff, realizing that he would be struck with the projecting end of said truck or van if the employés in charge of said car should attempt to pass thereby without stopping, the said car being operated at such a rapid rate the plaintiff could not with safety to himself alight therefrom, called upon the conductor in charge to stop the car, but the conductor did not heed his request; that, by reason of the car going at such a rapid rate of speed, which was not slackened in passing the projection, plaintiff was caught between the rear end of said car and the projecting front of said truck, and received the injuries which formed the basis of this action. Plaintiff further alleged the negligent operation of the car at the rapid rate of speed, and the negligence of the defendant in permitting the rear steps and platform of the car to remain crowded and congested with passengers when there was sufficient space within the interior thereof. The injuries received by plaintiff were alleged to be permanent, and to consist of a displacement and contusion of the liver, stomach, kidneys, and other abdominal organs, and the bending and dislocation of the ribs, the bruising of his body in various places, and a violent shock to his nervous system. A jury trial was waived, and the court rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for the sum of $1,000, and his costs.

[1, 2] It is the claim of defendant that the judgment and order appealed from should be reversed for the reason that the evidence is insufficient to support the decision, and he argues: (1) That the evidence is insufficient to show that the defendant operated his car at a dangerous rate of speed; (2) that the evidence is insufficient to show actionable negligence in permitting the steps of the car to become crowded and congested; (3) that the evidence affirmatively and indisputably shows that the plaintiff was himself guilty of negligence, proximately contributing to the injuries. The evidence relating to the circumstances under which the injuries were received is practically free from conflict upon the question of the speed of the car. The court found that defendant operated the car by and past the wagon at a rate of speed unsafe and dangerous to plaintiff in the position he occupied, and the defendant knew of the danger to which passengers were submitted by reason of the car being thus operated by and past said wagon. The question as to whether or not the rate of speed was unsafe and dangerous was one, considering all the surrounding circumstances, for the trial court to determine. Plaintiff testified that the car was moving at a "terrible speed"; another witness, a police officer, estimated the speed at eight or nine miles an hour. The reasonableness of the rate of speed at which a car is run is to be measured by the surrounding circumstances. A rate of speed may be dangerous or excessive under one set of circumstances, where it would not be so under others. We cannot say, as a matter of law, that a finding as to the rate of speed under a given set of circumstances is not warranted by the evidence, this being a fact for the trial court to determine from all the evidence presented. The close proximity of the wagon to the track was a very material circumstance to be considered in determining whether or not the rate of speed was excessive. From all the evidence produced at the trial, we feel convinced that the court was amply warranted in finding that the car was operated at an unsafe and dangerous speed, considering that the truck occupied a position so near to the car as to be dangerous to occupants of certain parts of the car.

The further contentions of appellant, that the evidence is insufficient to show actionable negligence in permitting the steps of the car to become crowded, and that the evidence indisputably shows that the plaintiff was himself guilty of negligence proximately contributing to his injuries, are so intimately connected that we will discuss them together.

Upon these questions the court found that there was sufficient space in the interior of the car for all passengers then upon it, and that the defendant negligently permitted the platform and steps of the car where plaintiff was standing to remain in a congested condition, so that plaintiff could not obtain access to the interior of the car and thereby escape being injured, and that the injuries sustained by plaintiff were not directly or proximately caused by his own negligence or by any want of care on his part, but were the result of carelessness and neglect of the servants and employés of the defendant. Testimony of plaintiff shows that at the time he boarded the car there were passengers occupying the platform and steps, and that this crowded condition of that portion of the car prevented him from reaching its interior, although he endeavored to do so. Defendant sought to disprove this testimony by showing that another passenger boarded the car at another point on Mission street, further west than did plaintiff, and that he proceeded up the steps of the car, and past the passengers standing thereon, and took a position at the rear of the platform, and defendant argues that if this witness could thus pass to a place of safety, plaintiff could have done likewise, and, not having done so, he was guilty of negligence to ride thus situated, and did so at his own risk. The plaintiff in his testimony showed a lack of certainty as to the intersecting street at which he boarded the car, but his testimony is positive to the point, and is uncontradicted, that no one got on or off the car from the time he boarded it, and that the car did not stop from that time until the accident occurred.

At the rate of speed the car was traveling, it was a very short time after plaintiff boarded the car till the occurrence of the accident. Plaintiff testified that the car had only traveled two short blocks from his boarding point to where the accident occurred, and that, during this time, he had paid his fare and was seeking to gain access to the interior of the car. He certainly could not know until he boarded the car that he would be prevented from gaining access to its interior, which the testimony shows was not crowded. Under these circumstances it cannot be said that his presence upon the step of the car, crowded though it was, constituted negligence. That plaintiff was exercising due care is shown by his undisputed testimony that, when within quite a distance of the wagon, realizing his danger, he called upon the conductor to stop the car, and at the same time endeavored, although unsuccessfully, to reach a place of safety.

The question as to whether or not the plaintiff exercised care to avoid the injuries was a question of fact for the trial court to determine. Seller v. Market St. Ry. Co., 139

Cal. 269, 72 Pac. 1006; Hoff v. Los Angeles Pacific Ry., 158 Cal. 596, 112 Pac. 53; Holloway v. Pasadena Ry. Co., 130 Cal. 177, 62 Pac. 478; Kimic v. San Jose & Los Gatos Ry., 156 Cal. 379, 386, 104 Pac. 986. The same may be said as to the question of whether or not defendant was negligent in permitting the steps of the car to be crowded and congested. Both of these questions were determined adversely to the defendant by the trial court, upon evidence sufficient to sustain the findings; therefore the findings must be upheld.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order are affirmed.

SPENCER v. BARNES. (Civ. 1560.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 16, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court, Sept. 11, 1914.)

1. Partnership (§ 5*)—Creation—Single Venture.

Where plaintiff and defendant contracted to co-operate in obtaining options on certain mining property and selling the property at a profit, which they agreed to divide, their agreement was none the less a partnership because it was limited to a single venture.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. §§ 15, 16; Dec. Dig. § 5.*]

2. Partnership (§ 330*)—Accounting—Decree—Dissolution.

Where a partnership was organized for the purchase and sale of particular mining properties, and its purpose had been fully accomplished prior to suit between the partners for an accounting, the decree need not adjudge a dissolution, under the rule that equity will not decree an accounting between partners without also adjudging dissolution of the firm.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Partnership, Cent. Dig. § 787; Dec. Dig. § 330.*]

3. Partnership (§ 317*)—Purpose—Illegal Profits—Accounting.

Where plaintiff and defendant formed a partnership to sell a group of mining claims, agreeing to share equally in the profits, and defendant, to facilitate the sale, entered the employ of the purchaser in order to induce a belief that he was obtaining the properties for the purchaser at the lowest possible price, and in this connection made a secret and illegitimate profit in transferring certain of the properties, defendant could not escape liability to account for one-half of such profits to complainant on the ground that they had been illegally obtained; the partnership having been created for a lawful purpose and complainant having been entirely innocent of misconduct.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by A. B. Spencer against Legene S. Barnes. From a judgment for plaintiff and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Oscar Lawler, of Los Angeles (James E. Degnan, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Lewis R. Works and Andrew M. Strong, both of Los Angeles, and Francis Marion Etheridge, of Dallas, Texas, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This action grew out of an alleged agreement between plaintiff and defendant whereby, as copartners, they consummated a sale of certain iron mining properties, defendant receiving and appropriating to his own use the commission or profits derived from the making of such sale. The suit is to recover a specified sum and for an accounting. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which, and an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant prosecutes this appeal.

It appears that in June, 1907, plaintiff was a resident of Tucson, Ariz., where he was engaged in some mining venture. Defendant resided in Long Beach, Cal., where he was engaged in the real estate business. There existed a relationship of some intimacy between their respective wives, between whom there was an interchange of letters, in which there were mutual complaints of dull times. The wife of plaintiff wrote the wife of defendant to have her husband come to Tucson, where she felt sure defendant and plaintiff could find some properties to sell and make some money. Following this letter defendant went to Tucson, spending several days with plaintiff in looking over and inspecting certain mining properties (not involved in this action, but referred to in order to obtain a proper understanding of the situation), known as the Papago, Wilson, and Rumple properties. The prospect of a sale of these mines appears to have been the only subject of mutual interest during the first days of defendant's visit, neither at that time being cognizant of the iron properties, the commissions for the sale of which constitute the subject of this suit. While plaintiff and defendant were inspecting the Papago and other properties the latter took some photographic views thereof, and on their return to Tucson they went to the studio of a photographer, with whom plaintiff was acquainted, to have these views developed. On the occasion of this visit, and while discussing these photographic views, the photographer, W. B. Parker, stated that he was interested in some iron properties in Riverside county, Cal., and exhibited samples of ore therefrom, together with a blueprint of the properties, comprising some 70 claims, and mentioned the names of the owners thereof, with whom he and Walter W. Brown, who resided in Los Angeles, had been corresponding in an effort to get them together in order to make a sale thereof. Of these claims Parker owned 15, Walter W.

Brown owned 30, and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Company and Stevens, Dofflemyer and McGregor owned 25, which were patented. The profits derived from a sale of the Brown claims is the subject around which the controversy revolves. During the interview Barnes asked Parker if the properties were for sale, to which the latter replied in the affirmative, but stated they were not yet in shape to present to any one, owing to the fact that the parties had not all fixed a price upon their respective holdings, and, further, that some of the properties were held under an option to purchase which would expire about September 1st. Defendant then said to Parker:

> "If anything comes up on this and you get ready to do business on it, just speak to Mr. Spencer and it will be all right. He will let me know."

Plaintiff testified that after this interview with Parker, it was agreed that plaintiff was to do all he could in Tucson in getting papers and things ready and send them to defendant, who was, at his own expense, to do the negotiating with prospective buyers, and if a sale was effected the profits should be divided. Mrs. Spencer testified that the evening preceding his departure for Long Beach he, in a conversation with plaintiff, said:

> "I will leave everything at this end of the line for you to look after and I will bear the expense, and then what is left of the profit we will divide."

Defendant left Tucson about July 2d, returning to Long Beach, and plaintiff took up negotiations with Parker, transmitting to defendant by letter such information as he obtained. On August 28th defendant wired plaintiff to "get option and papers on Parker's property to me as soon as possible," which telegram was confirmed by letter of the same date, wherein defendant stated: "I believe that is a property that we can handle." On September 9th defendant wrote to plaintiff, saying:

> "I will take Parker's proposition up this afternoon with that man Brown, of Los Angeles, as you suggest. * * * I have some people who have the money and will do business if we can only get it into shape so we can handle it. I believe I have received all your letters, and I appreciate your work in this. You have made the deal plain to me and I will go and see Brown this afternoon."

On October 8th defendant wrote a lengthy letter to plaintiff upon the subject of the proposed deal saying that he had seen Dofflemyer and stating:

> "I have his interest tied up, also Brown's Stevens', and in fact all of them except Parker and his people. * * * I have had to change the deal in regards to prices and terms, but I feel confident that we can make a sale now. I am selling a three-quarters interest in the twenty-five patented claims for $262,500, on which we will get a ten per cent. commission. * * * I am selling Brown's 30 claims for $100,000 net to him. * * * Brown signed the same kind of a paper as the one which I shall send you to have Mr. Parker and his people sign. * * * Now I am selling Parker's 15 claims for $65,000, but I want you to tell him that is $50,000 net to him; the $15,000 goes to you and I, and I would like you to draw up some kind of an agreement that Mr. Parker can sign, showing that if the sale is made the $15,000 is to be paid to us in the same manner as he gets his payments."

The letter also refers to the Rumple and Wilson property, defendant suggesting that plaintiff endeavor to get a 30-day extension of their option on the same, and in reference to the deal generally, states:

> "I have already spent over $300 on this deal and expect it will cost me about $500 more before it is closed, but it is worth the money if we get it closed."

There was an option contract for the purchase of Parker's claims at a price of $50,000, transmitted to plaintiff with the request that plaintiff obtain Parker's signature thereto. In this he failed for the reason, as stated by Parker, he would not sell for less than $65,000, which price he eventually received upon the deal being consummated; defendant having procured from him a contract for a sale at said sum. It is unnecessary to quote further from the correspondence.

[1] That the parties entered into a copartnership for the purpose of securing a contract with the owners and effecting a sale of the properties is not only shown by the answer, which admits that defendant and plaintiff entered into a verbal agreement to co-operate in selling the properties in question and agreed in the event of so doing to divide the profits, but is clearly shown by reference to the evidence. The fact that the subject of the agreement was a single venture only as alleged in the answer, was immaterial; it was none the less a copartnership for such venture.

The court found the allegations of the answer, to the effect that plaintiff abandoned the copartnership enterprise long prior to the consummation of the sale, to be untrue. The claim of appellant that this finding is unsupported by the evidence is chiefly based upon a letter written by plaintiff to defendant on August 19th, wherein he says:

> "Please return to me by express all the maps, reports, and etc., which I sent you, and we will go out of the mining business. If you care to do so, you can tell me what you wrote or wired south, for unless I know I am placed in a bad light with those people."

Plaintiff testifies that this letter referred solely and alone to what was known as the Papago property, the owners of which resided in the south; that he was manager of said property and represented the owners thereof; that defendant was to write to the owners of the property, giving references as to his standing and aid him in assembling the stock in escrow. The inference to be drawn from the testimony is that defendant in writing to the owners of the property had placed plaintiff in an embarrassing position with his employers. That it was intended to refer to this deal only is corroborated by the fact that at the date of the letter, August 19th, nothing whatsoever, other than what occurred in the first interview with Parker, as heretofore stated, had been done by the parties towards securing a sale of the iron properties. Not only this, but the correspondence hereinbefore referred to and the conduct of the parties after August 19th clearly tend to show that plaintiff and defendant were jointly engaged in an effort to secure contracts, options or escrows which would enable them to negotiate a sale of the iron properties, either for a commission or at a price in excess of that fixed by the owners thereof, which, in case of the consummation of a sale, would afford them a profit, and that defendant understood the letter had reference solely and alone to the Papago property, of which plaintiff was manager, and the maps, reports, etc., of which, mentioned therein, had been placed in possession of defendant.

The answer alleged that the sole consideration for the contract of copartnership made with plaintiff was an agreement on the part of the latter to secure from the owners of the properties options thereon which defendant could use in negotiating sales of the property, and further alleged a failure on the part of plaintiff to secure such or any options for the sale of the properties. The record discloses a conflict of evidence touching this issue. Hence the finding of the court that it was not agreed that plaintiff was to secure the options, as alleged, is conclusive upon this appeal. Anglo-California Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 384, 81 Pac. 1077.

The court found that it was agreed between the parties that all expense incurred by defendant in the consummation of a sale of the property should be paid by defendant, and further found that all moneys expended by him in negotiating said sale were provided and advanced by R. H. Sayers and S. H. Roberts, who were reimbursed for such advances by the vendors of the property out of the proceeds of the sale thereof. These findings are attacked for want of evidence to support them. The contention is without merit. The finding to the effect that defendant was to advance all expenses is clearly supported by the testimony given by plaintiff. While there is some evidence tending to show that defendant incurred expense in negotiating the sale, the record is silent as to what sum or sums he paid out, other than the $300. Moreover, it appears, with little if any conflict of evidence, that Sayers and Roberts advanced the money to finance the making of the sale, each receiving from the proceeds of the sale of the Black Diamond group of mines, owned by Walter W. Brown, the sum of $50,000 as compensation for such advances.

[2] Appellant insists the judgment must be reversed for the reason that there was no prayer in the complaint for a dissolution of the copartnership, and no decree rendered dissolving the same. The general rule is, as contended by appellant, that where one partner as against another seeks an accounting of profits against his copartner, a court of equity will not decree an accounting without also adjudging a dissolution of the copartnership. Clark v. Hewitt, 136 Cal. 77, 68 Pac. 303. In our opinion, the case at bar presents an exception to this general rule. By the terms of the agreement, as alleged in the complaint and admitted by the answer, the parties entered into a partnership having for its sole purpose the sale of certain property described in the complaint. It appears from the pleadings that the sale was fully consummated prior to the institution of this action. Upon the making of the sale the purpose contemplated by the agreement was fully accomplished, save and except the payment to plaintiff of his share of the profits. The finding of the court to the effect that the partnership had never been abandoned was in response to an allegation of the answer which alleged an abandonment prior to the consummation of the sale. In our opinion, the pleadings must be construed as showing the copartnership had terminated, and hence there was no occasion for a decree of dissolution. No objection was made by defendant to the complaint upon the ground that it did not ask for a dissolution, nor was any exception taken to the judgment as rendered upon such ground. The complaint did pray "for such other relief as to this court may seem just and proper." Under the facts presented, we think the court was justified in assuming that the copartnership was terminated, and therefore it was unnecessary to decree a dissolution. See Pettingill v. Jones, 28 Kan. 749; Meason v. Kaine, 63 Pa. 335; Myers v. Winn, 16 Ill. 135.

The court further found that in pursuance of the agreement of copartnership defendant, with the assistance of plaintiff, secured options on the properties in his own name for the joint benefit of plaintiff and himself, and on August 10, 1909, consummated a sale thereof to a corporation known as the Iron Chief Mining Company; that included in the properties sold to said Iron Chief Mining Company were 30 claims, known as the Black Diamond group, a five-sixths interest in which was owned by Walter W. Brown, whose interest was sold by defendant to said Iron Chief Mining Company for the sum of $337,500; that the other sixth interest in said Black Diamond group was owned by defendant, he having acquired it from Brown as a commission for promoting the sale of Brown's interest in said property, and that the value of defendant's one-sixth interest so acquired from Brown in the Black Diamond group as a commission was the sum of $17,500. The court further found that, in addition to this sum of $17,500 so received by defendant for the one-sixth interest in the Black Diamond group, he received from Walter W. Brown out of the $337,500, proceeds so received by Brown from the sale of his interest in the Black Diamond group of mines, a secret commission and profit in the sum of $121,250.

[3] As to this secret profit of $121,250, appellant pleads his own fraud and iniquity as a defense to the participation therein by plaintiff. A statement of the manner in which it was obtained is, briefly, as follows: Defendant had been for some time negotiating a sale of the properties to Edward H. Harriman. On May 17, 1909, these negotiations culminated in a contract made with Harriman which, after reciting that defendant and his assigns were the owners of certain interests in iron properties which Harriman was desirous of buying, provided that defendant was to make conveyances and assignments of options covering such interest held by him personally, which should be placed in escrow, and enter the employ of Harriman or his assigns, and as such employé make every reasonable effort to purchase for his employer the remaining properties and interest therein at the lowest possible figure and co-operate in every way with Harriman to attain the end designated, the intention of the agreement, as stated, being "that the party of the first part [Barnes] shall proceed to acquire for the party of the second part [Harriman], or his assigns, at the lowest possible cost, the properties and rights hereinbefore mentioned and described," for which interest and service Barnes was to receive the sum of $100,000 and a salary of $1,000 per month, the employment to be terminated at any time at the option of Harriman. Thereafter a corporation, designated the Iron Chief Mining Company, was created, and defendant became a director and manager thereof, which position he held during the period covered by the purchase of the properties, and particularly that known as the Black Diamond property owned by Brown. Under the contract made with Harriman, and as a director and manager of Harriman's assignee, the Iron Chief Mining Company, defendant had charge of the negotiations for the purchase of the properties, and particularly the Brown property which, for and on behalf of the Iron Chief Mining Company, he purchased from Brown, agreeing to pay him therefor the sum of $337,500. This sum was paid to Brown by draft issued by the Iron Chief Mining Company, and, in accordance with an agreement made between Brown and Barnes, was distributed as follows, to wit: To R. H. Sayers, $50,000; to S. Horace Roberts, $50,000; to W. L. Holland, $121,250; Brown retaining the sum of $116,250 for his interest in the Black Diamond property. Holland testified that he was an employé of defendant, that he had no interest in the properties; and that whatever he did in the matter was as an employé of Mr. Barnes, as well as the other parties, by mutual agreement. The entire sum of $121,250 was by Holland transferred to defendant. The contention of appellant is that this large sum of money was obtained by means of his unconscionable act in violating the trust imposed in him by Harriman and the Iron Chief Mining Company, of which he was a director and manager, and that hence, owing to it having been obtained illegally, plaintiff is not entitled to share therein.

Appellant cites a number of cases to the effect that by virtue of his relation to the Iron Chief Mining Company he occupied a fiduciary position, and as such trustee he could not lawfully make any profit for himself out of the transaction between Brown and the Iron Chief Mining Company, unless such fact was known and approved by the latter. This proposition is too well recognized to require citation of authorities. The principle, however, is not applicable to the facts in the case at bar. The Iron Chief Mining Company is not, so far as shown, suing Barnes to recover the money which he received from Brown; indeed, so far as disclosed by the record, it may have approved his act. There was nothing illegal or immoral in the business for the conduct of which the partnership was established. No taint attaches to the contract made by plaintiff, and no act of his can be the subject of condemnation. He is innocent of participation in the design by means of the consummation of which the profits were gained. Hence the proposition presented is whether or not an innocent member of a copartnership created for conducting a lawful business is entitled to share in a profit which his copartner has realized by misconduct in carrying on the business. While courts will not lend their aid to one who founds his cause upon a contract having for its purpose the doing of an illegal act, nevertheless, "when the plaintiff is blameless, and the contract on which he stands is legal and moral, no court has ever permitted a defendant to escape responsibility because of his own misconduct." Pennington v. Todd, 47 N. J. Eq. 569, 21 Atl. 297, 11 L. R. A. 589, 24 Am. St. Rep. 419. In the case of Jones v. Davidson, 2 Sneed (Tenn.) 448, the partnership contemplated the business of collecting claims against the federal government. The defendant in the action in the collection of one of the claims procured the making of a false affidavit, by reason of which fact the transaction was held to be illegal. It appeared, however, that the plaintiff who brought the suit for a share of the profits of the transaction in no wise participated in the illegal manner whereby the claim was collected. The court, in holding that he was entitled to participation in the profits arising from this illegal transaction, said:

> "But the plaintiff was no party to this illegal contract, so far as anything appears, and therefore could not be affected by it. In this view, we cannot permit the defendant to allege his own inequity to the prejudice of an innocent person."

As stated in the Pennington Case, the refusal of the court to aid plaintiff in compelling defendant to disgorge the ill-gotten gains would furnish an incentive to such frauds as he had perpetrated, "for if a partner, by showing that he has cheated the customers of the partnership in all his dealings with them, can retain all the profits, instead of only half, his temptations to iniquity are doubled." The authorities cited, together with Van Tine v. Hilands (C. C.) 131 Fed. 124, and Thwaites v. Coulthwaite, Law Repts. (1896), 1 Ch. Div. 496, leave no question in our minds as to the right of plaintiff to participate in the ill-gotten profits of the transaction to the same extent that defendant is benefited thereby.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. STRICKLER. (Cr. 226.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 30, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 28, 1914.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 134*) — LOCAL OPTION LAW — CONSTRUCTION — "EJUSDEM GENERIS."

Under the Wyllie Local Option Law (St. 1911, p. 599), which forbids the sale of intoxicating liquor in dry territory, and provides in section 21 that the term "alcoholic liquors" shall include spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors and any other liquor which shall contain 1 per cent. or more of alcohol, the sale of malt beverages which do not contain 1 per cent. of alcohol is not prohibited, the specification of malt liquors, under the rule of ejusdem generis, which requires general and specific words capable of an analogous meaning and associated together to be construed together, being obviously intended to include only those containing more than one per cent. of alcohol (citing Words and Phrases, vol. 3, p. 2328. See, also, volume 8, p. 7647; volume 4, pp. 3736–3746; volume 8, p. 7692).

2. STATUTES (§ 194*)—CONSTRUCTION.

Statutes should be construed so as to give effect to the legislative intent, and the rule of ejusdem generis cannot be used to overthrow such intent.

Appeal from Superior Court, Colusa County; H. M. Albery, Judge.

H. L. Strickler was charged with a violation of the Local Option Law, and from a judgment entered on sustaining a demurrer to the information the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People. Ben Berry, of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, J. The information in this case, purporting to accuse the defendant of a violation of the so-called Wyllie Local Option Law (St. 1911, p. 599), reads as follows:

> "The said H. L. Strickler on the 7th day of March 1913 at and in the county of Colusa, state of California, and prior to the filing of this information did willfully and unlawfully keep and conduct in the town of Arbuckle and within the boundaries of First supervisor district of said Colusa county, state of California, a certain place where alcoholic liquors were by him then and there sold, served and distributed within the boundaries of said district; that said First supervisor district was then and there no-license territory; that said place was not then and there the home of said defendant; that said alcoholic liquors were not and none of them was then and there manufactured by defendant or by any other person on the said premises and place; that said alcoholic liquors were not then and there sold, served or distributed to or by a registered pharmacist, nor for medicinal purposes only upon a prescription by a duly licensed physician, nor for sacramental purposes; that said alcoholic liquors were then and there malt liquor containing less than 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, to wit, ninety-five hundredths of 1 per cent. per volume of alcohol."

The defendant demurred to said information on the ground that the same does not state a public offense under the law referred to. The court sustained the demurrer and dismissed the information, and this appeal is by the people from the judgment thereupon entered.

Section 13 of the local option law declares it to be unlawful "for any person, corporation, firm, company, association, or club, as principal, agent, employé or otherwise, within the boundaries of any no-license territory to sell, furnish, distribute or give away any alcoholic liquors except as provided in section 16 hereof."

Although not material to this inquiry, it may be stated that the exceptions provided in section 16 include the permission to serve intoxicating liquors in one's home to the members of his family or to his guests as an act of hospitality; the sale of such liquors by pharmacists for medicinal purposes; the use of wine in religious services, and the sale thereof by pharmacists for such use; the storage of such liquors, provided they are not distributed in no-license territory, and the keeping of such liquors on premises where manufactured, and the shipping of the same into territories where the liquor traffic is permitted by law to exist.

[1, 2] Section 21 of said act provides that:

> "The term 'alcoholic liquors' as used in this act, shall include spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and any other liquor or mixture of liquors which contain 1 per cent. by volume, or more, of alcohol, and which is not so mixed with other drugs as to prevent its use as a beverage."

The contention of the defendant is that, inasmuch as the information declares that the malt liquors, with the alleged illicit keeping and selling of which he is charged, contained a less quantity of alcohol than that specified in section 21 of said act as applied to "any other liquor or mixture of liquors," etc., to wit, 1 per cent. by volume, or more, no offense under said law is stated against him. The argument is that the general language of section 21, to wit, "and any other liquor or mixture of liquors," etc., must be examined by the light of the maxim, noscitur a sociis, and that, as so viewed, it must be held that the provision as to the quantity of alcohol that must be present in such liquors to bring them within the interdictions of the statute, includes those liquors ejusdem generis, specially enumerated by the language immediately preceding it.

The position of the Attorney General is that the special language of said section is not qualified or in any degree controlled by the general language thereof, but that, by the specific enumeration in said section of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors, the Legislature intended such liquors to fall under its ban regardless of whether they do or do not in fact contain alcohol. In other words. it is the contention of the people that the intoxicating character of "spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors," as so enumerated in the statute, has been established by the Legislature itself, and that it is not for the jury to revise the judgment of the Legislature upon that matter and so determine whether such liquors are or are not in fact intoxicating. State v. Frederickson, 101 Me. 37, 63 Atl. 535, 6 L. R. A. (N. S.) 186, 115 Am. St. Rep. 295, 8 Ann. Cas. 48.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

In the case of People v. Mueller (No. 231) this court was called upon to consider the propositions above stated, and we there expressed the opinion that, while in charging the offense of selling or keeping for sale spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors, it was not necessary to allege that such liquors contained the amount of alcohol specified in section 21, a conviction could not be sustained under such an indictment unless such liquors were shown to be intoxicating. This conclusion was reached mainly from the proposition, declared in the opinion in said case, that the terms "spirituous," "vinous," and "malt," as generically designating certain kinds of liquors, must have been used by the Legislature in their popular sense—that is to say, that they were used to describe, generically, those alcoholic liquors commonly known as "spirituous," "vinous," and "malt," and which, it is known, will produce intoxication. The Mueller Case was, after judgment here, ordered transferred to the Supreme Court for hearing, and it is now pending in that court. Therefore, whether the intoxicating character of spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors must be alleged in an indictment or information, where the charge is of selling or keeping them for sale and the accusatory pleading. following the language of the statute, designates them by their generic names, is a question which will doubtless be definitively determined by the Supreme Court in the case referred to (143 Pac. 750), and which, therefore, need not be considered here.

We are still of the opinion, however, that the Legislature did not intend to make it unlawful for one to engage in the business of selling nonintoxicating liquors. In other words, it is not reasonable to suppose that it was the legislative intent to contraband the traffic in spirituous, vinous, or malt liquors possessing no intoxicating quality. To the contrary, it seems very clear, when we consider the ultimate object of the local option law, that the Legislature thus aimed the shafts of its denunciation solely against any liquors the use of which would produce intoxication, and that, by specifying the quantity of alcohol which, when used in liquors, would bring them within the condemnation of the statute, it intended to and did establish a test applicable to all liquors the sale of which was designed by the statute to be prohibited in any territory to which the law might appropriately be made applicable. This conclusion is arrived at by a view of section 21 of the act by the light of the rule of construction, ejusdem generis, above referred to. In its practical application, this rule simply means that:

> "General and specific words which are capable of an analogous meaning, being associated together, take color from each other, so that the general words are restricted to a sense analogous to the less general." 3 Words and Phrases Judicially Defined, p. 2328.

Or, as this maxim was stated by Lord Tenterden (21 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, p. 1012):

> "Where a statute or other document enumerates several classes of persons or things, and immediately following and classed with such enumeration the clause embraces 'other' persons or things, the word 'other' will generally be read as 'other such like,' so that persons or things therein comprised may be read as ejusdem generis with, and not of a quality superior to or different from, those specifically enumerated."

This rule of construction is by no means of universal application, and its use is to carry out, not to defeat, the legislative intent. It must yield to another salutary rule of construction, viz., that every part of a statute should, if possible, be upheld and given its appropriate force. Misch v. Russell, 136 Ill. 22, 26 N. E. 528, 12 L. R. A. 125. But, in this case, since it is plainly manifest, as stated, that the purpose of the local option law is to suppress drunkenness and consequently the traffic in intoxicating liquors in those subdivisions where its operation is properly and legally invoked, the rule of ejusdem generis may be applied to the construction of section 21 without doing violence to or rendering inoperative any part of said section or of the law. Indeed, a construction of section 21 by the light of that doctrine will manifestly lead to the upholding of all the provisions of the law agreeably to the evident legislative design at the bottom of its enactment.

Thus, in a written opinion, the learned trial judge viewed the proposition submitted here and so concluded that the information, by reason of its declaration that the liquor therein charged to have been kept for sale by the defendant contained less than the quantity of alcohol specified in section 21, failed to state an offense under the statute. Said opinion is appended to the brief of the defendant. We approve the opinion, both for its reasoning and its conclusion, and we, therefore, adopt the following part thereof as a part of this opinion:

> "A great many cases from other jurisdictions are cited in support of the contention that the words 'spirituous, vinous, and malt liquors' have a fixed, definite meaning and are conclusive of the fact that such liquors contain alcohol, and hence are alcoholic and intoxicating within the contemplation of the statute.
> "I find some conflict in the authorities upon this question. For example, the courts are in conflict as to whether beer is per se a malt or intoxicating liquor.
> "It seems to be an open question in many jurisdictions as to whether courts will take judicial notice that pure alcohol is an intoxicating liquor within the meaning of the laws regulating and prohibiting sales of various classes of liquor. The weight of authority, however, seems to be that beer is malt and an intoxicating liquor. The cases cited by the district attorney seem to be fairly distinguishable from the case before us. Whether such cases may be considered as in point will depend somewhat upon the statutory provisions under consideration. Had the statute stopped with the words 'spirituous, vinous and malt liquors' without any general or qualifying words added thereto, then the authorities referred to would clearly be in point, and the sale of such liquors would be prohibited regardless of the alcoholic content of the liquor. But the following words just quoted, separated by only a comma, and this separation may be dispensed with, are the words 'and any other liquor, which contains one per cent. by volume, or more, of alcohol.' Shall these concluding words be treated as an wholly independent clause of the statute, having no reference to the immediately preceding language of the same section, or shall they, as general words, be considered as relating back to and, in a sense, limiting and qualifying the particular words preceding them?

"These provisions and all other provisions of the statute must be taken together and be considered as a whole in order to arrive at the true intent and meaning of the law and lawmakers. This is a fundamental rule of statutory construction.

"Grammatical construction and punctuation may be ignored, and even clauses of the statute may be transposed and rearranged, in order to ascertain and give effect to the true intent and meaning of statutory enactments.

"The act is a local option law; its operation and enforcement are made to depend upon the vote of the people in a given territory. The first clause of the title of the act is, 'An act to provide for the regulation of the traffic in alcoholic liquors by establishing local option.' The proposition petitioned for and to be submitted to the electors is, 'Shall the sale of alcoholic liquors in this (supervisorial) district be licensed?' If a majority vote on this proposition be in the negative, it is then made the duty of the board of supervisors to declare that the given territory is 'no-license territory,' and thereafter it shall be unlawful for any person in such territory (with certain exceptions, not material here) to sell alcoholic liquors. After all these (and other) provisions, is section 21 of the act, as above quoted, which defines the term 'alcoholic liquors,' and provides they shall include spirituous, vinous and malt liquors and any other liquor containing one per cent., or more, of alcohol.

"From all these provisions, and from the means provided for making them effective, it seems clear that the act was intended to close saloons and to prevent drunkenness. While one purpose of the act, as disclosed in its title, is to regulate the traffic in alcoholic liquors, its main and chief purpose is to close saloons and prevent drunkenness. Alcohol is the intoxicating element or ingredient in spirituous liquor.

"If not intended to close saloons and to prevent drunkenness why submit the proposition to the electors of local territory under the proposition of license or no license? What the petitioners for the election desired, and what the electors, in fair contemplation of the act, believed they were voting upon, was 'Shall the sale of intoxicating (alcoholic) liquors which contain more than one per cent. of alcohol be licensed?'

"It is not believed that the law, or lawmakers or electors, intended to permit the sale of one kind of liquor which contained less than 1 per cent. alcohol and to prohibit the sale of another and equally harmless liquor (malt) which contained no greater quantity of alcohol.

"No reason can be found why such discrimination should be made as between two equally harmless liquors, that is to say, harmless as to alcoholic content. To so hold would be to make the provisions of the statute inconsistent and inharmonious.

"Under the principles and authorities above stated a statute should receive such consideration, if possible, without doing violence to its terms, as will render its provisions consistent and in harmony with each other, and at the same time to give effect to the real purpose and intent of the enactment.

"This is a criminal prosecution, and it is believed the law should receive a liberal construction, according to its true import and purpose and within the spirit of its provisions, rather than a strict technical construction. The spirit and not the letter of the law should control in such cases."

For the reasons herein stated, the judgment is affirmed.

SHAW, J. This is an application for a writ of review to annul an order of the court below adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt for the disobedience of its judgment.

Petitioner is city clerk of the city of Maricopa. On March 23, 1914, certain proceedings were instituted in the superior court, in and for the county of Kern, the purpose of which was to secure a writ of mandate directed to petitioner, as said city clerk, commanding him in his official capacity to place and print upon the official ballot to be used in the municipal election held in the city of Maricopa on April 13, 1914, the name of Frank Minium as a candidate for city trustee. Upon trial the court gave judgment in favor of the plaintiff in said action, and ordered that a peremptory writ as prayed for in the complaint be issued and served upon defendant, all of which was duly done. Defendant in said action, who is petitioner here, refused to comply with the order and appealed from the judgment so rendered, and executed an undertaking in the sum of $300, conditioned in accordance with the provisions of section 941 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Thereupon the Hon. Milton T. Farmer, judge of the superior court of Kern county, issued an order requiring petitioner herein to show cause why he should not be adjudged guilty of contempt for failing to obey the order of said superior court commanding him to place the name of said plaintiff upon said municipal ballot, in response to which defendant appeared and showed that he had duly perfected an appeal from said judgment so rendered by the court. Notwithstanding this fact, the court adjudged him guilty of contempt in refusing to obey the order.

[1, 2] The contention of petitioner is that his appeal duly had and taken deprived the court of jurisdiction to make the order adjudging him guilty of contempt. This appears to be the settled law of the state. The action was a special proceeding, from the judgment in which an appeal lies, as provided in section 939, Code of Civil Procedure; and section 949, Code of Civil Procedure, provides in such case, it not being a case specified in sections 942 to 945, both inclusive, that the giving of the undertaking specified in section 941, Code of Civil Procedure, stays proceedings in the court below upon the judgment. In the case of Stewart v. Superior Court, 100 Cal. 543, 35 Pac. 156, 563, where an injunction issued was in form mandatory, it was held that an appeal from the judgment, accompanied by a bond as provided by section 941, operated as a supersedeas to stay execution of the writ. In the case of Palache v. Hunt, 64 Cal. 473, 2 Pac. 245, a judgment was rendered against petitioner wherein a writ of mandate was issued and from which judgment he prosecuted an appeal, giving an undertaking in the sum of $300, and wherein the petitioner applied to the Supreme Court for a writ of mandate to be issued to the lower court compelling it to fix the amount of an additional undertaking. The court denied the writ upon the ground that the $300 undertaking, given in accordance with the provisions of section 941, was sufficient to stay the proceedings. The court says:

> "We are therefore of opinion that an appeal may be taken to this court from a judgment of a superior court, granting or denying an application for a writ of mandamus, and that an undertaking in the sum of three hundred dollars, executed and conditioned according to the provisions of section 941, Code of Civil Procedure, stays the execution of the judgment pending the appeal."

We think the court below exceeded its jurisdiction in adjudging petitioner guilty of contempt. It is therefore ordered that the order of the lower court, whereby petitioner was adjudged guilty of contempt and sentenced to pay a fine of $150, be and the same is hereby set aside and annulled.

(Civ. 1508.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. Oct. 7, 1914. Rehearing Denied Dec. 5, 1914.)

LANDLORD AND TENANT (§ 290*)—"UNLAWFUL DETAINER"—RIGHT TO MAINTAIN ACTION.

A tenant, who defaulted in payment of rent, had given a mortgage as security. Before resorting to the mortgage, the landlord instituted an action of unlawful detainer. Code Civ. Proc. § 726, provides that there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt or for the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage. Sections 1161 and 1174 provide that a tenant of real property is guilty of an unlawful detainer where he continues in possession after failure to perform the covenants of the lease, and authorize, in case the circumstances justify it, an award to the landlord of a sum equal to three times the rent due as a penalty. Held, that the fact that the landlord had security for his rent did not preclude a recourse to the remedy of unlawful detainer, for that is a possessory action, and it was not intended by the Legislature that the taking of security should deprive the landlord of the rights conferred by the statute.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by Melville S. Toplitz and others against the Standard Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Stratton, Kaufman & Torchiana, of San Francisco, for appellants. Leon Samuels, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal upon the judgment roll alone from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant in an action of unlawful detainer. All of the material allegations of the plaintiffs' complaint were admitted by the failure of the defendant's answer to deny them. The defendant, however, as a defense to the action, pleaded the existence of a mortgage executed by the defendant to the plaintiffs as security for the rent reserved in the lease under which the defendant held and occupied the premises in controversy. The court below, in substantial accord with the admitted allegations of the complaint, made its findings of fact in favor of the plaintiffs in so far as concerned the execution of the lease and the breach of the covenant to pay the rent reserved, but further found that a mortgage given as security for the payment of the rent had not been resorted to and exhausted by the plaintiffs prior to the institution of the present action, and from the latter finding deduced the conclusion of law "that by reason of the provisions of section 726 of the Code of Civil Procedure of the state of California the action is barred and cannot be maintained."

The Code section referred to provides that "there can be but one action for the recovery of any debt, or the enforcement of any right secured by mortgage upon real or personal property * * *" (Code Civ. Proc. § 726). The lower court's conclusion of law cannot be sustained. Unlawful detainer is primarily a possessory action, which cannot be defeated or delayed by the fact that the landlord has taken security for his rent, without destroying the manifest design of the Legislature (Code Civ. Proc. § 1161) to provide a summary remedy for the recovery of the possession of the premises withheld by a tenant in violation of the covenants of a lease or other agreement. Incidentally a judgment for the plaintiff in an action of unlawful detainer may award such actual damages as may have been occasioned by a withholding over after a breach of the covenants of the lease, and in addition may, if the circumstances of the case justify it, award to the plaintiff by way of punitive damages a sum equal to treble the amount of the rent then due (Code Civ. Proc. § 1174); but in no sense is an action of unlawful detainer one of debt. Consequently it cannot be said that the present action is one for the recovery of a debt or the enforcement of a right secured by the mortgage in controversy.

It follows that the defense interposed and relied upon was not as a matter of law available to the defendant. The finding with reference to the execution and existence of the mortgage was therefore immaterial, and may be disregarded. The defendant having admitted, and the lower court having found, the execution of the lease and the failure of the defendant to pay the rent reserved therein after the statutory notice to pay or surrender possession of the leased premises, judgment should have been entered for the plaintiffs.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the lower court to render and enter judgment in favor of the plaintiffs upon and in keeping with the findings as made relating to the execution and breach of the lease.

CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO et al. v. JORDAN, Secretary of State. (S. F. 7118.)

1. STATUTES (§ 35½*)—SUBMISSION OF QUESTIONS OR PROPOSITIONS TO POPULAR VOTE—FORM OF BALLOT.

Pol. Code, § 1197, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1913, p. 1161, providing that the order in which all questions and propositions, to be submitted to vote, shall appear upon the ballot shall be determined by the secretary of state, and subdivision 9, as amended by St. 1913, p. 1163, providing that, when any question, proposition, or constitutional amendment is to be submitted to the vote of the electors, there shall be printed, at the right of the last column of names of candidates, another column in which such questions shall be designated, refer only to questions and proposed laws of state-wide application, and not to questions of purely municipal or local significance.

2. STATUTES (§ 35½*)—SUBMISSION OF QUESTIONS OR PROPOSITIONS TO POPULAR VOTE—FORM OF BALLOT.

Pol. Code, § 1197, subd. 3, as amended by St. 1913, p. 1161, provides that the order in which all questions and propositions, including proposed laws and constitutional amendments, to be submitted to vote, shall appear upon the ballot shall be determined by the secretary of state. Subdivision 9, as amended by St. 1913, p. 1163, provides that, whenever any question, proposition, or amendment is to be submitted, there shall be printed, at the right of the last column of names of candidates, another column in which such questions shall be designated. St. 1913, p. 1122, provides that the question of issuing San Francisco harbor bonds shall be submitted to the electors of the state, and that all ballots shall have printed thereon and at the end thereof the proposition to be voted on. Held, that the provision of the act of 1913, that the proposition therein referred to shall be printed at the end of each ballot, merely requires that it shall be printed after the names of candidates as provided in the Political Code, but, even if it means more, it merely requires the secretary of state to give it the last place among the propositions to be submitted to the electors of the state, and questions of purely municipal or local significance should be placed on the ballot after such proposition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Statutes, Dec. Dig. § 35½.*]

In Bank. Original application by the City and County of San Francisco and others, for a writ of mandate against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State of the State of California. Petition denied.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., Thos. V. Cator, and Wm. McDevitt, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

PER CURIAM. This is a petition for mandate directed against the secretary of state. It alleges that pursuant to law 48 questions and propositions, including proposed laws and constitutional amendments, are to be submitted to the electors of the whole state at the ensuing general election to be held in November. It alleges that one of these propositions concerns the issue of San Francisco harbor bonds. Stats. 1913, c. 602, p. 1122. This statute in terms provides that this bonding proposition shall be submitted to the electors of the state at the general election to be held in November, 1914, "and all ballots at said election shall have printed thereon and at the end thereof" the proposition in the alternative so to be voted on. The petition further points out that subdivisions 3 and 9 of section 1197 of the Political Code, as amended St. 1913, pp. 1160, 1163, declare (subdivision 3) that:

"The order in which all questions and propositions (including proposed laws and constitutional amendments), which are to be submitted to the vote of the electors, shall appear upon the ballot shall be determined by the secretary of state."

And subdivision 9 that:

"Whenever any question, proposition or constitutional amendment is to be submitted to the vote of the electors, there shall be printed at the right of the last column of names of candidates, another column of sufficient width, with voting squares in which such question, proposition or constitutional amendment shall be designated, which designation shall consist of a statement prepared as hereinbefore provided for and opposite such question, proposition or constitutional amendment to be voted on, in separate lines, the words 'Yes' and 'No' shall be printed."

Further it is shown that, acting under the authority so vested in him by subdivisions 3 and 9, the secretary of state, in arranging the order, has placed this harbor improvement bond proposition the last upon the list of state-wide propositions under the designation of "No. 48."

Next it is alleged that certain propositions of local consequence, municipal questions, are to be voted upon by the electors of San Francisco as well as by the electors of other municipalities, and that the secretary of state has failed to designate upon the official ballot the place or places which shall be assigned to such questions of local or municipal cognizance. It is then finally asserted that it is a duty of the secretary of state, imposed upon him by subdivision 9, above quoted, to make such designation, and that it is his additional duty, under the provisions of the harbor improvement act, above quoted, to place this last-named proposition at the very literal end of the ballot following all other propositions of state-wide or local consideration. Wherefore it is contended that the place fixed upon the ballot by the secretary of state for this harbor improvement proposition is illegal, and that the secretary of state has failed in the performance of his duty in neglecting and refusing to fix and determine the place upon the ballot where municipal questions and propositions shall be inserted and printed.

[1, 2] While we are of the opinion that the application for mandate should be denied, as the question of the construction of our ballot law is one of public consequence, it is fitting that the reasons for this denial should be briefly expressed. They are these: The law leaves no doubt as to the general order and arrangement of the ballot which is to be submitted to the people. First upon the ballot shall come the names of all candidates for all offices, whether national, state, district, county, or municipal. Following the names of these candidates, and "at the right of the last column of names of candidates," in "another column of sufficient width," shall be placed, in the order determined by the secretary of state, "all questions and propositions" (including proposed laws and constitutional amendments) "which are to be submitted to the vote of the electors." This means all such questions and proposed laws of state-wide application on the approval or rejection of which every elector may speak. When the harbor improvement bond act declared by its terms that the question of its acceptance or rejection should be submitted "at the end" of the ballot, in our view it meant no more than to designate that it should take its place after the names of candidates, as provided by subdivision 3 of section 1197 of the Political Code. It was equivalent to saying that such proposition should take the place on the ballot provided for it by law. But, even if it be conceded that it means more than that, still it must be construed as containing nothing other than a direction to the secretary of state that he should give it the last place amongst all the propositions to be submitted to the electors of the state. This is the view of the secretary of state, and this is in fact what he has done, so that it appears upon the face of the petition that the secretary of state in this respect has fully and fairly complied with the provisions of the law, and that the contention of petitioners that this proposition must physically be printed as the very last word upon the ballot is untenable.

It follows herefrom that questions of purely municipal or local significance will be placed upon the ballot after the names of all candidates and after the submission of all questions calling for state-wide determination by the electors. Such being the place on the ballot which must be occupied by such questions, and since the secretary of state has so far as appears from this petition properly designated the places of candidates and the places of questions of state-wide cognizance, it necessarily follows that questions of local or municipal significance must follow these on the ballot, and that therefore he has not failed in his duty in this respect.

For these reasons the petition for mandate is denied.

Action by Bonnie Elouise McNutt, as executrix of the estate of Cyrus F. McNutt, deceased, and others against Anton Pabst and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Ben Goodrich, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Geo. L. Keefer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. In this cause the transcript on appeal was filed in this court on August 14, 1913. The cause was placed upon the regular calendar for oral argument and on the call of that calendar on October 28, 1913, it was ordered to be submitted, no appearance being made for oral argument by counsel for appellants or respondents. No briefs have been filed and the time within which the same are permitted to be filed under the rules of court has long since expired and no order extending the time for such purpose has been asked for or made. Under such conditions an appellate court is not called upon to examine the transcript in search of errors upon which to order a reversal. The presumption is that the order denying a new trial and the judgment were properly made and entered. While rule 5 (119 Pac. x), governing procedure upon appeal in the Supreme Court and in this court, provides that an appeal may be dismissed, upon notice, for failure to file the transcript or appellant's points and authorities, even though no such motion be urged on behalf of respondent, as here, the court will nevertheless not assume the burden of investigating the merits of the appeal where the same is not supported by any argument, oral or printed.

The judgment and order are therefore affirmed.

JORDAN v. KINGSBURY, State Surveyor General. (Civ. 1347.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 23, 1914.)

1. Public Lands (§ 144*)—School Lands—Resurvey—Effect.

Where the federal government ordered a resurvey of the thirty-sixth section of a township, granted to the state for school purposes by Act Cong. March 3, 1853, c. 145, 10 Stat. 244, and by such resurvey the lines were shifted southward and slightly eastward, so as to embrace a considerable tract of land on the southward side and a narrow strip on the eastward side, not theretofore included within the older section lines, the land so included at once became the property of the state, and was subject to purchase under the state laws.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Public Lands, Cent. Dig. §§ 391–399; Dec. Dig. § 144.*]

2. Mandamus (§ 85*)—Ministerial Acts—Sale of School Lands—Surveyor General—Duties—Enforcement.

Pol. Code, § 3498, provides that if it shall appear to the surveyor general that an application to purchase school land is made in good faith, and that all the facts stated in the application are true, and the land applied for is subject to sale, he shall approve the application; otherwise, he shall disapprove the same. Held, that the power conferred on the surveyor general by such section is neither judicial nor unlimited, but ministerial only, and hence may be enforced by mandamus.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 184–188; Dec. Dig. § 85.*]

3. Mandamus (§ 85*)—Compelling Sale of School Lands.

Where, by resurvey of a section of school land, the lines were so changed as to include additional land, and an application to purchase the land so included was properly made and refused, it was no defense, to the applicant's right to mandamus to compel the sale of the land to him, that to do so would cause confusion between the state and federal authorities regarding the boundaries of their respective lands.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Application for mandamus by J. H. Jordan against W. S. Kingsbury, Surveyor General and Register of the State Land Office of California. From a judgment granting the writ, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Malcolm C. Glenn, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellant. B. M. Aikins, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is a proceeding wherein the plaintiff sought and obtained in the trial court a peremptory writ of mandate, requiring the defendant, as surveyor general of California and register of the state land office, to approve the plaintiff's application to purchase from the state those certain lands described in his petition. From a judgment to that effect the surveyor general appeals.

The facts of the case are practically undisputed and are quite fully and clearly set forth in the brief of appellant. In the year 1869 an official survey was made by authority of the United States government of those sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections of the public lands which had been granted by the government to the state of California for school purposes, under the act of Congress of March 3, 1853, 10 Stat. 244, c. 145. Between the year 1869 and the year 1893 the state of California had sold and issued patents for all of the lands embraced within the said section 36 in which the lands sought to be purchased by plaintiff are now claimed to be. In the year 1893 the United States government ordered another official survey to be made of the public lands within that region. By this later, and probably more accurate, survey the boundary lines of said section 36 were shifted southward and also slightly eastward, so as to embrace a considerable tract of land on the southward side and a narrow strip on the eastward side not theretofore included within the older section lines. The tract of land now sought to be purchased by the plaintiff lies within these newer boundaries, but outside of the lands originally surveyed. The application of the plaintiff to purchase these lands was disapproved and denied by the surveyor general, upon the chief ground, as expressed in his decision disapproving the same, that the lands sought to be purchased belonged to the United States, and not to the state. In opposing the application for the writ of mandate, the defendant urged two additional reasons why it should be denied. These were: First, that the decision of the surveyor general is final upon an application to purchase state lands, and hence is not reviewable by the courts; and, second, that the granting of the writ of mandate would lead to great confusion between the state and federal governments as to the boundaries of state and federal lands. It is conceded by the surveyor general that the application of the plaintiff to purchase these lands was otherwise regular in form and substance, and that he was and is a qualified person to purchase the same.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] It will thus be seen that the first question for determination is the question as to whether, for the purposes of this proceeding, these lands are to be regarded as state lands, lying within the official boundaries of the said thirty-sixth section, and therefore open to purchase by the plaintiff. We think this question must be answered in the affirmative, upon the authority of the cases of Cragin v. Powell, 128 U. S. 691, 698, 9 Sup. Ct. 203, 32 L. Ed. 566; Hardin v. Jordan, 140 U. S. 371, 11 Sup. Ct. 808, 838, 35 L. Ed. 428; Knight v. U. S. Land Association, 142 U. S. 161, 12 Sup. Ct. 258, 35 L. Ed. 974; Gleason v. White, 199 U. S. 54, 60, 25 Sup. Ct. 782, 50 L. Ed. 87. If, therefore, under these authorities the effect of the second official survey of these lands was to include them within the scope of the act of Congress of March 3, 1853, and transfer them to the state as a part of its school lands, it follows that the action and decision of the surveyor general in disapproving the application of the plaintiff to purchase these lands was erroneous.

[2] The surveyor general, however, contends that, under the authority invested in him by section 3498 of the Political Code, his decision in the matter was final, and hence not the subject of review by the courts upon this form of writ. The section of the Political Code upon which he bases this contention reads as follows:

> "If it shall appear to the surveyor general that the application is made in good faith and that all of the facts stated in the application are true and that the land applied for is subject to sale, he shall approve the application, otherwise he shall disapprove the same." Political Code, § 3498.

The simple reading of this section shows that the power of the surveyor general is neither as judicial nor as unlimited as he claims it to be. The three conditions upon which the section expressly states he shall act in his approval or disapproval of the application were all met by the plaintiff: His application was admittedly made in good faith, and all the facts stated therein were true, and, as we have seen, the lands applied for were, for the purposes of said application, at least, lands of the state, under their last official survey. These things being true, the section of the Code in question expressly says that the surveyor general "shall approve the application." It is quite clear that this language leaves that official no discretion in the premises, and renders his act merely a ministerial one, and as such subject to the compulsions of a writ of mandate. The case of Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 596, is in point upon this question, and the industry of counsel for appellant has not produced any later case overruling that early decision.

[3] The appellant's final contention that the writ of mandate ought not to issue, because of its effect in creating confusion between the state and federal authorities regarding the boundaries of their respective lands, is without merit. The clear right of a citizen of the state to acquire public lands open to purchase, in the manner provided by law, must be enforceable by an appropriate proceeding, regardless of such consequences as appellant forecasts. Even if his fears are well grounded, the law has doubtless provided proper remedies for such confusion as might arise, without the need of denying this plaintiff the present right to which he is clearly entitled.

The judgment and order denying defendant's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George H. Buck, Judge.

Peter Panagoit was convicted of fraudulently presenting a false claim of loss by fire to the Liverpool, London & Globe Insurance Company, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Henry B. Lister, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

KERRIGAN, J. The defendant herein was convicted of fraudulently presenting a false claim of loss by fire to the Liverpool, London & Globe Insurance Company, and this appeal is taken from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying defendant's motion for a new trial.

The indictment charged defendant, together with G. A. Levy and C. G. Patric, with violating the provisions of section 549 of the Penal Code of this state, and recited that on the 17th day of December, 1912, G. A. Levy obtained and procured a contract of insurance against loss by fire to the amount of $3,000, in said insurance company, on a stock of merchandise, household furniture, and other personal property contained in a store and dwelling situated in Albany, county of Alameda; that on the 26th day of December, 1912, the said Levy sold the property so insured to the defendant, and assigned and delivered to him the contract of insurance; that shortly thereafter, and on the 28th day of December, 1912, a fire occurred at the said premises and the property so insured was destroyed. The indictment further alleged that at the time of its destruction as aforesaid the property so insured did not exceed in value the sum of $1,500, and that the defendant well knew this, and that, notwithstanding such fact, and desiring and intending to cheat the said insurance company out of the sum of money exceeding the actual value of the insured property, defendants willfully and unlawfully presented a false and fraudulent claim of loss in the sum of $3,000, knowing at the time that the value of the property did not exceed the sum of $1,500. Defendant Panagoit demanded severance, and was separately tried, convicted, and sentenced to 18 months' imprisonment in San Quentin.

[1] Upon his arraignment, defendant demurred to the indictment, claiming that the facts stated in the indictment did not constitute a public offense, and later the same question was raised on motion in arrest of judgment. It is argued by defendant in support of these contentions that, by reason of the fact that the statute is silent as to the person to whom a presentation of loss should be made in order to constitute the offense, the statute is incomplete, and can only be given the interpretation that the presentation

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes is to be made to a regularly constituted court of justice. The section reads as follows:

> "Every person who presents or causes to be presented any false or fraudulent claim, or any proof in support of any such claim, upon any contract of insurance for the payment of any loss, or who prepares, makes, or subscribes any account, certificate of survey, affidavit, or proof of loss, or other book, paper, or writing with intent to present or use the same, or to allow it to be presented or used in support of any such claim, is punishable by imprisonment in the state prison not exceeding three years, or by a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, or by both."

While it is true, as claimed by defendant, that the statute does not expressly designate to what person or persons the presentation should be made, nevertheless it is not meaningless or incomplete for that reason. Respondent argues, and justly so, that the statute broadly includes any and every person, firm, or corporation who may or might be liable under a contract of insurance for the payment of the claim and that the statute is not confined to claims arising in courts of justice, but includes the presentation to any person or persons or any agent of person or persons who might be cheated or defrauded thereby. The intent to defraud is the gist of the offense; and the design of the Legislature was clearly to provide a punishment for the presentation of false fire claims with intent to defraud, irrespective of the person to whom such claim should be presented.

[2] Defendant further contends that the testimony taken before a grand jury was insufficient to support an indictment, for the reason that in no part of the evidence was it shown or testified to, that the presentation of the false claim to the insurance company or to any other person, was made in the city and county of San Francisco, and for that reason there is nothing to confer jurisdiction upon the superior court of Alameda county. This contention cannot be maintained. There is no provision in our law for thus reviewing the action of a grand jury in finding an indictment. The validity of an indictment cannot be attacked upon the mere ground of insufficiency of evidence to support it. Courts cannot, in the absence of a statute permitting it, inquire into the sufficiency of the evidence upon which the grand jury acted, in order to invalidate an indictment returned by them. In re Kennedy, 144 Cal. 634, 78 Pac. 34, 67 L. R. A. 406, 103 Am. St. Rep. 117, 1 Ann. Cas. 840. The indictment cannot be assailed on this ground. Brobeck v. Superior Court, 152 Cal. 289, 92 Pac. 646.

It is also claimed that there was no evidence introduced at the trial to prove this fact. An examination of the record does not sustain this claim. The adjuster for the insurance company testified that, after the defendant had made out the proof of loss upon the blank furnished him by such adjuster, the defendant gave it to the company. He further testified that defendant had informed him that he had so done, and that the company had subsequently sent it to him. Besides this, the defendant himself testified that he took it to the company after he had presented it. From all the evidence upon the subject, it sufficiently appears that defendant presented the proof of loss to the company at its office, which was situated at Leidesdorff and California streets, in the city and county of San Francisco.

[3] Another ground urged for reversal is that a certain so-called deposition was introduced in evidence before the grand jury, which contained nothing to show that the defendant was instructed as to his rights as required by section 1324 of the Penal Code, and that for this reason he should be exempted from prosecution. This so-called deposition consisted of certain voluntary statements made by defendant in the law offices of Goodfellow, Eells & Orrick, attorneys for the insurance company, concerning his claim, which statements were taken down in shorthand by a shorthand reporter; but the examination was not authorized, nor was it ever completed, the defendant having left the state during its progress, and his arrest upon this charge shortly followed.

The Penal Code (section 1324) provides in substance that any person offending against any of the provisions of that Code or against any law of the state is a competent witness against any other person so offending, and may be compelled to testify upon any trial, hearing, proceeding, or lawful investigation or judicial proceeding in the same manner as any other person, and if such witness demands that he be excused on the ground that his testimony will incriminate himself, he shall not be excused from testifying, but shall not thereafter be liable to prosecution based upon such testimony. The section further provides that its protecting parts shall not apply, where the privilege is not claimed; but such privilege is deemed to have been claimed unless the judge, foreman, or other person reads distinctly this section of the Code to the witness. The section was passed by the Legislature in 1911. Prior to its enactment our Supreme Court, in the case of People v. Wieger, 100 Cal. 352, 34 Pac. 826, decided that voluntary admissions made by a witness in a criminal action, when he is not in custody and has not been charged with a criminal offense, are competent evidence against him in a criminal prosecution subsequently inaugurated against him. In Commonwealth v. Bradford, 126 Mass. 42, it is held that on the trial of an indictment the voluntary testimony of a defendant before a fire inquest, reduced to writing and signed, and at a time when no criminal prosecution was pending against the defendant, was admissible against him.

The section of the Penal Code last referred to is in the nature of remedial legislation, and its purpose was undoubtedly to extend protection to witnesses in proceedings other than in the course of criminal prosecutions or other actions, in order that the inquiry for which the tribunals were created might not be impeded or their investigations frustrated through the fear of witnesses that their testimony might incriminate themselves; but it certainly can have no application to an inquiry which is not based or held upon legal authority, such as the one under consideration. The witness was not obliged to answer, and he understood that he could not be compelled so to do, for he refused to answer many of the questions put to him, giving as his reasons for such refusal that his inquisitors had no authority to question him. His statements given in support of his claim were therefore voluntary, and admissible against him. Besides this, the instrument appears to have been admitted in evidence in the trial under stipulation.

[4] The further claim that there is no proof that the insurance company to whom the false claim was made was a corporation is without merit. The witness Eitel testified as to the general reputation of the corporation for doing an insurance business, which is sufficient. 10 Cyc. 241; 7 Am. & Eng. Ency. 661.

[5] Defendant also complains of the action of the court in instructing the jury that a presentation had been made; but this fact the defendant himself admitted. This was a mere statement of the evidence, and is not erroneous. People v. Christensen, 85 Cal. 569, 24 Pac. 888; People v. Casey, 65 Cal. 260, 3 Pac. 874.

[6] Finally, objection is made to the alleged misconduct of the district attorney in referring to the crime of arson in his argument, and to the allowing of questions during the trial tending to show that the fire which destroyed the insured property was of incendiary origin. In attempting to rebut the claim of the defendant that he was unfamiliar with the preparation of claims of loss, the district attorney did offer evidence to show that, on other occasions and under other different names, defendant had suffered losses by fire, and that, on those occasions, he had prepared proofs of loss. The court, in admitting the evidence, instructed the jury to dismiss from their minds all evidence of former fires claimed to have been had by the defendant, and stated that such evidence was confined to and was admitted for the sole purpose of rebutting defendant's testimony as to his lack of knowledge in the preparation of a fire claim. While ordinarily evidence of another offense cannot be given in evidence, yet, whenever the case is such that the proof offered in support of the charge tends also to prove the commission of another offense, such proof is admissible; and the fact that it may tend to prejudice the defendant in the minds of the jurors is no ground for its exclusion. People v. Ebanks, 117 Cal. 652, 49 Pac. 1049, 40 L. R. A. 269.

[7, 8] Assuming that the remarks of the district attorney in his argument would indicate that the defendant had committed the crime of arson, the question then arises whether such error is sufficient to justify a reversal of the judgment. It was the duty of the counsel for the defendant to call the attention of the court to improper remarks then and there, so that the court might have advised the jury to disregard them. It is too late to raise such question for the first time on appeal. People v. Kramer, 117 Cal. 647, 49 Pac. 842; People v. Ruef, 14 Cal. App. 576–619, 114 Pac. 48, 54. The record shows no such objection. Counsel for the defendant insists that the objection was made; but the record does not support him in this assertion, and we are bound by it. Moreover, under section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution it would be our duty to affirm the judgment of conviction. The evidence shows beyond all question that the defendant and Patric conspired to defraud the insurance company by presenting a false claim of loss. Patric and Levy were one and the same person. Upon the loss of the property Patric solicited and procured from some of the firms where he had purchased merchandise bills representing purchases greatly in excess of the actual deliveries. These, with other bills which falsely represented merchandise purchased of certain firms where none had been purchased, were used and formed the basis of the claim filed by defendant, who testified that he had seen all this property, which had no existence, go into the premises. These, and other facts disclosed upon a review of the entire record, including the evidence, so far from showing that there has been a miscarriage of justice, tend strongly to prove the guilt of the defendant, and that no other verdict could have been reached if the alleged error had not been committed.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HANSON v. PAUSON et al. (Civ. 1352.)

1. Pleading (§ 339*)—Demurrer—Ruling—Consent.

The overruling of a special demurrer to the complaint with the express consent of the defendant was tantamount to a withdrawal of the demurrer, in so far as it was granted on ambiguities and uncertainties in the complaint.

2. Corporations (§ 268*)—Insolvency—Action against Stockholders—Amount of Stock Issued.

In an action against an alleged stockholder of a corporation to recover his proportionate share of the corporation's indebtedness, the complaint alleged that at the time the indebtedness was created there was subscribed, issued, and outstanding 9,588 shares, and no more, of the capital stock of the company. Held, that such allegation, in the absence of a special demurrer, contained a sufficient statement of the total amount of the corporation's capital stock subscribed for at the time the indebtedness was incurred.

4. Evidence (§ 471*)—Witnesses (§ 248*)—Examination—Conclusion — Nonresponsive Answer.

On an issue as to whether defendant was a stockholder of a corporation, the vice president was offered as a witness, and asked to state the circumstances under which the stock in question was issued to the defendant. An objection having been overruled, the witness answered that the stock was issued to F., trustee for defendant, as a bonus for a loan of $25,000, which defendant had made to the corporation. Held, that the answer was not responsive, but was the conclusion of the witness, and was subject to motion to strike.

8. Corporations (§ 171*)—Stockholders—Evidence.

It having been admitted that defendant's name was not entered as a stockholder on the books of a corporation, the entry of his name in a list of names written on the flyleaf of the corporation's stock journal, under the heading "Notice sent to the following," did not constitute an entry of his name on the stock book of the corporation as a stockholder, and did not constitute prima facie evidence that he was the owner of stock in the corporation under Civ. Code, § 322, imposing a liability on stockholders for corporate debts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 633–636; Dec. Dig. § 171.*]

9. Corporations (§ 171*) — Stockholders — Evidence of Relation.

A charge that defendant was a stockholder in a corporation, made to him in a meeting of stockholders and creditors, was not evidence against him that he was a stockholder in a suit to recover his proportion of corporate indebtedness, unless the truth of the charge was admitted by defendant, either by his express answer or his acquiescence indicated by his silence, or by acts and conduct on his part which could be fairly construed as an assent.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; B. V. Sargent, Judge.

Action by Edward J. Hanson against Sherman Pauson and others. From a judgment against defendant Frank Pauson, charging him with an assessment, as a stockholder, to pay indebtedness of the Monadnock Brick Company, Incorporated, he appeals. Reversed and remanded.

A. L. Weil, of San Francisco, for appellant. Vogelsang & Brown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant, Frank Pauson, from a judgment entered against him in the sum of $790.50, and from an order denying him a new trial, in an action instituted to determine and enforce his liability as a stockholder for the indebtedness of the Monadnock Brick Company, Incorporated. The plaintiff's complaint proceeded upon the theory that the defendant, Pauson, was a stockholder in the corporation at a time when the corporation had made and delivered its two certain promissory notes in the aggregate sum of $11,500 to the City and County Bank, plaintiff's assignor. The complaint alleged the nonpayment of these notes, and in effect prayed for a judgment against the defendant, as a stockholder of the corporation, for his proportionate share of the unpaid principal and interest due on said notes. The defendant in his answer denied that he was a stockholder in the corporation. The issue thus raised ultimately became the paramount question upon the trial of the case. It was an admitted fact in the case that prior to the execution and delivery of the corporation's notes to plaintiff's assignor, the corporation, in consideration of a loan of $25,000, had executed its promissory note in that amount, indorsed by its three directors, to the defendant, and at the same time issued and delivered to him a certificate for 500 shares of the corporate capital stock in the name of the corporation's then secretary, A. Fieste, as trustee. The action was defended upon the theory that the defendant had merely received the stock in question as security for the payment of the loan made by him to the corporation. The plaintiff, on the other hand, contended and attempted to show that the stock was issued, delivered, and accepted as a bonus for the making of the loan, and that the defendant thereby became a stockholder of the corporation. The trial court found as a fact from the evidence adduced upon the whole case that at the time the corporate indebtedness in suit was incurred, defendant was the equitable owner of 500 shares of the corporation's stock, which stood upon its books in the name of A. Fieste as trustee, and deduced the conclusion of law therefrom that the defendant was liable as a stockholder for his proportionate share of the indebtedness of the corporation.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] At the outset it is contended that the plaintiff's complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. This contention is based upon the assumption that the complaint does not allege the total number of shares of stock of the Monadnock Brick Company which were subscribed at the time the obligation to plaintiff's assignor was incurred. In this behalf the allegation of the complaint is:

> "That at the time said sum was loaned by said City and County Bank to said Monadnock Brick Company and the aforesaid promissory notes executed therefor, there were subscribed, issued, and outstanding 9,588 shares, and no more, of the capital stock of said Monadnock Brick Company."

The ambiguity and uncertainty, if any, existing in this allegation could have been corrected by the interposition of a special demurrer. Such a demurrer was in fact interposed. The demurrer, however, was overruled with the express consent of the defendant. This was tantamount to a withdrawal of the demurrer, in so far as it was grounded upon the ambiguities and uncertainties of the complaint. Evans v. Gerken, 105 Cal. 311, 38 Pac. 725.

[2, 3] This left the complaint standing as if no special demurrer had been interposed, and in the absence of such a demurrer, we are satisfied that the complaint contained a sufficient statement of the total amount of the capital stock of the corporation that was subscribed for at the time the obligation in suit was incurred. Bashore v. Parker, 146 Cal. 525, 80 Pac. 707; Thomas v. Wentworth Hotel Co., 158 Cal. 275, 110 Pac. 942, 139 Am. St. Rep. 120. The allegation of the complaint in this behalf was not denied by the answer of the defendant; therefore the total number of shares subscribed in the corporation at the time the indebtedness in suit was incurred, was, as pleaded in the plaintiff's complaint, an admitted fact in the case. Consequently no evidence was necessary to sustain the finding of the trial court upon this phase of the case.

[4] F. H. Hilbert, vice president of the Monadnock Brick Company, was a witness for the plaintiff. During the course of his direct examination, he was asked to state the circumstances under which the stock in question was issued to the defendant. Objection was made to the question in effect upon the ground that evidence of the circumstances concerning and controlling the issuance of the stock was incompetent unless such circumstances were shown to have been communicated to the defendant. The objection was overruled and the witness allowed to answer that the stock "was issued by the corporation to Mr. Fieste, trustee, for Mr. Pauson, as a bonus for a loan of $25,000, which he had made to the Monadnock Brick Company." A motion to strike out the answer upon the ground stated in the objection and upon the further ground that the answer stated merely the conclusion of the witness was denied.

[5, 6] Upon the issue of whether or not the defendant was a stockholder in the corporation, evidence of the circumstances covering and controlling the issuance of the stock to him was competent, relevant, and material, provided such evidence was accompanied with or followed by other evidence showing or tending to show that the circumstances of the transaction had been communicated to the defendant. Jones on Evidence, § 517.

The trial court apparently overruled the objection upon the assumption that the defendant's knowledge of the circumstances under which the stock was issued would be subsequently shown by other evidence. If this be so, the objection as made was rightly overruled for the time being, and if the witness had answered the question propounded to him, and his testimony had been followed by competent evidence that the circumstances of the transaction had been communicated to the defendant, no fault could be finally found with the ruling of the trial court. The question as propounded, however, was not answered by the witness. His answer cannot be construed to be even an attempt to narrate the circumstances under which the stock in question was issued to the defendant. At its best, his answer embodied no more than his mere conclusion as to the result of some undisclosed action which may have been taken by the officers of the corporation concerning the issuance of the stock in question. A witness may not testify as to his conclusions concerning the effect of the transaction, even where the facts themselves are disclosed; and surely he should not be permitted to give in evidence his conclusions, adduced from undisclosed facts and circumstances. The legal effect of the issuance of the stock to the defendant was the paramount point in controversy in the present case, and this was a question which should have been decided by the trial court upon a consideration of the facts of the transaction, whatever they may have been, unaided and uninfluenced by the conclusion of the witness. The motion to strike out the answer complained of should have been granted.

[7] Further along in the testimony of the witness Hilbert, it appeared that a list of names with the heading, "Notice sent to the following," was written upon the flyleaf of the corporation's stock journal. This list of names was offered in evidence upon behalf of the plaintiff, whereupon objection was made upon the ground that it was incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial, that it was not shown that the list of names was made and issued in the regular course of the business of the corporation, and that it did not appear "that the defendant * * * was cognizant of the fact that his name appears there, and it was an attempt to bind him by something not done in his presence." In response to a question from the court as to the purpose of offering the list in evidence, counsel for the plaintiff stated:

> "I am going to follow it up by showing that Mr. Pauson was on the list; (that) he was the party to whom notice was to be given; that the secretary always did send out notices to attend stockholders' meetings to him. I want to show he was a stockholder."

[8] The objection was overruled, and the list, which included the name of the defendant, was received in evidence, presumably for the purpose stated. The question as to whether or not such list was admissible in evidence as a foundation for proof of the further fact that notices to stockholders were usually sent to the parties, including the defendant, whose names appeared thereon, is of no consequence, and need not be decided, in view of the fact that the admission of the list in evidence was not followed by any evidence showing that such notices had been sent to the defendant. The only evidence upon this point is to be found in the testimony of the witness Hilbert, which was to the effect that he knew that the bookkeeper of the corporation had been instructed to send notices of the corporation's affairs to the parties whose names appeared upon the list, but he did not know of his own knowledge that such instructions had in fact been complied with. If the name of the defendant had been entered on the stock book of the corporation as a stockholder, such entry would have been prima facie evidence that he was the owner of stock in the corporation. Civ. Code, § 322. And if such proof had been made, then in this action to enforce his liability as a stockholder, the burden of proving that he was not a stockholder would have been upon him. Jones on Evidence, § 517. But it is an admitted fact in the case that the defendant's name was not entered as a stockholder upon the books of the corporation; and while the preliminary proof received in support of the offer of the list in evidence may have been sufficient to show that it was prepared by the bookkeeper of the corporation for the purpose of forwarding notices to real or supposed stockholders, nevertheless such list cannot be construed and considered as an entry in the books of the corporation within the meaning of section 322 of the Civil Code; and therefore such list in and of itself did not constitute any evidence of the fact that the defendant was a stockholder in the corporation. It follows that the ruling of the trial court was erroneous in so far as the list in question was received in evidence for the purpose of showing that the defendant was a stockholder.

[9] In addition to the evidence erroneously admitted under the rulings previously noted, plaintiff attempted to show that the defendant was present at a stockholders' meeting of the corporation, that he made no reply when asked by a creditor of the corporation "to advance money to the corporation because * * * he was a stockholder—or something to that effect." If the defendant had attended this meeting as a real or ostensible stockholder, and while there had failed to deny the assertion that he was a stockholder, this doubtless would have been some evidence tending to show that he had received and accepted the stock in controversy as a bonus, and not, as he testified, as collateral security for the payment of the corporation's notes to him. But the evidence falls far short of showing any such situation. In the first place, as the evidence shows, the meeting referred to was not composed exclusively of stockholders—to the contrary, it shows that the creditors of the corporation were invited to be present "in order to see what they could do to straighten out" the affairs of the corporation, and in response to that invitation, many of the creditors attended the meeting. The defendant was present at the meeting. Admittedly he was a creditor of the corporation; and the evidence does not show that he attended the meeting in any other capacity. Consequently it cannot be said that the plaintiff's evidence affirmatively shows that the defendant attended the meeting as a real or ostensible stockholder, and his presence in any other capacity will not weigh as evidence against him. The charge that the defendant was a stockholder in the corporation was not evidence against the defendant unless the truth of the charge was admitted by the defendant either by his express answer, or his acquiescence as indicated by his silence, or by acts and conduct on his part which could be fairly construed as an assent.

While the testimony of two witnesses for the plaintiff is positive upon the point that at the meeting referred to one of the creditors in effect charged the defendant with being a stockholder, yet neither witness testified that the defendant remained silent under the charge. One witness was unable to recall the defendant's reply, and the other refused to say that he made no answer. On the other hand, the defendant as a witness in his own behalf, while admitting that he was in effect charged by a creditor of the corporation with being a stockholder, testified, "I told him positively that I did not own a share of stock in the company." Clearly the evidence upon this phase of the case failed to show that the defendant by acquiescence or otherwise admitted the truth of the charge that he was a stockholder in the corporation.

[10] Incidentally it is contended that the corporation could not legally issue its stock as a pledge for the repayment of a loan, and from this it is argued that it must be presumed as a matter of law that the stock in question was issued and accepted in pursuance of a lawful purpose, and the benefit, as evidence, of the asserted presumption is claimed in aid of the finding of the trial court.

Ordinarily, of course, the issuance and acceptance of corporate stock, regular upon its face, carries with it a presumption that such stock was issued for a lawful purpose, but we apprehend that no such presumption prevails in the presence of proof to the contrary; and, conceding without deciding that the issuance of the stock in question as a pledge was an act ultra vires, such issue would be a nullity, and certainly would not have the effect of transforming the defendant from a pledgee into a stockholder.

The testimony concerning defendant's presence at the meeting of the stockholders, and the charge made there that he was a stockholder, coupled with the testimony hereinbefore referred to in the discussion of the rulings of the trial court, constitutes practically all of the evidence upon which the plaintiff relied at the trial to show that the defendant was a stockholder of the corporation. The evidence adduced upon behalf of the defendant did not develop anything in aid of the plaintiff's case, or which tended in any degree to support the finding in question; and if, as previously indicated, the testimony as to what transpired at the stockholders' meeting did not constitute any evidence against the defendant, it follows that the finding of the trial court that he was the equitable owner of the stock in question is supported only by the evidence which was erroneously admitted. This being so, it is obvious that such finding is not supported by any competent evidence.

For the reasons stated, the judgment and order appealed from are reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

McNUTT et al. v. PABST et al. (Civ. 1402.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1001*)—Review—Verdict—Conflicting Evidence.

Where, in a suit to recover for attorneys' services in defending an action involving the title to certain land, the evidence as to the value of the land was conflicting, and ranged from $200 to $2,000 per acre, a jury's finding as to the value of the land, supported by some substantial evidence, could not be set aside on appeal.

2. Evidence (§ 568*)—Value—Opinions—Effect.

In a suit for attorneys' services in defending an action involving the title to real property, the value of such property furnished only one of the factors to be considered in determining the reasonable value of the services; the jury, notwithstanding any opinion expressed by the witnesses, being authorized to form its own judgment as to the value of the land, considering its location and surrounding conditions.

3. Evidence (§ 558*) — Experts — Cross-Examination—Attorney Fees—Reasonable Value.

In a suit to recover attorney fees for the defense of an action involving the title to real property, valued by the witnesses at from $200 to $2,000 per acre, it was proper cross-examination of certain attorneys, who were called to testify as to the value of such services, to ask them to fix the value, assuming that the land was worth only from $50 to $200 per acre, though there was no evidence to warrant such assumption, as tending to illustrate the weight the matter of the value of the land had with the witnesses in leading them to conclusions expressed as to the value of the services rendered.

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1056*)—Prejudice—Exclusion of Evidence.

Where, in a suit to recover for attorneys' services, the evidence fully showed all the facts as to what was done before and at the time of the transaction, and one of the plaintiffs testified fully as to having acted diligently according to the view he took of the case for the best interests of his clients, and explained why a cross-complaint had not been filed, as it was insisted by defendants should have been done, plaintiffs were not prejudiced by the court's refusal to allow one of them to testify as to whether he had done everything he thought necessary or proper to do in the case.

5. Trial (§ 339*)—Verdict—Correction.

In a suit by attorneys to recover fees, defendants took issue as to the value of the services, and by a cross-complaint demanded damages for alleged negligent handling of the suit, which was tried, and in which defendant P. was successful. The jury first brought in two verdicts, one in favor of plaintiffs for $500, and the other in favor of defendants for $325; whereupon the court returned them to the jury room, and thereafter they submitted one verdict in favor of plaintiffs for $175. Held, that the verdicts first returned should be regarded as a finding that the full value of plaintiffs' services, had there been no negligence, would have been $500, but that defendants had suffered in the sum of $325 because of their negligence, and that the court therefore properly returned the jury to their room and had the verdict corrected.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Bonnie Elouise McNutt, as executrix of the estate of Cyrus F. McNutt, deceased, and others, against Anton Pabst and others. Judgment for plaintiffs. From an order denying their motion for a new trial, they appeal. Affirmed.

Ben Goodrich, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Geo. L. Keefer, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

JAMES, J. In the year 1909 Cyrus F. McNutt, Joseph E. Hannon, and Benjamin Balmer, as attorneys at law, were employed by respondents to appear and defend in two actions then pending in the superior court in the county of Los Angeles, in each of which respondents appeared as parties defendant. Cyrus F. McNutt has since died, and his executrix has been substituted herein in his stead. The actions first referred to concerned the question as to the title to a certain lot of land, comprising about eight acres. Pursuant to their employment the attorneys for respondents prepared their defense to the first action, which necessitated a lengthy examination of the records in the county recorder's office, and that action was finally tried, the trial occupying some three days. The city of Los Angeles was also a party defendant, and a disclaimer was first filed on its account, but later, upon application made in that behalf, the court allowed the said city to file an answer, by which it set up title in itself to the land in question. This answer was filed on January 14, 1910, and in May following the plaintiff therein dismissed the action as to the city of Los Angeles. The findings and decree of the court as finally entered were in favor of the respondent Anton Pabst; it being determined that he held, as against the plaintiff there suing, good title to the land then in controversy. No contract had been made between respondents and their attorneys as to payment of any specific sum on account of fees for services rendered by the attorneys in either of the actions to quiet title, and after the first cause had been tried and determined a dispute arose between respondents and their counsel as to what amount it would be proper for the former to pay. The attorneys claimed that the sum of about $1,750 had been earned by them, and respondents objected to paying more than $500. Thereupon the attorneys refused to proceed any further as counsel for respondents in the second action, and brought this suit to recover the sum of $1,720 as for services rendered in the first suit and $250 for services in the second action. The defendants took issue as to the value of the services, and by cross-complaint made a claim for damages by reason of alleged negligent handling of the suit which was tried, and in which respondent Anton Pabst was the successful party. The jury returned a verdict in favor of appellants for the sum of $175, and, judgment being entered thereon, appellants made their motion for a new trial, and appealed from the order denying the same.

[1] Considerable testimony was introduced at the trial touching the value of the land which was the subject of the actions heretofore referred to, this evidence being offered as a basis for the fixing of a reasonable sum to be allowed as compensation to counsel. The testimony in this behalf varied greatly; some witnesses fixing the value of the eight acres at as low as $200 per acre, and others fixing as high a figure as $2,000 per acre. It is contended on behalf of appellants that the evidence preponderated in their favor upon the question as to the land being worth approximately $2,000 per acre. It is not in terms urged that the "preponderance" of the evidence rested in that direction, but such must be the effect to be given to the claim made upon that matter. This contention must be dismissed with but brief comment, for the record discloses that there was some substantial evidence both ways upon the question of the value of the land, and, that being true, this court cannot substitute its judgment for that already declared by the jury.

[2] Moreover, a consideration of the value of the property affected in the actions referred to only furnishes one of the factors to be taken in view by the jury in arriving at a verdict as to the reasonable value of the services rendered by the attorneys; and notwithstanding any opinion expressed by the witnesses, the jury had the right to form its own judgment as to that value, taking into consideration the location and conditions surrounding the land, all of which were described in the evidence.

[3] It is complained that the court erred in allowing questions to be asked of certain attorneys who were called as witnesses and of some of the parties plaintiff, which required the witnesses to fix the amount of reasonable attorney's fees assuming that the land was worth only from $50 to $200 per acre. Whether there was sufficient evidence to warrant this assumption as to values is not material, because as a matter of cross-examination the questions were proper, as tending to illustrate just what weight the matter of the value of the land had with the witnesses in leading them to conclusions expressed as to the worth of the legal services rendered. It may be here suggested that in the transcript there are not set out the instructions given by the trial court to the jury, and it may be therefore assumed that those instructions correctly stated the law, and that, if the effect of any of the evidence should have been limited by the instructions, such instructions so limiting it were declared to the jury. Code Civ. Proc. § 2061. This observation is pertinent to be kept in mind in a consideration of most of the points made by appellants relating to the admission and rejection of testimony.

[4] It is contended again that the court erred in refusing to allow appellant Balmer to testify as to whether he had done everything he thought necessary or proper to do in the case which was tried. The evidence showed fully all of the facts as to what was done before and at the trial of the action, and the jury was called upon to determine as to whether counsel had performed their full duty in that behalf. One of appellants, Mr. Hannon, did testify quite fully as to having acted, according to the view he took of the case, diligently for the best interest of his clients. One of the grounds for damages alleged to have been caused to respondents was that appellants should not have permitted the city to be dismissed from the action which was tried, but that a cross-complaint should have been filed, and so caused to be determined in the one action all questions between respondents and the city relating to the title to the land in dispute. Mr. Hannon explained why this was not done, and why in his judgment and the judgment of his associates it was deemed best not to take the affirmative as against the city; but evidently the jury, as it had the right to do, concluded that counsel was negligent in not so acting. Were that question, as a matter of fact, submitted here, and were it a proper one for review, this court might well differ with the jury as to its conclusion. However, that matter is past questioning. It does seem from the record that the work devoted by counsel to the interest of respondents was laborious, and involved a large amount of time and attention to detail. The amount awarded to them by the jury seems very small, considering the services rendered; still upon a careful examination of each of the points made for reversal, and assuming, as has been before suggested, that the jury was fully and correctly instructed as to the law, it cannot be said that any prejudicial errors have been shown which demand that a new trial should be ordered.

[5] From affidavits used on the motion for a new trial it was shown that the jury first brought in two verdicts, one in favor of appellants for $500, and the other in favor of respondents for $325. Upon instruction from the court the jury was returned to the jury room and thereafter submitted one verdict in favor of appellants for the sum of $175. The minute record shows only the return of the verdict for $175. It may be assumed, conceding that the question of irregularity in the action of the jury is properly presented, that the jury intended by their double verdict, first offered, to determine that the full value of the services rendered by appellants, had there been no negligence, was the sum of $500, but that there had been negligence and damage suffered as a consequence, which reduced the value of the services by the sum of $325. It was altogether proper under the circumstances for the court to have the jury returned to the jury room and the verdict corrected.

A discussion has not been made of each point as detailed in the brief of counsel for appellants, but a very careful consideration of the argument in support of the contention that the order denying the motion for a new trial should be reversed does not suggest a conclusion favorable to appellants' view of the case.

The order is affirmed.

We concur: CONREY, P. J.; SHAW, J.

BRAGG v. MARTENSTEIN. (Civ. 1487.)

1. GIFTS (§ 69*)—OBLIGATIONS OF DONEE—ENFORCEMENT.

Where an understanding between testatrix and her father, whom she made her agent to deliver certain stocks and bonds as gifts to her sisters, that the dividends and income should be applied to the cost of administering testatrix's estate, was not a condition affecting the validity of the gifts, it was at most an obligation cast on the respective donees to so apply the income, which could be enforced against them in an appropriate action at law.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gifts, Cent. Dig. §§ 148, 149; Dec. Dig. § 69.*]

2. GIFTS (§ 62*)—WRITINGS—INDORSEMENT OF WRAPPER—ONLY.

Testatrix, being desirous of making a gift of particular stocks and bonds to her four sisters, prepared four envelopes which contained certain of her stocks and bonds, duly indorsed, and on each of the envelopes she wrote the name of one of her sisters, with the statement that the inclosure was her property. She then inclosed each of these envelopes in another, addressed to the sister to whom the inner envelope referred, directing that in case it became apparent that she was about to die her father should put the contents of the envelopes into the possession of the persons to whom their inclosures were addressed. She wrapped the four envelopes in a paper wrapper, on the outside of which was written, "In case of my death, to be opened only by Robert Bragg, Sr., or Rebecca Bragg Martenstein," placing the package in an open desk in her room. When she was about to die, and was conscious, though apparently asleep, her father took the package from the desk and mailed the envelopes to the persons to whom they were addressed. Held, that the word "only" in the indorsement of the package was a limitation on the persons who might open it, and not on the time when it should be opened; and hence, in the absence of any instruction as to the delivery of the inclosed documents, such indorsement did not indicate a change in the donor's mind with reference to her direction to her father as to the delivery of the papers.

3. CONTRACTS (§ 164*)—WRITINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

Where an indorsement on the wrapper of certain envelopes tied together, containing stocks and bonds intended by testatrix to be given to particular persons to whom the envelopes were addressed, was written contemporaneously with the writings on the inclosures and as part of the same transaction, they were to be construed together, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1642.

4. CONTRACTS (§ 164*)—CONSTRUCTION—LEGALITY.

Under Civ. Code, § 1643, providing that a contract must receive such an interpretation as will make it lawful, operative, definite, reasonable, and capable of being carried into effect, if it can be done without violating the intention of the parties, no part of a writing, or of several contemporaneous writings, should be so construed as to render them unlawful, inoperative, indefinite, unreasonable, and incapable of being carried into effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 746–748; Dec. Dig. § 164.*]

5. GIFTS (§ 71*)—EVIDENCE—WRITINGS—CONSTRUCTION.

On an issue as to the validity of certain gifts, it was the duty of the court to construe an indorsement written by testatrix on the wrapper of the package so as to render the gifts valid and carry out the intention of the writer, if possible, and to have recourse to the circumstances under which the indorsement and several contemporaneous writings were made, as disclosed by the undisputed evidence in the case, as provided by Civ. Code, § 1647.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Robert Bragg, as executor of the will of Mary Jane Bragg, deceased, against Rebecca Bragg Martenstein. From a judgment in favor of defendant, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Gerald C. Halsey, of San Francisco, for appellant. Randolph V. Whiting, of San Francisco (T. A. Perkins, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an action brought by Robert Bragg, as one of the executors of the last will and testament of his daughter, Mary Jane Bragg, deceased, against Rebecca Bragg Martenstein, another of his daughters, and the coexecutor of the will of his said deceased daughter, to recover damages for the alleged wrongful conversion of certain stocks, the property of the decedent during her lifetime. The case was tried before the court with a jury. Upon the conclusion of the testimony, and upon motion of the defendant, the court directed the jury to return their verdict in defendant's favor; and it is the alleged error of the court in so doing which presents the chief question for consideration upon this appeal.

The facts of the case are practically undisputed, and are chiefly derived from the testimony of the plaintiff himself. They show that the plaintiff was the father of a family of 14 children, among whom were 5 daughters, of whom the deceased, Mary Jane Bragg, was the eldest. For many years Mary Jane Bragg was a teacher in the public schools of San Francisco, during which time she accumulated considerable property, about $40,000 worth of which was invested in the stocks and bonds of various corporations. A number of years ago she retired from teaching, and during the latter years of her life was afflicted with an affection of the heart, from which she was likely to die suddenly at any time, and to which, in fact, her decease was due. In the year 1898, Mary Jane Bragg and her father, the plaintiff herein, entered into an understanding and agreement that each of them should prepare or have prepared papers disposing of their respective properties, which were to be placed in their respective packages, and that, in case it become apparent to either that the other was about to die, the former should put the contents of the package or envelopes of the one about to die into the possession of the parties to whom their inclosures were addressed. In pursuance of this arrangement, and during the month of February, 1910, Mary Jane Bragg prepared four envelopes, which contained certain of her stock or bonds, duly indorsed by her; and upon each of said envelopes she wrote the name of one of her said sisters, with the statement that the inclosure was her property. She then inclosed each of these envelopes in another envelope addressed to that one of her sisters to whom the inner envelope referred. She also at this time made her will, in which she specifically disposed of the rest of her property, but from which she omitted all reference to the stock and bonds which she had thus placed in their respective envelopes. Her father and her sister, the defendant herein, were made the executors of this will. The envelopes above referred to were placed in an open desk in her room, which was at all times open and available to the plaintiff, in whose home she lived and died. The relation between herself, her father, and her sisters was at all times during her life one of unclouded confidence and affection. About four days before her death, in July, 1910, the plaintiff was in her room, having been informed by her physician that she had but a few more days to live, and he himself believing her to be dying, and believing also that the time had come for carrying her wishes with respect to these several envelopes and their inclosures into effect, he went to her open desk, and taking from it the four envelopes addressed by his dying daughter to her four sisters, respectively, went out and mailed each of them to the person to whom each was thus addressed. On the following day he saw the defendant herein, and, learning that she had received her envelope by mail, advised her to have the stocks which it contained transferred at once into her own name upon the books of the several corporations, and he gave the like advice to his other daughters, who acted thereon before their sister's death. At the time the plaintiff took the several envelopes in question from the desk of his daughter, she was lying propped up in bed, in full view of her desk and of himself, but was apparently asleep. He did not speak to her then as to what he was about to do, or thereafter as to what he had done, because of her dying condition, although her mind remained clear up to the time of her death; nor did her sisters, acting on his advice, directly refer to the fact of their receipt of her gifts, apparently for the same reason.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

[1] At the time the plaintiff took these several envelopes from his daughter's desk, they were wrapped, according to the plaintiff's testimony, in a piece of common brown paper and tied with a piece of common string. This wrapper, he states, he threw into a waste basket, in another room, without looking closely at it; and there it remained until after his daughter's death, which occurred four days later. Some time after her death he noticed this piece of brown wrapping paper in the waste basket, and observed that it had some writing upon it, in the hand of his deceased daughter, and which was in the following words:

> "In case of my death, to be opened only by Robert Bragg, Sr., or Rebecca Bragg Martenstein. [Signed] Mary Jane Bragg. Dated San Francisco, Feb. 4, 1910."

The piece of this paper containing this writing he preserved. Shortly thereafter the will of Mary Jane Bragg was produced and presented for probate by the plaintiff and the defendant, as the co-executors thereof. From the petition for probate and the inventory of the estate all reference to the stock and bonds embraced in the envelopes above referred to was omitted; and it was several months after the admission of said will to probate before the plaintiff took any steps in the way of an assertion that the purported gifts of stock and bonds by the deceased to her sisters were invalid or ineffectual, or that their acts in converting the same to their own names and uses, upon his initiative and advice, were wrongful. In the course of his testimony upon the trial of this cause the plaintiff stated that there was an understanding with his deceased daughter that the dividends and income from the stock and bonds which he had put into the possession of her sisters, as above set forth, was to be applied to the cost of administering her estate; but there is nothing either in her direction or in his action indicating that this was to be treated as a condition in any way affecting the validity of the gifts themselves. At the most it was only an obligation cast upon the respective donees to apply these revenues to the indicated purpose, and which would have been enforceable against them in an appropriate action at law.

The foregoing are substantially the undisputed facts in the case, and the sole question which was presented to the trial judge, at the time he granted the defendant's motion for an instruction to the jury to find a verdict in her favor, was the question as to what construction should be placed upon the writing of the deceased upon the brown paper wrapper about the envelopes which contained the decedent's proposed disposition of that portion of her estate; and the sole question presented here is as to whether it was the province of the trial court or of the jury to construe that writing, and to determine therefrom whether the decedent intended thereby to change the earlier arrangement entered into with her father, and to revoke his agency to make a delivery of the respective envelopes by which her wishes as to the disposition of those portions of her property embraced therein were to be given effect.

[2] It is to be observed that the writing of the deceased upon the brown paper wrapper, which inclosed the other and directed and indorsed envelopes, and their respective inclosures, is ambiguous and uncertain on its face, and that it becomes more so when considered in connection with said inclosures. It reads:

> "In case of my death to be opened only by Robert Bragg, Sr., or Rebecca Bragg Martenstein. * * *"

It is first to be noted that the word "only" is clearly a limitation upon the persons who might open the package, and not upon the time when it was to be opened. It is also to be noted that nothing is therein said or intimated as to what is to be done with the envelopes or their contents within the wrapper, when opened, and that no direction is given as to their delivery to any person or persons by those who were to open it. Neither did the inclosures contain any such direction. This absence of any instruction as to the delivery of the inclosed documents is highly important and significant, as bearing upon the interpretation of the writing on the wrapper and the real purpose and intent of its writer, for it indicates that she did not have the idea of the delivery of the papers in mind in making this writing, and hence that she did not intend thereby to change whatever previous direction she may have given respecting the delivery of the inclosed envelopes.

[3, 4] To adopt any other view is to place an interpretation upon this writing which would render ineffectual and abortive her every other intent and act as expressed in the writings within the wrapper, and in this connection it is important to note that the writing upon the outside of the wrapper and the writings upon and within its inclosures were made contemporaneously and as parts of the same transaction by the decedent, and are to be construed together. Civ. Code, § 1642. When so construed it becomes all the more apparent that the writing upon the wrapper cannot have any reference to the delivery of the papers within it with a view to the time of their taking effect, for otherwise it would defeat and render void every purpose for which these papers were prepared and indorsed and inclosed within their respective envelopes, and it is a cardinal rule of construction that no part of a writing or of several contemporaneous writings is to receive an interpretation which would render it or them unlawful, inoperative, indefinite, unreasonable and incapable of being carried into effect. Civ. Code, § 1643. Such would be the inevitable effect of interpreting the writing upon the outside of this wrapper to mean either that the opening of the package or the delivery of the inclosed papers was to be postponed until after the death of the person who prepared them. It is the much more consistent and reasonable interpretation that it was merely the writer's intention that if for any reason the inclosed documents were not delivered before her death, in accordance with her other arrangements in that regard—as, for instance, they might not be, by reason of the suddenness of her decease—that then and in that event they should pass into the hands only of those whom she had designated in her contemporaneous will to be the executors of her estate.

[5] It was a legal duty cast upon the trial court to place such an interpretation upon the obscure direction of the writing upon the outside of this wrapper as would not only give a reasonable effect to what the writer intended by it, but in so doing would also render effectual and valid the intent and purpose of the writer as expressed in its inclosures. In order to do this, it was the province of the court to have recourse to the circumstances under which these several contemporaneous writings were made, as disclosed by the undisputed evidence in the case. Civ. Code, § 1647.

[6] It is also a rule of construction and of practice that, when a writing requires explanation and when the circumstances surrounding its creation, as disclosed by the evidence, are undisputed, it becomes a question of law for the court, and not a question of fact for the jury, to determine what the proper construction of the writing should be. In this case the undisputed facts, as disclosed by the plaintiff himself, show that it was the lifelong purpose and intent of his daughter that her four sisters should be invested with the ownership of the respective shares of stock and bonds which were inclosed in the envelopes respectively indorsed and directed to them, and that this should be done by the delivery of such envelopes to the persons to whom they were directed when it became apparent to her father that she was about to die, and that he was to be and act as her agent in the execution of this purpose; that no intent on the part of his daughter to change this plan or revoke this agency was ever manifested by her to him during her life, although they were living at all times together in the utmost of mutual harmony and confidence, which relations also at all times embraced the beneficiaries of her intended gifts. These undisputed facts surrounding these ambiguous writings of the deceased were before the court when the motion of the defendant for an instruction to the jury to return a verdict in her favor was made, and we think it was the province of the court, as a matter of law, to determine the intent of the deceased as disclosed by her writings and explained by this evidence, and to instruct the jury accordingly, and that the court committed no error in its instruction.

There are certain other alleged errors of the court during the trial of the cause, but they are not of sufficient importance to merit consideration here.

The judgment and order denying plaintiff's motion for a new trial are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Robert Bragg, as executor of the will of Mary Jane Bragg, deceased, against Elizabeth Bragg Cumming. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed and remanded.

T. A. Perkins, of San Francisco (R. V. Whiting, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant. Gerald C. Halsey, of San Francisco, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. The facts in this case as presented at the trial were identical with those produced and considered by the trial court and reviewed by this court in the case of Bragg v. Martenstein, 143 Pac. 79. The reasoning and conclusions of this court in that case are in all respects applicable to the case at bar.

It follows that the judgment and order herein must be reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial; and it is so ordered.

OAKLAND BARGE & LIGHTER CO. v. FOSTER. (Civ. 1196.)

1. Shipping (§ 58*)—Loss of Barge—Liability of Charterer—Negligence—Evidence.

In an action for loss of a barge leased to defendant, evidence held to support a finding that, at the time of the loss, the barge was being operated in a careful and proper manner by defendant; that everything that human skill and agency could do to prevent such loss was done by defendant; and that the loss was without defendant's fault and occasioned by vis major.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Shipping, Cent. Dig. §§ 233–244, 314, 327; Dec. Dig. § 58.*]

2. Shipping (§ 54*)—Loss of Barge—Liability of Charterer.

In an action for loss of a barge while being used by a charterer, defendant's liability must be determined by the rules governing loss of property while in use under a compensated bailment, in which case defendant would be liable for the loss only in the event that he failed to employ ordinary care and prudence in the use of the barge.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Shipping, Cent. Dig. §§ 219–221; Dec. Dig. § 54.*]

3. Shipping (§ 58*)—Loss of Barge—Liability of Charterer—Burden of Proof.

Where, in an action against a charterer for loss of a barge, defendant claimed that the barge was lost as the result of a sudden, unusual, and extraordinary storm, the burden was on defendant to establish such fact, and, when this was done, the burden shifted to plaintiff to affirmatively show that, notwithstanding the storm, the barge would not have been lost but for defendant's negligence or want of skill in operating it.

A finding of fact, based on evidence in substantial conflict, will not be disturbed on appeal.

5. Shipping (§ 58*) — Loss of Barge — Vis Major—Evidence.

On an issue as to whether a barge was lost as the result of vis major or of negligent operation, evidence that, on the day and about the time the barge in question broke her anchor and towlines, witness, who was captain of a tug, was towing a steamer in the same waters, and that his towline was carried away three times as the result of the strong wind and heavy tide, was admissible to show the prevalence and severity of the storm in the waters where the barge was lost.

6. Evidence (§ 553*)—Experts—Hypothetical Questions.

Hypothetical questions put to an expert are improper, unless founded on admitted facts or other evidence already in the case.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2369–2374; Dec. Dig. § 553.*]

7. Evidence (§ 553*)—Experts—Hypothetical Questions—Objections.

On an issue as to the cause of the loss of a barge, an objection that the facts stated in hypothetical questions asked alleged experts were not sufficient in themselves to enable the witnesses to form and express an opinion as to the causes which produced the loss related to the weight rather than the admissibility of the evidence and was properly overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2369–2374; Dec. Dig. § 553.*]

8. Trial (§ 91*)—Reception of Evidence—Motion to Strike—Previous Objection.

A motion to strike out evidence, not preceded by a proper objection, should be overruled.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 242–244, 252; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

9. Evidence (§ 539*)—Experts—Competency.

Where a witness, as a marine engineer and pilot, had made sufficient observation of tugs operated by gasoline engines to enable him to express an opinion as to the reliability of such engines, he should have been permitted to testify as to whether such tugs were generally reliable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2349–2352; Dec. Dig. § 539.*]

10. Appeal and Error (§ 1056*)—Review—Exclusion of Evidence—Prejudice.

Where, in an action for loss of a barge being towed by a gasoline tug, there was no claim that the failure of the tug's engine to work had contributed in any manner to the loss of the barge, plaintiff was not prejudiced by the exclusion of the opinion of a qualified witness as to whether tugs operated by gasoline engines were generally reliable.

Milton S. Hamilton, of Oakland, for appellant. H. W. Hutton and A. P. Black, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. Briefly stated, the complaint in this action of claim and delivery alleged that the plaintiff had leased to the defendant a barge of the value of $1,600 at a rental of $75 per month; that the defendant refused to pay the second month's rent, and refused and failed upon demand to return the barge to plaintiff. The defendant in his answer admitted that he had failed to return the barge to plaintiff, but pleaded as a defense to the action that he was prevented from doing so because the barge, while in use upon San Francisco bay, was driven ashore and wrecked as the result of a sudden, unusual, and extraordinary storm. In his behalf the answer of the defendant further alleged in effect that, at the time of the hiring, it was understood and agreed that the barge would be used for the purpose of transporting gravel from Napa creek to the city and county of San Francisco, and would be subject to all of the risks incident to such voyage, and that, at the time of its loss, the barge was loaded with gravel, and being towed by agents of the defendant in a proper and careful manner, and that everything that human skill and agency could do to prevent such loss was done by the defendant.

The trial court, among other things, found the facts surrounding the loss of the barge to be as alleged in the answer of the defendant, and as a conclusion of law therefrom declared that the plaintiff was not entitled to judgment. Judgment was accordingly rendered for the defendant, from which, and from an order denying a new trial, the plaintiff has appealed.

[1] The principal point presented for a reversal involves the sufficiency of the evidence to support the trial court's finding of fact that, at the time of the loss of the barge, "she was being operated in a careful and proper manner by defendant, and everything that human skill and agency could do to prevent such loss was done by the defendant, and the said loss was entirely without his fault, but was occasioned by causes beyond human control." This finding, we think, is sufficiently supported by the evidence adduced in support of the defendant's case, which in substance is as follows: The plaintiff knew that the barge was hired and would be used for the purpose of transporting gravel from Napa creek to the city of San Francisco. The barge was being used solely for that purpose at the time of its loss. The barge left Napa creek loaded with gravel in tow of the towboat Anacapa. The crew of the Anacapa consisted of the master, one man, the engineer, a licensed pilot, and two boys about 18 or 20 years old. Her engines were in perfect working order, and she was properly and fully equipped and found for the work in which she was engaged. At the start the weather was good, and the Anacapa, with the barge in tow, proceeded as far as Point Pinole, where the anchor was dropped. When the tide turned, the weather still being fair, the journey to San Francisco was resumed. Approaching The Brothers, it began to breeze up; and it was agreed between the master and pilot of the towboat that it would be best to go into Pirate Cove off Angel Island in San Francisco bay. This was done, and there the barge was anchored with two anchors attached to a 4½-inch Manila rope. Shortly thereafter the anchor line parted. The wind was northwest, an extraordinary and unusual wind for that time of the year. After the breaking of the anchor, the crew endeavored to tow the barge with a 4½-inch Manila rope in good condition, but the line broke twice, and after that it became impossible, without great danger, to put a man aboard the barge to make fast another towline. The towboat whistled for assistance and kept with the barge. Another towboat responded, but its crew failed in an effort to get a line aboard the barge. The barge, with the Anacapa hovering near, drifted out to the Heads. When the tide turned, she drifted in and went ashore at Baker's Beach. The wind on the bay, at or about the time the barge broke her anchor and towlines, was blowing about 25 miles an hour, and the sea was very rough. The wind was blowing a steady blow; it was blowing squally. The 4½-inch Manila rope and two lines in use upon the Anacapa were considered very strong lines, and ordinarily would have been sufficiently strong to hold and tow the barge in question. The combined force of wind and tide caused the anchor and towlines to break. The Anacapa had sufficient power to tow and handle a barge loaded with 125 tons of gravel. The barge in question was loaded with but 93 tons of gravel.

[2] It is conceded that the case as a whole shows the loss of property while in use under a compensated bailment, and that therefore the defendant could be held liable for the loss only in the event that he had failed to employ ordinary care and prudence in the use of the property.

[3] It is also conceded that the burden of proof was upon the defendant to show that the barge in question was lost as a result of a sudden, unusual, and extraordinary storm; and that, when this was done, the burden of proof shifted to the plaintiff to the extent of affirmatively showing that, notwithstanding the storm, the barge would not have been lost but for the defendant's negligence or his want of skill or care in operating the barge. It is insisted, however, upon behalf of the plaintiff that the evidence shows that the loss of the barge was not caused, either proximately or remotely, by a storm of sufficient severity to have probably caused the loss without fault on the part of the defendant, but that such loss was directly due to defendant's negligence, and carelessness in operating the barge with an inefficient towboat and defective equipment. The evidence upon this phase of the case is discussed in detail by counsel for the plaintiff in a very earnest endeavor to show that it is in favor of the plaintiff, and therefore should have compelled a finding against the defendant. But, upon a careful review of the record, we are satisfied that the effort of counsel is but an argument directed merely to the weight of conflicting evidence.

[4] The evidence relating to the sufficiency of the towboat to ordinarily perform the work for which it was engaged, and the sufficiency of the equipment, is, we think, in substantial conflict. The weight of the evidence was a question to be determined exclusively by the trial court; and its decision of a question of fact, based upon conflicting evidence, will not be disturbed here.

[5] A witness for the defendant testified that he was the captain of the towboat Millie, and that on the day, and about the time the barge in question broke her anchor and towlines, the Millie, with the witness in command, was towing a steamer on San Francisco bay; and that when abreast of Angel Island the towline carried away three times as the result of a strong wind and heavy tide. The objection to this testimony was properly overruled. The purpose of the testimony was undoubtedly to show the prevalence and severity of the storm in that portion of the bay in which the barge in question broke her anchor and towlines. For such purpose the effect of the storm upon other vessels similarly situated was relevant and material. Jones on Evidence, § 141.

[6] Several hypothetical questions, purporting to be based upon the facts and circumstances preceding and attending the loss of the barge, were put to a witness for the defendant. In each instance the question was objected to upon the ground that it assumed facts not in evidence. The objection was well taken, and should have been sustained. When the questions were put to the witness, the supposed facts which formed their basis had not been established in evidence. Hypothetical questions must always be founded upon admitted facts or other evidence in the case; and, if the questions complained of had not been followed by evidence of facts upon which they were based, the overruling of the plaintiff's objections would have been prejudicial error. While the procedure adopted by the trial court in the reception of the evidence complained of was careless and confusing, nevertheless, upon the whole, we are satisfied that it did not result in substantial injury to the plaintiff.

[7] The objection that the facts stated in the hypothetical questions were not sufficient in themselves to enable the witness to form and express an expert opinion as to the causes which produced the loss of the barge went to the weight of the evidence sought to be elicited by the questions rather than to the admissibility of such evidence.

Complaint is made of the ruling of the trial court striking out that portion of the testimony of the witness Leffingwell which was to the effect that, in his opinion, towboats operated by gasoline engines were not generally reliable. The motion to strike out was made upon the ground that the proper foundation for the question which called for the opinion of the witness had not been laid, in that it had not been shown that the witness was familiar with towboats operated by gasoline engines. Upon the ground stated, the motion to strike out should have been denied.

[8, 9] In the first place the motion was not preceded by a proper or any objection; and in the second place, the examination of the witness developed the fact that he, as a marine engineer and pilot, had made sufficient observation of towboats operated by gasoline engines to enable him to express an opinion as to the reliability of such engines.

[10] The ruling, however, was harmless. While the towboat in question was operated by a gasoline engine, yet it was not claimed that the failure of the engine to work during the storm contributed to the loss of the barge. No such issue was presented by the evidence; and therefore testimony as to the general unreliability of towboats operated by gasoline engines was wholly immaterial. This being so, the presence of the testimony stricken out would not have tended in the slightest degree to warrant and support a finding in favor of the plaintiff.

We have examined the remaining assignments of error in the rulings of the trial court, and we are satisfied that they are without merit and not of sufficient importance to require discussion.

The judgment and order appealed from are affirmed.

AYERS et al. v. KINGSBURY. (Civ. 1368.)

1. Public Lands (§ 144*)—School Lands—Purchase—Deposit—Effect.

Pol. Code, § 3494, relating to sales of school land, provides that the applicant shall pay 20 per cent. of the price within 50 days after the issuance of a certificate of location, and section 3513 declares that, if such payment is not made within the time, the certificate shall be void. Section 3498 requires that all such applications must be retained by the surveyor general for 90 days before approval, and must be approved, except in certain contingencies, at the expiration of six months. St. 1889, p. 434, provides that every such application shall be accompanied by a deposit of $20 in addition to the filing fee, for which the surveyor general shall give the applicant a receipt, which shall be accepted in part payment of the purchase price of the land, and shall be forfeited in case of the applicant's abandonment of his application or for certain other reasons. Held, that such deposit is intended merely as an evidence of good faith, and not as a preliminary part of the price, and that the receipt to be given therefor does not become a part of the purchase price, and cannot be accepted as such before the application to purchase has been approved.

2. Public Lands (§ 144*)—School Lands—Purchase—Requisites to Initiation of Contract.

Pending preliminary proceedings prescribed for the purchase of school lands, the state recognizes no absolute right in the applicant, and a contract between the applicant and the state does not come into existence until the first installment of the purchase price has been paid and the applicant has received a certificate of approval, as provided by Pol. Code, § 3498, and has taken the same to the county treasurer and made the first payment of 20 per cent. of the price; the contract being evidenced by a certificate of purchase showing the class of land purchased, etc.

3. Public Lands (§ 144*)—Lands of State — School Lands — Application to Purchase—Withdrawal from Sale.

Petitioners having regularly applied to purchase school lands within the exterior boundaries of national forest reserves, the surveyor general, on tender of the applications and the necessary fees, refused to file the applications, and two days thereafter the lands were withdrawn from sale by Act March 24, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 680), supplemented thereafter by Acts March 8 and May 1, 1911 (St. 1911, pp. 311, 1408). Held that, since the tender of the applications for filing or the filing thereof prior to their approval and the payment of the whole or part of the price would be ineffective to create any right to the land in the applicants, withdrawal of the lands prior to such approval, etc., terminated all preliminary proceedings instituted by the applicants to purchase.

4. Public Lands (§ 144*)—Lands of State—School Lands—Application to Purchase—Rights of Applicant.

Compliance by applicants to purchase school lands with the preliminary procedure provided for the sale of such lands secures to them nothing more than the privilege of becoming the exclusive purchasers of the lands applied for, in the event that the state does not withdraw them from sale before a contract to purchase has been completed by an approval of the application and payment of the first installment of the price.

5. Public Lands (§ 144*)—Application for Purchase — Refusal — Mandamus — Statute.

Where petitioners offered to file with the surveyor general certain applications to purchase school lands within national forest reserves prior to the withdrawal of the lands from sale, and the surveyor general improperly refused to file the applications, and two days thereafter the lands were withdrawn from sale by the passage of Act March 24, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 680), supplemented by Acts March 8 and May 1, 1911 (St. 1911, pp. 311, 1408), before the applications could be or were approved and part of the price paid, petitioners could not thereafter maintain mandamus to compel the surveyor general to file the applications and enter them of record nunc pro tunc as of the dates of their presentation.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Mandamus by Frank H. Ayers and others against W. S. Kingsbury, as Surveyor General and ex officio Register of the State Land Office. From a judgment dismissing the writ, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Devlin, Devlin & Maddux, of San Francisco, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison and Malcolm C. Glenn, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This is a proceeding in mandamus, instituted in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco against the respondent, in his official capacity as surveyor general and ex officio register of the state land office. The petition for the writ was demurred to by the respondent upon the grounds that the facts stated did not constitute a cause of action, and that the proceeding was barred by the provisions of section 338, subd. 1, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The demurrer was sustained, and, the petitioners declining to amend, judgment was entered for the respondent, from which an appeal has been taken to this court upon the judgment roll.

The only question discussed in the briefs of counsel for the respective parties is the sufficiency of the pleaded facts to constitute a cause of action. We shall assume, therefore, that the question of the statute of limitations was not presented in the lower court, and that it has been abandoned here.

Generally stated, the facts of the case, as revealed by the petition for the writ, are as follows: On or about March 22, 1909, the petitioners presented to the respondent, for filing and approval, their respective applications to purchase from the state as school lands certain sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections lying within the exterior boundaries of national forest reserves. The lands applied for became the property of the state by grant from the United States, and were at the time the several applications were presented for filing, open for sale by the state. Each application, when presented to the respondent, was accompanied by a tender of the filing fee and a deposit of $20, and in all other respects conformed to the requirements of the then existing law relating to the making and filing of applications to purchase public lands. Pol. Code, tit. 8, c. 1, Stats. 1889, p. 434. In each instance, however, the respondent declined to accept the filing fee and deposit, and ultimately refused to formally file the several applications.

With the foregoing facts as a basis, the petitioners prayed for the mandate of the lower court, commanding and compelling the respondent to formally file and enter of record nunc pro tunc the several applications as of the dates of their presentation to the respondent.

The respondent concedes that the facts stated in the petition for mandate would be sufficient to warrant the issuance of the writ if it were not for the fact that subsequent to the presentation of the applications, and long prior to the institution of the present proceeding, the state by various legislative enactments withdrew the lands in question from sale, and expressly prohibited the respondent from receiving or filing any applications to purchase such lands, and commanding him to take no action upon any such applications previously filed or presented for filing, other than to cancel the same. It will be noted in passing that the several statutes just referred to respectively became the law of the state on March 24, 1909, March 8, 1911, and May 1, 1911.

The applications to purchase, as previously noted, were presented to the respondent on or about March 22, 1909; and the petition for the writ in the present case was filed March 19, 1912. It is the contention of the petitioners that the mere presentation of their several applications to purchase, accompanied by a tender of the filing fee, and an offer to deposit the $20 required by the statute of 1889, gave them a vested right in the lands in question, which could not be destroyed by the subsequent withdrawal of such lands from sale. More accurately stated, it is the contention of the petitioners that, inasmuch as their applications to purchase the lands in question complied in every respect with the requirements of the law existing at the time the applications were presented for filing, a contract of purchase and sale was thereby consummated with the state, the obligation of which could neither be abrogated nor impaired by subsequently enacted legislation withholding from sale the lands which were the subject of the contract. It is not disputed by the respondent that, if the interests of the petitioners in the lands in question had ripened into consummated contracts of purchase and sale, no subsequent act of the Legislature could be invoked upon behalf of the state to avoid the obligation of the contracts; but it is contended that even if the applications to purchase had been duly filed and entered of record in the office of respondent, and the filing fee and $20 deposit accompanying the applications had been received and accepted by him, still no contract of purchase and sale could have been consummated until the applications were first approved by the respondent and then followed by the payment of the first installment of the purchase price, and the issuance by the state of a certificate of purchase, as required and provided for in sections 3498 and 3514 of the Political Code.

In view of the position taken by respondent, we do not deem it necessary to discuss the question as to when, as a matter of law, a paper is to be deemed filed with a public officer, further than to say that conceding, as is contended, that the rights of the several petitioners could not be defeated by the mere arbitrary refusal of the respondent to receive and file their several applications, we are of the opinion, nevertheless, that the actual filing of the applications to purchase the lands in question, accompanied by the filing fee and the $20 deposit required by the statute, would not alone have constituted a complete contract of purchase and sale. This conclusion is founded upon a consideration of the various provisions of the codified and statute law of the state relating to and controlling the sale of public lands. In so far as the question involved in the present case is concerned, the procedure provided by the state for the purchase of its public lands, and the conditions precedent to a completed contract of purchase and sale, are to be found exclusively in the Political Code and the act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 434), and may be briefly outlined as follows: The class or character of public lands subject to sale, and the terms and conditions of sale, are prescribed by section 3494; and section 3495 prescribes what the applications to purchase must contain. Section 3498 requires that all applications must be retained by the respondent for 90 days before approval, and must be approved, except in certain contingencies, at the expiration of 6 months. Section 3494 directs and requires the applicant to pay 20 per cent. of the purchase price within 50 days from the date of the issuance of the certificate of location, a copy of which, by the provisions of section 3512, must be presented to the county treasurer of the county in which the land is situated, who must receive the amount to be paid, and indorse his receipt therefor upon the certificate of location and return the same to the purchaser. Section 3513 declares that, if the first payment of 20 per cent. is not made within the 50 days provided by section 3494, the certificate of location becomes void; but under the provisions of section 3514, "whenever the register receives from the county treasurer a statement showing that an applicant for state lands has made the first payment, he must issue to the person entitled thereto a certificate of purchase, showing the class of land purchased, the number of acres, the price per acre, the date of payment, the date from which interest is to be computed, the amount paid, and the amount remaining unpaid, which certificate is prima facie evidence of title." Such certificate and all the rights acquired thereunder are, by the provisions of section 3515, expressly made the subject of sale by deed or assignment. The remaining Code sections, which have application to the question in mind here, provide in substance that the county treasurer shall report monthly to the register all moneys received for lands during the preceding month, and also the number of the location and the name of the purchaser. Such report must be forwarded to the register at once; and upon receipt thereof he must enter the reported payment to the credit of the purchaser. Pol. Code, §§ 3422, 3423.

The act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 434) provides in part (section 1) that every application shall be accompanied by a deposit of $20 in addition to the filing fee required by law, for which the surveyor general shall give the applicant a receipt, which receipt shall be accepted by the county treasurer in part payment of the purchase price of the land.

The act further provides that the deposit so made and receipted for shall be forfeited in the event that the applicant shall abandon his application, or fail to make proper proof as to the character of the land, etc., or if his application be rejected by reason of any false statement in his affidavit.

The 90-day period provided by section 3498, within which applications may not be approved, is for the benefit of occupants and actual settlers on land (section 3497), to enable the surveyor general to ascertain the character of the land applied for (section 3493), and to see that timber lands are not sold except upon payment of the full purchase price in cash. (Section 3500.) During such period, and in fact at any time before patent is issued, contests may be made. Sections 3498, 3414 et seq.

[1] The act of 1889 is undoubtedly supplemental to and in aid of the various provisions of the Political Code previously enacted, and therefore must be considered and construed in conjunction with the procedure and conditions prescribed by those sections for initiating the purchase of public lands. This being so, and having in mind the fact that applications to purchase public lands must, after being filed, wait not less than 90 days before being approved, and that, after the certificate of approval is issued, the applicant must within 50 days make his first payment of 20 per cent. of the purchase price to the county treasurer, we are of the opinion that the deposit called for by the act of 1889 was intended and required merely as an evidence of good faith rather than as a preliminary part payment of the purchase price of the lands applied for. In other words, we are convinced, by a consideration of the provisions of the statute and the several Code sections under discussion, that the deposit required by the statute was intended to be nothing more than a mere conditional deposit, and that the receipt to be given therefor does not become a part of the purchase price, and cannot be accepted as such, before the application to purchase has been approved.

[2] It would appear, therefore, that, pending the preliminary proceedings prescribed for the purchase of public lands, the state recognizes no absolute right in the applicant, and does not enter into a contract of purchase and sale with him until the payment of the first installment of the purchase price; that is to say, not until the applicant receives a certificate of approval under section 3498 of the Political Code, and has taken such approval to the county treasurer and made the first payment of 20 per cent. of the purchase price, does the state recognize any irrevocable right in the applicant. When this has been done, then the state closes a contract of purchase and sale, and evidences such contract by the issuance of a certificate of purchase, showing the class of lands purchased, etc.

[3] This conclusion might be fully fortified by a more minute analysis of the various provisions of the codified and statutory state land laws hereinbefore summarized; but such analysis is rendered unnecessary, inasmuch as the conclusion here reached is confirmed by a consideration of the many cases in this and in other jurisdictions, where, in defining the purpose and effect of the same or similar land laws, it has been held in effect that the withdrawal of public lands from sale prior to approval of the applications to purchase, and the payment in whole or in part of the purchase price, finally and effectually ended all preliminary proceedings instituted for the purchase of such lands. Hutton v. Frisbie, 37 Cal. 475; People v. Shearer, 30 Cal. 645; Johnson v. Squires, 55 Cal. 103; Eckart v. Campbell, 39 Cal. 256; Yosemite Valley Case, 15 Wall. 77, 21 L. Ed. 82; Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 330, 23 L. Ed. 424; Shiver v. United States, 159 U. S. 491, 16 Sup. Ct. 54, 40 L. Ed. 231; Campbell v. Wade, 132 U. S. 34, 10 Sup. Ct. 9, 33 L. Ed. 240; Gonzales v. French, 164 U. S. 338, 17 Sup. Ct. 102, 41 L. Ed. 548; Graham v. Great Falls Water, etc., Co., 30 Mont. 393, 76 Pac. 808; State v. Work, 63 Tex. 148; People v. Banning, 166 Cal. 635, 138 Pac. 101.

In the early case of Eckart v. Campbell, supra, our Supreme Court had under consideration former provisions of the state land law similar, if not identical, in language and purpose to the Code sections under consideration here, and there the court said:

> "It does not seem to have been the intention of the statute that the state should be considered as having parted with any interest in the land, until she had received the payment of at least the first installment of the purchase money."

And in the comparatively recent case of Messenger v. Kingsbury, 158 Cal. 611, 112 Pac. 65, it was said that:

> "The decisions of this court are clear to the effect that an applicant who has merely filed his affidavit and application to purchase, without paying any part of the purchase price, under statutes essentially similar to the scheme provided by the Political Code for the disposition of public lands, has no such vested right as will prevent a termination of the opportunity to purchase upon a repeal of the law providing for sale."

The reasoning and conclusion reached in the cases cited and quoted proceeded upon the theory that the statutory procedure and conditions provided for initiating the purchase of public lands are purely preliminary to the completed contract of purchase, and that compliance with such procedure and conditions merely conferred upon the applicant the exclusive privilege of becoming the purchaser of the lands applied for upon approval of the application and the payment of the 20 per cent. of the purchase price within 50 days after the issuance of the certificate of location. The scope and effect of the act of 1889 (Stats. 1889, p. 434) do not appear to have been under consideration in the case of Messenger v. Kingsbury, supra, nor has that act, so far as we have been able to ascertain, been elsewhere construed. We are satisfied, however, that the act in question is not fairly susceptible of a construction different from that placed upon it here; therefore we apprehend that the reasoning and the result reached in the case of Messenger v. Kingsbury, supra, and the kindred cases therein cited, would not have been otherwise even if the statute in question had been invoked and considered.

[4] Upon like reasoning the conclusion must follow in the present case that the mere compliance by the petitioners with the preliminary procedure provided for the sale of state lands secured to them nothing more than the privilege of becoming the exclusive purchasers of the lands applied for in the event that the state did not withdraw the said lands from sale before a contract of purchase and sale was completed by the approval of the application and the payment of the first installment of the purchase price.

[5] This brings us more minutely to a consideration of the remedy sought by the petitioners. It will be remembered that the petitioners are seeking to compel the respondent to enter, as filed upon the records of his office, the applications to purchase public lands, which it is alleged should have been so entered at the time they were presented to the respondent for filing some several years ago. It may be conceded that the law in force at the time the applications were presented made it the duty of the respondent to formally enter them of record as filed in his office. The fact remains, however, that he has never performed this duty; and it affirmatively appears, from the allegations of the petition, that, a few days after the applications to purchase had been offered for filing, the lands applied for were withdrawn from sale by the state, and at the same time the surveyor general was expressly prohibited by law from thereafter receiving or filing any applications for the purchase of such lands; and that no action or procedure was instituted to enforce the filing of the petitioners' applications, while it still remained the duty of the surveyor general to do so. Under these circumstances, a writ of mandate will not now issue to compel the respondent to file the petitioners' applications, either as of the present date or as of the date when the applications were originally tendered for filing. This is so because a writ of mandate will not issue to compel the performance of an act which, when performed, would be of no avail to the petitioner for the writ. Kerr v. Superior Court, 130 Cal. 183, 62 Pac. 479; Ellis v. Workman, 144 Cal. 113, 77 Pac. 822; Messenger v. Kingsbury, supra; San Diego v. State, etc., 164 Cal. 41, 127 Pac. 153.

If we are correct in the conclusion hereinbefore expressed, that the state may rightfully withdraw public lands from sale at any time before approval of the application to purchase and the payment of the first installment of the purchase price, and that such withdrawal effectually terminates the preliminary proceedings instituted by the applicant for the purchase of such lands, then it must follow in the presence of the existing law, prohibiting the sale of the lands in question, that it would be a vain and idle act to compel the respondent to perform a one time duty which, when performed would not operate to revive and revest in the petitioners whatever inchoate rights they may have had in the first instance. HOOPER et al. v. KINGSBURY. (Civ. 1367.)

PUBLIC LANDS (§ 144*)—SCHOOL LANDS—APPLICATION TO PURCHASE — WITHDRAWAL FROM SALE.

Where, after applications to purchase school lands within the exterior boundaries of national forest reserves had been filed, nothing further was done to perfect the applicants' right to purchase until after the lands were withdrawn from sale by Acts March 24, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 680), and March 8 and May 1, 1911 (St. 1911, pp. 311, 1408), there was no contract between the state and the applicants, at the time of withdrawal, which would prevent the withdrawal from taking effect.

Devlin, Devlin & Maddux and Charles C. Boynton, all of San Francisco, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Robert W. Harrison and Malcolm C. Glenn, Deputy Attys. Gen., for respondent.

LENNON, P. J. This case in its essential features is practically the same, in so far as the points of law involved are concerned, as the case of Ayers v. Kingsbury (No. 1368) 143 Pac. 85, this day decided. In its facts, the present case differs from that case only in the particular that the applications to purchase public lands were actually filed with the respondent. Those applications, however, were not approved before the withdrawal of the lands from sale. No approval of such applications could have issued prior to the enactment of the statute withdrawing all the lands in question from sale; and therefore, under the theory discussed and developed in the opinion of this court filed in the case of Ayers v. Kingsbury, above mentioned, which is to the effect that the state has power to withdraw lands from sale prior to the approval of the applications to purchase and the payment of the first installment of the purchase price, it follows that the petitioners herein are in no better situation than the petitioners in that case, and that they acquired no irrevocable right to purchase from the state the lands applied for, notwithstanding the payment by them of the filing fee and the deposit of the amount specified in the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 434).

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: RICHARDS, J.; KERRIGAN, J.

WATTERSON et al. v. OWENS RIVER CANAL CO. (Civ. 1471.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. July 29, 1914. Rehearing Denied Aug. 28, 1914. Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 26, 1914.)

1. Principal and Surety (§ 7*)—Obligation of Surety.
That a construction contract was void between the parties because not recorded in accordance with Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, does not exonerate the contractor's surety from liability upon his bond.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 8–12, 14, 16, 18; Dec. Dig. § 7.*]

2. Principal and Surety (§ 100*)—Liability of Surety—Release.
A change in the terms of a construction contract upon which plaintiff was surety, will release plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 162–165; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

3. Principal and Surety (§ 100*)—Discharge of Surety—Changes in Contract—Authority to Make.
Unless shown to be authorized, the agreement by officers of a corporation to changes in a construction contract will not change the contract, so as to discharge the contractor's surety.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 162–165; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

4. Principal and Surety (§ 100*)—Liability of Surety—Release.
A surety upon a written construction contract is not discharged by verbal changes in the contract, unless such changes are executed; Civ. Code, § 1698, declaring that a contract in writing may be altered only by a written instrument or an executed oral agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Surety, Cent. Dig. §§ 162–165; Dec. Dig. § 100.*]

5. Principal and Surety (§ 129*)—Release of Surety—Equitable Estoppel.
Where a surety upon a contractor's bond took over the work which was abandoned by the contractor after some changes in the contract had been made, and without objection completed the contract as changed, demanding and receiving payment as for the original contractor, he is estopped to claim that the changes were outside the original contract or made without his consent.

6. Mechanics' Liens (§ 114*) — Rights of Surety.
When a surety, in pursuance of the terms of his undertaking, assumes the performance of the principal's contract, he becomes necessarily subject to all of his liabilities, and hence a surety, who completed a construction contract, is entitled to no lien for his work, where the contractor was not entitled to one because the contract was not recorded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mechanics' Liens, Cent. Dig. § 149; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

7. Mechanics' Liens (§ 95*)—Right to Lien.
Though the principal contractor was not entitled to a lien because the contract was not recorded as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1183, subcontractors, who performed labor and furnished materials, are entitled to a lien.

Appeal from Superior Court, Inyo County; Wm. D. Dehy, Judge.

Action by T. G. Watterson, consolidated with an action by Charles Powers and another, against the Owens River Canal Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed as to the first-named plaintiff, and affirmed as to the others.

L. C. Hall, of Bishop, and Potter & Potter and Wm. J. Clark, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. P. W. Forbes, of Bishop, S. E. Vermilyea, of Los Angeles, and Ben H. Yandell, of Independence, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. In the superior court the action of the plaintiff Watterson and a separate action of the other plaintiffs, against the same defendant, were consolidated. From a judgment in favor of the plaintiff Watterson and in favor of certain other plaintiffs, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, the defendant appeals.

On December 30, 1908, P. N. Snyder and C. A. Collins entered into a written contract with the Hillside Water Company and the Owens River Canal Company, whereby the contractors agreed to perform the excavation work required by certain specifications, for the purpose of making improvements in a canal belonging to defendant Owens River Canal Company. The contract was dated November 30, 1908, and was delivered on December 30th following. Work was commenced early in December, and the contract was not recorded until February 9, 1909. At the time of the execution of this written contract, the plaintiff T. G. Watterson executed to defendant Owens River Canal Company an undertaking in the penal sum of $5,000, conditioned upon due performance of the contract by the contractors. As Collins does not appear any further in the transactions, we will discuss the case as if Snyder were sole contractor.

The consideration to be paid for this work, as stated in the contract, was $19,000, installments payable monthly on estimates to be made by the engineer. As the contract was not recorded before commencement of the work, the transaction became subject to the provision of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, that such contracts "shall be wholly void, and no recovery shall be had thereon by either party thereto; and, in such case, the labor done and materials furnished by all persons aforesaid, except the contractor, shall be deemed to have been done and furnished at the personal instance of the owner, and they shall have a lien for the value thereof."

The specifications, which are referred to in the contract and attached thereto, contain the following provisions:

> "The work to be done consists of excavating one or both banks of the canal to double its present cross section with a view of doubling the present carrying capacity of the canal. The company's engineers will give levels and grade stakes designating the excavations that are to be made, and the contractor is to pay particular attention to these stakes and make the excavation true to the stakes given. At the discretion of the engineer in charge the excavations may be made on either the upper or lower bank, or both banks of the canal, as the character of ground and material indicates for the most economical and safest excavation. It is also understood and agreed that the said engineer in charge may require changes to be made in the route and line of the canal, particularly where the distance can be shortened, and the engineer in charge may direct such changes; and in settling for the same, allowance shall be made to either party, whether the quantity or quality of the materials removed shall be greater or less or of a different character from the estimates and classifications above referred to and made a part of this contract."

The contractor Snyder took charge of the work and conducted the same personally and by subcontractors for various sections, until February 16, 1909. Disputes arose between him and the engineer, on account of changes in levels as furnished by the engineer, and on account of a change made by directing a certain cut-off which shortened the canal. On January 8th a conference took place between the contractor and the engineer and some officers of the two corporations named in the contract, as to the manner in which the work should be done, and it was understood that Snyder would follow the directions given as to these changes ordered by the engineer. But dissatisfaction continued on both sides, so that Snyder gave up the work on February 16th, and at the same time the plaintiff Watterson took charge of the work in place of Snyder. Watterson continued the work until April 16th, when it was completed.

Watterson claims that the verbal understanding at which the contractor and the said representatives of the owner arrived on January 8th constituted a change in the contract, such as to relieve Watterson from the obligations of his bond, and that, as the contract itself was void, his work from February 16th to April 16th was on an original request of the owner, entitling him to claim his lien under the provisions of section 1183, Code of Civil Procedure, quoted above. The appellant contends that the changes made in the work were only such as were provided for in the specifications; and that the work done by Watterson was done by him by virtue of his relation to the transaction as bondsman for the contractor, and for the purpose of protecting himself from liability on the bond.

There was no formal contract, either written or unwritten, between plaintiff Watterson and the owner, by virtue of which Watterson undertook to complete the work. Mr. L. C. Hall was treasurer, and was a director and also attorney for the Owens River Canal Company. Mr. Watterson's testimony is that on February 9th or 10th Mr. Hall complained to him that Mr. Snyder was not complying with the instructions of the engineer and was not doing the work satisfactorily, and that they had lost confidence in him, and asked Watterson to go ahead and finish the work. On February 15th Watterson told Snyder about this. Snyder said, "All right, go ahead and finish it." Watterson replied, "All right." It was under these circumstances that Watterson took charge of this work and did all that was done by him in completion thereof.

The payments by the defendant amount to $16,000, of which the sum of $10,000 was paid prior to February 16th. All of the payments were delivered to Watterson, who was a creditor of Snyder for supplies furnished, and Watterson's receipts recite that the moneys so received were on account of the Snyder and Collins contract, and were to be used for payment of such accounts as would constitute liens against the canal.

The demand of Watterson in this action is for the sum of $20,189.54, and the decree appealed from is in his favor for the sum of $10,285.71, with interest, and in favor of the other plaintiffs for sums which in the aggregate are a little over $1,000.

The findings of the court state that on the 16th day of February, 1909, the plaintiff Watterson, "at the personal instance and request of said defendant, and by and with the consent and authority of said contractor, P. N. Snyder," took charge of the described work, and completed the same on April 16, 1909.

The court's findings declare that on January 8, 1909, "officers and agents" of the defendant, and P. N. Snyder, "made an oral agreement" whereby the work in question was materially and substantially altered from the manner and conditions specified in the contract of November 30, 1908, and the specifications thereof; that by virtue of said oral agreement the work was made more difficult and expensive than that provided for in said written agreement; that the work performed, from January 8, 1909, until the completion thereof on April 16, 1909, was essentially different from and constituted a material departure from said original terms and conditions; that plaintiff Watterson was not consulted with reference to said oral agreement and said changes and did not assent at any time to said changes in said work, or to any change or departure from the terms and conditions of the original contract.

Finding 4 is as follows:

> "That on the 16th day of February, 1909, a large portion of the said construction, alteration, enlargement, addition to, and repair of said Owens River Canal had been done, performed, and made by said P. N. Snyder, one of said contractors, under said contract of November 30, 1909."

There is no finding that shows how much of the changes in the contemplated work was executed by Snyder, and how much by Watterson, but the finding generally is that these changes were involved in the work done from January 9th to April 16th. Watterson at all times had knowledge of the original contract and specifications. He did not, when he took charge of the work, or at any time, make any protest against doing the work as directed, including these changes. He did not inform the defendant that he was taking up this work independently of the contract, or that he was not assuming the work as a bondsman for a contractor unable or unwilling to perform the obligations of his contract.

[1, 2] Although the contract is void under the Code provisions to which we have referred, yet the matter of changes in the work is material to the questions before us, because the invalidity of the contract did not destroy the liability of Watterson as surety on the bond. Kiessig v. Allspaugh, 91 Cal. 234, 27 Pac. 662; Summerton v. Hanson, 117 Cal. 252, 49 Pac. 135. And if the work provided for by the original contract was changed by the parties thereto without consent of Watterson, he would thereby be released from his liability on the bond. Alcatraz Masonic Hall Ass'n v. U. S. Fidelity & Guaranty Co., 3 Cal. App. 338, 85 Pac. 156; Barrett-Hicks Co. v. Glas, 9 Cal. App. 491, 497, 99 Pac. 856.

[3-5] The conclusion of the court below that the written contract was thus changed by an oral agreement cannot be sustained.

> "A contract in writing may be altered by a contract in writing, or by an executed oral agreement, and not otherwise." Civ. Code, § 1698.

Though it be conceded for the moment that the changes in the work, which have been mentioned, were not such changes as the engineer might order, as provided in the written contract, the objection remains in force that there was not any evidence that the "officers and agents," who are found to have made the oral agreement, were authorized by defendant to make for it a new or amended contract. And, even if they had been so authorized, the conversation of January 8th would not be effective to create changes in the contract until the proposed changes in the work were actually executed. Until thus executed, and in force as contract changes made without the consent of the surety, they could not be sufficient to release him from liability on his bond.

But it further appears that, when the changes in the work were actually made in course of the performance thereof, very large portions of those changes were executed by Watterson himself. This being so, he was necessarily consenting thereto, unless his relations to the transaction, as surety on the bond, had been previously abrogated by reason of the small proportion of changes in the work, which had been executed by Snyder. The evidence all shows that after Watterson had taken charge of the work, and with full knowledge of the facts as they then were, he continued to receive payments as we have before stated, accepting them as payments on the Snyder and Collins contract, and assuring defendant that the money might safely be paid, as defendant had his bond for completion of the contract. He obtained these payments, not merely as compensation earned by Snyder for work done prior to February 16th, but as payments on the contract generally, and represented that he must have them in order that he (Watterson) might be able to complete the work. In view of these facts, it seems clear to us that the plaintiff Watterson cannot successfully maintain that the changes now under consideration were outside the terms of the written contract, or that they were made without his consent.

[6] It is therefore clear also that when

Snyder told Watterson to go ahead and finish the work of this contract, and Watterson consented and proceeded in accordance with that request, he was in the situation of a surety on a contractor's bond, who undertakes to finish the contract work for his principal.

"When a surety, either corporate or individual, in pursuance of the terms of an undertaking, assumes the performance of the principal's contract, such surety, by being subrogated to the rights of the principal thereunder, must necessarily become subject to all of his liabilities." Ausplund v. Ætna Indem. Co., 47 Or. 10, 81 Pac. 577; Hughes v. Gibson, 15 Colo. App. 318, 62 Pac. 1037.

Since Watterson, in completing the work, stood in the place of the contractor, he was not, any more than Snyder could be, a person deemed to be acting "at the personal instance of the owner," as described in the Code of Civil Procedure, § 1183, or entitled to any lien for the value of anything furnished or done by him. His right of recovery, if any, for the value of the labor and materials furnished by him, was merely the right to recover a personal judgment therefor, under like limitations as were binding upon Snyder. As Mr. Watterson succeeded and in that way represented the contractor, it follows that Watterson would be limited in his recovery (as in like circumstances the contractor would have been) by the contract price named in the written contract, after adjustment of all additions and deductions due to changes in the work as it progressed, and also after allowance of the proper credits for payments made by the owner. Laidlaw v. Marye, 133 Cal. 170, 176, 65 Pac. 391; Condon v. Donohue, 160 Cal. 749, 754, 118 Pac. 113. In the trial of this action, however, this plaintiff not only attempted to assert a lien, but has obtained a decree affirming his claim without regard to the limitations above noted.

With respect to the cause of action stated in plaintiff's complaint, his right to recover herein, and to enforce the lien claimed by him, depends primarily upon the allegation and finding that on or about the 16th day of February, 1909, plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement, under which plaintiff was to furnish certain labor and materials, for the purposes named. There is no evidence of any such agreement, unless the fact could be derived from the circumstances to which we have referred. As these circumstances do not support the claim as to the alleged contract, the appeals must be sustained as to him.

[7] Concerning the judgment in favor of plaintiffs Charles Powers and Arthur Powers, appellant urges nothing in favor of its appeal, except the bare proposition that there is a material variance between the claim of lien and the evidence as to the person by whom they were employed. A comparison of the references in appellant's brief, with the record in the transcript, fails to support the claim of appellant as to this matter. The plaintiffs Powers were subcontractors under the contractor Snyder. Being persons who furnished labor and materials to a so-called contractor, whose contract was void as herein shown, these plaintiffs were entitled to their lien for the value of the labor furnished by them.

The judgment and decree in favor of the plaintiff T. G. Watterson, and the order denying defendant's motion for new trial as to plaintiff Watterson, are reversed. The judgment and decree and the motion for new trial, as between the defendant and the plaintiffs Charles Powers and Arthur Powers, are affirmed. The appeals against the decree in favor of the other respondents have been abandoned, and are dismissed.

ALTPETER et al. v. POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. (Civ. 1258.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 29, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Sept. 26, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 876*)—ORDERS APPEALABLE.

A party aggrieved by a judgment or an order must take his appeal from the judgment or order itself if an appeal therefrom is authorized, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 403*)—SETTING ASIDE—SUIT IN EQUITY.

A party aggrieved by a judgment must ordinarily maintain a suit in equity to set it aside for reasons collateral to the questions examined or determined therein, where the time for appeal has passed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. § 764; Dec. Dig. § 403.*]

3. JUDGMENT (§ 135*)—VACATION—MOTION—STATUTE.

Where defendant was not served with process, service being had upon a foreign corporation by the same name, and for that reason did not defend, and was not represented by counsel, defendant is, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, providing that when for any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on defendant, the court may allow the defendant on such terms as may be just, at any time within one year after rendition of judgment, to answer to the merits of the original action, entitled to move to set aside the judgment at any time within the year, notwithstanding an appeal might have been taken.

Appeal from Superior Court, Yolo County; N. A. Hawkins, Judge.

Action by Catherine Altpeter and another against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company. There was a judgment for plaintiffs, and from an order refusing to vacate it defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss. Motion denied.

See, also, 22 Cal. App. 63, 133 Pac. 329.

J S. Spilman, of San Francisco, and L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, for appellant. E. E. Gaddis, of Woodland, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is a motion to dismiss the appeal taken by the defendant from an order refusing to grant a motion to vacate the judgment. The action was by the plaintiffs for damages for the alleged destruction by the defendant of four walnut trees standing and growing immediately in front of the former's premises on Court street, in the city of Woodland. The jury, by whom the cause was tried, returned a verdict in favor of the plaintiffs in the sum of $500, and the court, acting upon the authority of section 3346 of the Civil Code and section 733 of the Code of Civil Procedure, entered judgment for the plaintiffs on said verdict for treble the amount assessed by the jury.

It is important in this proceeding, as will presently be perceived, to know that said judgment was entered on the 11th day of November, 1912, and that it contains, among others, the following recitals:

> "This action came on regularly for trial on the 24th day of September, A. D. 1912. The parties appeared by their attorneys, E. E. Gaddis, Esq., counsel for plaintiffs, and L. T. Hatfield, Esq., for defendant. A jury of 12 persons was regularly impaneled, and sworn to try said action. Witnesses on the part of plaintiffs and defendant were sworn and examined. After hearing the evidence, the arguments of counsel, and instructions of the court, the jury retired to consider of their verdict, and subsequently returned into court with the verdict signed by the foreman, and, being called, answered to their names and say"

—following which is the verdict.

But a clearer understanding of the legal propositions advanced in support of and against the allowance of the present motion may be obtained by a summary statement of the history of this action and its several ramifications.

Two different and distinct proceedings growing out of this case—one an application for a writ of review and the other an appeal from the judgment by a New York corporation of the same name as that of the defendant here—have heretofore been before and decided by this court. See Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 770, 136 Pac. 538, and Altpeter et al. v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., 22 Cal. App. 63, 133 Pac. 329. The opinions in those cases contain a recital of the circumstances under which the case came to this court on the occasions referred to. As the facts constituting a history of the case as they are disclosed by the present record are substantially given in the case of Altpeter v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., supra, we will, as a matter of convenience, follow said opinion in some measure in stating said facts here.

> "It appears that there are two separate and distinct corporations named and known as 'Postal Telegraph-Cable Company,' one of which was organized and is existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of New York and the other organized and existing under and by virtue of the laws of the state of California. The record discloses that the corporation originally sued by the plaintiffs was the New York corporation, the complaint alleging that the defendant, Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, was a corporation organized, existing, and doing business under and by authority of the laws of the state of New York. When the trial of the case was proceeded with, it was, in the outset thereof, discovered that, if the plaintiffs suffered the damage as set out in the complaint, such damage was caused by the California corporation named and known as Postal Telegraph-Cable Company and not by the New York corporation of that name, whereupon counsel for the plaintiffs applied to the court for leave to amend the complaint so as to substitute the California corporation for the New York corporation as party defendant. After an extended discussion between counsel, in the course of which the attorney for the appellant declared that the two corporations were distinct entities, and that he was in court for the sole purpose of representing the New York corporation and that the California corporation was without a legal adviser or representative in the action, the court allowed the amendment. Although interposing an objection to the allowance of the amendment on the ground that the court was without jurisdiction to do so, and, although reserving an exception to the order of the court permitting the amendment, counsel for the appellant, after the order granting the plaintiffs leave to amend was made and entered, retired from further participation in the trial of the action, declaring that, 'if the California corporation is the defendant in this case, we have no appearance for it and no authority to appear.' The trial of the cause was thereupon proceeded with in the absence of a legal representative of the defendant, with the result as hitherto stated."

The defendant (that is, the California corporation), shortly after the trial of the action, petitioned this court for a writ of certiorari for the purpose of annulling and setting aside all the proceedings had in the action, because, as was the claim, they were coram non judice and void. The specific ground upon which the application for said writ was based was that the substituted defendant had never been served with summons, that it, consequently, had no notice of the institution and pendency of the action, and that, therefore, the court had not acquired jurisdiction of the person of said defendant. On March 13, 1913, this court handed down its decision on said application, denying the writ on the ground that the petitioner was afforded a remedy in the ordinary course of law—that is, by appeal. A rehearing was granted by this court in said proceeding and, on the 24th day of September, a decision was rendered and an opinion filed therein, affirming the views and the conclusion declared in the former opinion. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co. v. Superior Court, 22 Cal. App. 770, 136 Pac. 538, supra.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On January 2, 1913, and while the proceeding on the writ above mentioned was still pending before this court, the New York corporation (the original defendant in the action) filed in this court its record on appeal from the judgment in said action. A motion was made by the plaintiffs to dismiss said appeal on the ground that the said corporation, having been, by the order granting the plaintiffs leave to amend their complaint, supplanted as party defendant to the action by the California corporation and was thereby altogether eliminated from the case, was not a "party aggrieved," within the contemplation of section 938 of the Code of Civil Procedure. This point was sustained and the motion to dismiss the appeal granted in an opinion handed down by and filed in this court on the 9th day of May, 1913. Catherine Altpeter et al. v. Postal Telegraph-Cable Co., 22 Cal. App. 63, 133 Pac. 329.

On the 24th day of October, 1912—almost six months after the time within which it might have appealed from the judgment had passed (section 939, Code Civ. Proc.)—the defendant served and filed a notice of motion to vacate the judgment on the ground that summons in said action had never been served on it, and that therefore the court had never acquired jurisdiction of the person of said defendant. The notice further states as one of the grounds upon which the defendant claims to be entitled to be relieved from the effect of the judgment through said motion that "said judgment was rendered against this defendant by reason of its mistake, surprise, and excusable neglect." Said motion was supported by affidavits, accompanied by a proposed answer to the complaint. The court denied the motion and it is the appeal from the order denying said motion that the plaintiffs now move to dismiss.

The affidavits filed and used to support the motion are not controverted—that is, the record does not disclose a counter showing upon the facts set out in said affidavits, and therefore the verity of the facts so set forth stands admitted. These affidavits are by the president and general superintendent, the vice president and superintendent, the secretary and treasurer, and L. T. Hatfield, appearing on this appeal as one of the attorneys of the defendant. Each of the above-named officers of the defendant deposes that he was not served with summons or otherwise notified of the institution and pendency of this action. Mr. Blake, the president and general superintendent of the defendant, further deposes that, during all the times mentioned in his affidavit, he was the only person or officer of the defendant authorized to employ attorneys for said corporation; that he never at any time employed, retained, or instructed Mr. Hatfield to represent this defendant in this action until after the return of the verdict by the jury at the trial of said action; "that, after the trial of said action, and after receiving notice of the result of said trial, affiant employed J. S. Spilman, Esq., as attorney for said defendant, and L. T. Hatfield, Esq., as counsel; that said Spilman and said Hatfield were employed by affiant for the said defendant for the purpose of procuring relief from such judgment by having the same annulled or vacated or set aside by such proceedings as they might be advised to be proper in the premises." Blake further declares that Hearn and Elberg, respectively the vice president and superintendent and the secretary and treasurer of the defendant, "are the only persons holding statutory offices of said corporation in the state of California," and that Jeremiah K. Beede, chief operator of the defendant at and in charge of its telegraph station at the city of Sacramento, and upon whom service of summons was made in this action as originally commenced against the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, of New York, has never at any time had any power or authority to transact any other business for or on behalf of the defendant than that involving the duties of chief operator as above explained; that said Beede has at no time been authorized or empowered to enter into any contracts or agreements for said defendant, or to bind it in any manner in any transactions except such as necessarily came within the scope of his duties as chief operator, "or to accept service of process against it, or to appear for it in any court, or elsewhere, or otherwise, or at all."

In his affidavit, Mr. Hatfield corroborates Blake as to his (Hatfield's) connection with the defendant and this action, declaring that he was never at any time employed or retained by the defendant or any of its officers to appear as attorney for said defendant in this action until after the trial thereof and the rendition of the verdict and judgment therein; that, after the trial of said action, he was employed by the defendant to take such legal steps as he might conceive to be necessary and appropriate to obtain for the defendant relief from the judgment entered against it in this action. He further deposes:

> "That the recitals in the judgment eventually entered in said cause, wherein it is set forth that affiant appeared as counsel for any defendant or in any manner whatever took part in said trial on behalf of defendant, are wholly false, as this affiant did not at any time take any part in the trial of said cause on any account whatever on behalf of said California corporation, or otherwise or at all, except in the matter of filing an answer by and on behalf of the New York corporation, and in aiding in impaneling a jury for the trial of the cause against said New York corporation, but did not offer any evidence on the merits of said cause at any time, but left the courtroom when the amendment to the complaint was allowed, as fully shown in the stenographic report of said trial, to which stenographic report reference is hereby made as part hereof."

The answer proposed and tendered by the defendant is verified and, in appropriate language, denies that the defendant caused the injury complained of in the complaint. The reporter's transcript of the proceedings on the motion of the plaintiffs for leave to amend the complaint by substituting the California corporation for the New York corporation as defendant in the action was offered and admitted in evidence. The said affidavits, together with the stenographer's transcript of the proceedings on the plaintiffs' motion for leave to amend their complaint as above indicated, are contained in and authenticated by a bill of exceptions, and constituted all the proceedings had on the motion by the defendant to vacate the judgment.

[1-4] The contention of the plaintiffs is that the determination of the question submitted here must be governed entirely by an inspection of the judgment roll and not by a consideration of the affidavits and other evidence disclosing matters extrinsic to the judgment; that the only remedy which the defendant now has left to it for securing relief from the effect of the judgment is by a suit in equity, the time limited for an appeal from said judgment having expired at the time of the institution of the proceeding on the motion to vacate it. This position is sustained, it is claimed, by the proposition that, except in certain exceptional instances, within which, it is asserted, this case does not fall, a motion to vacate a judgment will not lie where, as was true here, the right of appeal from such judgment is available to the party against whom the judgment has passed. Section 939, Code Civ. Proc., supra. It is, of course, plainly manifest that, if such a motion cannot be entertained—that is, if an appeal from the judgment is the exclusive remedy—under the circumstances of this case, then an order denying such motion is not appealable, and in that view of the case before us the motion to dismiss the appeal would have to be granted, since, obviously, an order disallowing a motion which the court has no legal authority to entertain cannot be held to be among the orders from which the Code provides that appeals may be taken.

The position of the defendant is, however, that, inasmuch as it was not served with summons, either personally or constructively, and therefore was not afforded an opportunity to file an answer or otherwise appear in the action, it was authorized by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure to interpose an answer to the merits of the action, and that necessarily, in order to answer, it was entitled to have the judgment first vacated on motion, on a showing that, because of not having been legally notified of the commencement of the action, it had not answered to the merits thereof or otherwise appeared therein, said motion being made within one year after the rendition of the judgment.

We are of the opinion that the circumstances of this case show that the motion to set aside the judgment constituted one of the methods open to the defendant to obtain relief, if any it is entitled to, from the effect of said judgment, and are therefore further of the opinion that the motion was one which was proper to be made under the circumstances, and which the court was consequently legally authorized to entertain, and that the order denying it is appealable. In reaching this conclusion, we have been governed solely, so far as the evidence is concerned, by the facts set forth in the affidavits filed and used by the defendant in support of the motion to vacate the judgment and the proceedings on the application for leave to amend the complaint so far only as they corroborate the said affidavits upon the proposition of fact in impeachment of the recitals of the judgment to the effect that, at the trial, the defendant was represented by counsel. Thus we have limited the consideration of the proceedings leading to the amendment of the complaint, as disclosed by the bill of exceptions, because we desire and intend to refrain from passing upon the main proposition in this case, to wit, whether the act of substituting the defendant for the New York corporation, the original defendant in the action, as the party defendant thereto, although allowed under the guise of an amendment to the complaint, in effect amounted to the institution of a new action, or, at all events, one in which service of summons was necessary to give the court jurisdiction of the person of the substituted defendant. We prefer that this question be left open, to be considered and determined upon a consideration of the appeal upon its merits.

The general rule is, of course, that the party aggrieved by a judgment or an order must take his appeal from such judgment or order itself, if an appeal therefrom is authorized by statute, and not from a subsequent order refusing to set it aside. This rule is clearly explained and aptly illustrated by Judge Hayne, in his work on New Trial and Appeal (2d Ed.) § 199, and the many cases therein referred to and examined.

It is also the general rule that the aggrieved party to a judgment must appeal to equity in the form of an independent suit for that purpose, where, the time within which he might have appealed therefrom having passed, he desires to set it aside for reasons extrinsic or collateral to the questions examined and determined in the action. Pico v. Cohn, 91 Cal. 132, 25 Pac. 970, 27 Pac. 537, 13 L. R. A. 336, 25 Am. St. Rep. 159; French v. Phelps, 20 Cal. App. 101, 111, 128 Pac. 772, and cases therein cited. But there are exceptions to said rules. Title Ins. & Trust

Co. v. Calif., etc., Co., 159 Cal. 488, 114 Pac. 838; People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 675, 77 Pac. 651. The Legislature has seen fit to make provision for the application of some of these exceptions in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and, as stated, it is claimed by the defendant that the circumstances of this case bring it within the one-year clause of said section.

So much of said section as is important in the solution of the problem submitted by the motion now under consideration reads as follows:

> "When from any cause the summons in an action has not been personally served on the defendant, the court may allow, on such terms as may be just, such defendant or his legal representative, at any time within one year after the rendition of any judgment in such action, to answer to the merits of the original action."

This provision necessarily presupposes the right in the party to the action upon whom personal service of summons has not been had to have the judgment set aside preliminarily to the filing of the answer, for it would be absurd to say that a party defendant might, under the circumstances contemplated by that provision of the section, file his answer within the time specified, and so join the plaintiff on issues of fact and proceed with the trial of such issues while there still exists a judgment against such party.

The question here, then, is: Do the facts and circumstances of this case bring it within any of the exceptions of the general rules above stated? Or, in other words, are the facts such as legally to entitle the defendant to invoke the provision of section 473, above quoted, to obtain relief from the judgment? We can justly perceive none but an affirmative reply to that question.

The above quoted provision of section 473 was intended to mean something. It cannot be treated as a provision having no substantial or vital purpose in its enactment. The section plainly says that where, from any cause, a defendant has not been personally served with summons, he may, within a year after the rendition of judgment, answer to the merits of the action. That in such case the defendant is not only entitled, but compelled, to show that he has not been personally served with summons is an obvious proposition. The section does not, it is quite manifest, contemplate a new or an independent suit in equity to set aside the judgment in order to enable him to answer to the merits. It was unquestionably intended as a distinct remedy from and cumulative to that which may be had in a court of equity to annul a judgment, the time for appealing from which has passed. It does not, perhaps, always involve precisely a collateral attack upon a judgment, for under said provision the judgment may be set aside upon matters which are not strictly collateral thereto, or which presumptively are included in the adjudication. But it is nevertheless an indirect attack. The provision undoubtedly means, as obviously does the preceding language of the section providing for the securing of relief in certain instances within six months after the act from the effect of which relief is desired has been done, that the relief so sought may be granted in a summary proceeding, as by motion on affidavits. This proposition is sustained by all the authorities, notably People v. Davis, 143 Cal. 675, 77 Pac. 651, where it is said:

> "It is well settled that a court has no power to set aside or vacate on motion a judgment not void upon its face, unless the motion is made within a reasonable time, and it is definitely determined that such time will not extend beyond the limit fixed by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which in no case exceeds one year. * * * The effect of these well-settled rules is, that unless the invalidity of the judgment is apparent from an inspection of the judgment roll, the court rendering it has no power, in the absence of application made within the time specified in section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to make any order vacating or setting aside such judgment, and the sole remedy of the aggrieved party, who may not, in fact, have been served, is to be found in a new action, on the equity side of the court. See Eichhoff v. Eichhoff, 107 Cal. 42 [40 Pac. 24, 48 Am. St. Rep. 110]; People v. Temple, 103 Cal. 447 [37 Pac. 414]."

While the judgment here appears upon its face to be valid, the undisputed facts developed upon the motion to vacate it show: That the defendant was not served with summons, either personally or constructively; that it had no opportunity to answer to the merits of the action; that a trial was had in its absence and without its having been represented thereat by counsel or otherwise and that the judgment here complained of was, under those circumstances, entered against it; that the motion to vacate said judgment was filed and made within one year after the rendition of the same; that, with said motion, the defendant proposed and tendered an answer to the complaint, or "to the merits of the action."

We can conceive of no circumstances more strongly calling for the application of the one-year clause of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure than those shown by the affidavits filed on the motion to set aside the judgment here. Indeed, we may go further and say that if this is not a case in which a motion to vacate a judgment valid on its face will lie, under the terms of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, then it would be difficult to form a conception of circumstances which will justify the application of the one-year clause of said section. That the defendant was, by reason of the circumstances under which the judgment was rendered against him in this action, deprived of an opportunity to make a bill of exceptions or other record which would present whatever meritorious grounds of objection which it might have to said judgment is plainly manifest. Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. Calif., etc., Co., 159 Cal. 488, 114 Pac. 838. At the trial of the action upon its merits, the defendant, not being present or represented, had no opportunity to register objections to any of the proceedings.

[5] But, says counsel for the plaintiffs, the code provision resorted to by the defendant for relief from the judgment applies to cases only where the service is constructive and judgment is, upon such service, taken by default, and in support of that proposition he cites section 199 of Hayne on New Trial & Appeal, and the cases referred to therein. We do not so understand the author of that learned treatise on the appellate practice, nor the decisions cited therein. It is true that Judge Hayne says (page 1033) that:

> "It seems that there are cases not strictly ex parte which constitute exceptions to the rule. Of these are to be noted cases where the service was constructive, and the judgment rendered was a judgment in default. Of such class of cases was De La Montanya v. De La Montanya, 112 Cal. 101, 44 Pac. 345, 32 L. R. A. 82, 53 Am. St. Rep. 165."

But we do not understand that thus it was intended to say, or that the learned author does say, that the application of the exception is confined to cases where constructive service has been had and a default judgment thereupon entered. The reason for applying the exception to such cases is undoubtedly because the defendant, in point of fact, has possibly not received notice of the action, and therefore had no opportunity to appear, defend, and so prepare a record. The same reason is no less forceful and applicable in a case where, as here, the defendant has not been served at all, and, so far as such defendant is concerned, a trial had without issue joined and without his presence thereat either in person or by a representative. A judgment entered under such circumstances cannot be said to be impressed with qualities superior to those of a default judgment entered on a constructive service of summons. Indeed, the judgment here, according to the evidence adduced at the hearing of the motion to vacate it, is no less a default judgment than one in a divorce action, in which testimony must be taken to support the allegations of the complaint even though, having been served with summons, the defendant makes no appearance. In truth the case here is much stronger in support of the right of the defendant to seek relief under section 473 than it would be in support of the application of a defendant upon whom service by publication has been regularly had for similar relief from a default judgment, for, in this case, as seen, there was no service of summons at all.

We are unable to discern any just reason for holding that the defendant is not entitled to invoke the remedy provided by section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure for setting aside the judgment obtained against it under the peculiar circumstances of the case as disclosed by this record.

The motion to dismiss this appeal is accordingly denied.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 553*) — Record — Authentication.

On appeal from an order denying motions to recall and quash an execution, and for an injunction restraining proceedings under such execution, a typewritten copy of affidavits and documents certified by the clerk to be true copies of the original documents on file in his office was not properly authenticated to be considered in lieu of a bill of exceptions, since, when a bill of exceptions is not brought up, the record must be authenticated as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, which provides that the party appealing may request that a transcript of the testimony, etc., be made up and prepared; that when so prepared and filed the clerk shall notify the attorneys that it will be presented to the judge for his approval; and that at the time specified in the notice the judge shall examine it and see that it is a full, true, and fair transcript, and shall thereupon certify to its truth and correctness.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by the Columbia Crude Oil Company against W. S. Deyo. From orders denying motions to recall and quash an execution, and for an injunction restraining proceedings under the execution, defendant appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Motion granted.

A. C. Routhe, of Alhambra, for appellant. Rupert B. Turnbull, of Pasadena, and Flint, Gray & Barker, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Motion to dismiss appeal from: First, an order of the trial court denying defendant's motion to recall and quash an execution; and, second, an order denying defendant's application for an injunction directed to the sheriff, restraining him from further proceedings under the execution so issued upon a judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff in the action.

[1, 2] The motion is made upon the ground of the insufficiency of the record presented in support of the appeal. In lieu of a bill of exceptions settled by the court and exhibiting the alleged errors of the trial court in the proceedings, appellant has incorporated in a typewritten copy thereof certain affidavits, telegrams, and letters, certified by the clerk to be true copies of such original documents on file in his office. It does not appear that these documents were presented to the court, or considered upon the hearing of the motions so by the court denied. Nor, assuming they were so offered and received, is there anything in the record showing that other evidence was not offered and considered. When a bill of exceptions is not adopted as a means for presenting the record on an appeal from such orders as those here involved, the party appealing must, in having the record authenticated, comply with the provisions of section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, under which he must request a transcript of the evidence offered or received, to be settled and signed by the judge, after notice as therein provided. No attempt, apparently, was made to follow the provisions of the statute in having the record so authenticated.

So far as shown by the record, no evidence was offered or received in support of the motions on which the orders of denial were made, and the purported record is not authenticated in the manner required by law, without which this court cannot consider the same.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is granted.

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 676*)—PRESENTATION FOR REVIEW—DISALLOWANCE OF INTERVENTION—BILL OF EXCEPTIONS—AFFIRMANCE.

Where, on appeal from an order disallowing an application for leave to intervene, the bill of exceptions fails to disclose the pleadings of the original parties, and therefore it cannot be determined whether the proposed intervention appertains to the pending cause of action, whether the applicant is interested in the subject-matter of the litigation within Code Civ. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by W. S. Britt against the East Side Hardware Company, a corporation. From an order and judgment disallowing the application of C. E. Kinard to intervene, he appeals. Affirmed.

C. E. Kinard, of Oakland, in pro. per. Chas. A. Beardsley and J. A. Kennedy, both of Oakland, for respondent Britt. Howard K. James, of Alameda, for respondent East Side Hardware Co.

HART, J. This is an appeal from an order and judgment dissallowing the application of the appellant for leave to intervene in this action.

[1] At the outset, the plaintiff makes the point that there is here no record upon which this court can determine whether the court below erred by making the order and entering the judgment appealed from, and we think this position must be sustained. The transcript contains the pleadings of the original parties, a temporary injunction granted by the court against the defendant upon the filing of the complaint and the notice of appeal. It also contains a bill of exceptions as proposed by the appellant and settled by the court on the proceeding involving the proposed intervention. The said bill embodies the following documents and none other: The proposed complaint in intervention, a proposed answer to the plaintiff's complaint, the written agreement upon which plaintiff's action is founded, and the order dissallowing the application for leave to intervene. The transcript purports to be authenticated by the certificate of the clerk of the court, which reads, in part:

> "That the foregoing is a true transcript of the judgment roll in the above entitled cause, now on file in my office, together with other proceedings, papers, and minutes of the said superior court herein contained."

While an order disallowing an intervention amounts in legal effect to a final judgment as to the proposed intervener (Dollenmayer v. Pryor, 150 Cal. 1, 87 Pac. 616), it seems to be settled that, where an appeal is taken from such order, the record thereon must be authenticated by a bill of exceptions containing all the papers and documents used in that particular proceeding, and upon which the trial court acted in making the order. This conclusion is in accord with rule 29 (119 Pac. xiv) of the Supreme Court, which provides:

> "In all cases of appeal from the orders of the superior courts, the papers and evidence used or taken on the hearing of the motion must be authenticated by incorporating the same in a bill of exceptions, except where another mode of authentication is provided by law."

[2, 3] We know of no other mode provided by law for authenticating the record on a motion such as the one resulting in the order from which this appeal has been taken than by a bill of exceptions. It can hardly be said that there is, within the contemplation of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure, a judgment roll in a proceeding on a motion for leave to intervene in an action, where the motion has been denied; hence the certificate of the clerk of the trial court, certifying that "the foregoing is a true copy of the transcript of the judgment roll in the above-entitled cause" is not an authentication of the record on the motion. There is, in strictness, no judgment roll until the action has been tried and a decision therein reached on the merits. We cannot therefore conceive how it could be held that the certificate of the clerk to a record of the nature of the one before us can amount to anything, in so far as it purports to be evidence of the authenticity of such record. As stated, the only proper mode for authenticating a record on an appealable order is by a bill of exceptions, as required by rule 29 (119 Pac. xiv) of the Supreme Court, supra.

It follows that all that we are authorized to review on this appeal are the papers and documents embraced in and authenticated by the bill of exceptions which is printed in the transcript. In other words, we cannot, in the consideration of this appeal, examine the pleadings of the original parties or any other documents contained in the transcript that are not embodied in the bill of exceptions. Thus confined in our consideration of the record before us, we cannot say that the court below erred in refusing to permit the appellant to intervene in this action.

[4] The proposed complaint in intervention alleges that the defendant is a corporation, and that the appellant is a stockholder therein, and as such "has a material interest in the subject-matter in litigation in the above entitled cause"; that the transaction giving rise to this action was the direct result of a fraudulent scheme jointly conceived and concocted by the plaintiff and certain members of the board of directors of the defendant for the purpose of turning over to the plaintiff, without an adequate or any consideration, the property of the defendant, in fraud of the rights of the appellant and other stockholders in the latter; that, to accomplish that end, an alleged written agreement was entered into between the plaintiff and the defendant, whereby all the property of the latter would be transferred to the plaintiff; that said agreement, not having been consented to by the stockholders of the corporation holding of record at least two-thirds of the issued capital stock of said corporation (section 361a, Civ. Code), is void and cannot therefore be enforced against said defendant. The proposed complaint in intervention further declares that the answer of the defendant to the plaintiff's complaint admits the validity of said agreement, and fails to set up the facts disclosing the fraudulent character of the transaction upon which this action is founded, and so fails to show that the plaintiff and the defendant and the latter's board of directors are parties to said fraudulent transaction; that the appellant has frequently requested the defendant and its attorneys of record in this action to amend the defendant's answer to the plaintiff's complaint by setting up therein the alleged fraud referred to, but that the defendant and its attorneys have failed and refused so to amend said answer.

The record does not reveal the reason or reasons which moved the court below in its course on the appellant's motion. But, whatever might have been the grounds upon which the said motion was denied, we must assume, in the absence of an affirmative showing to the contrary, that the action of the court in disposing of it was legally justified. In other words, every presumption in support of the order must be indulged, it not appearing from the face of the record that the court erred in making it, and we must presume, therefore, that the appellant, on his motion, submitted to the court no legal ground or reason for the intervention sought for by him.

[5] In the absence from the bill of exceptions of the pleadings of the original parties, it is manifestly impossible for this court to determine whether the proposed intervention, as indicated by the pleadings therein tendered by the appellant, appertains to the same transaction or the alleged cause of action upon which this action is founded. Nor can it be told whether the appellant is interested in the subject-matter of the litigation and entitled to intervene. Section 387, Code Civ. Proc. And even if, by any stretch of the imagination, we were enabled to infer from the averments of the appellant's pleadings that his proposed intervention related and was pertinent to the cause of action declared upon in the plaintiff's complaint, and that he is an interested party within the purview of section 387, supra, we are not informed by the record whether he, in his said complaint, has presented any different or further facts than those set up in the defendant's answer. In other words, for all that we can know from the record as it appears before us, the answer of the defendant may contain all the facts which are pleaded in the proposed pleadings of the appellant, including the charge therein made that the transaction upon which this action is founded originated in a fraudulent scheme hatched by the plaintiff and certain members of the board of directors of the defendant for the purpose of effecting a transfer of the property of the defendant to the plaintiff, in fraud of the rights of the other stockholders of the latter.

At all events, under the record as it is presented here, it is plain that there is no other course open to us but to uphold the order appealed from, and the same is accordingly affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

The fact that the professional prostitute took the prosecutrix with the intention of delivering her from accused does not change the offense and render accused not guilty.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Joaquin County; J. A. Plummer, Judge.

Gus Petros was convicted of an attempt to pander, and from an order granting a new trial, the People appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People. Stephen N. Blewett, of Stockton, for respondent.

HART, J. The defendant was accused by information of the crime of pandering, as defined by an act of the Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 9), and upon being tried on said information was convicted of the crime of an attempt to commit the crime therein charged. Section 1159, Pen. Code. In due time, the defendant moved for a new trial on the following grounds: "(1) * * * (2) * * * (3) That the verdict is contrary to law. (4) That the verdict is contrary to the evidence." The court made an order granting said motion "upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict." This appeal is prosecuted by the people from said order.

The statute upon which the information is founded reads as follows:

> "Section 1. Any person who shall procure a female inmate for a house of prostitution, or who, by promises, threats, violence, or by any device or scheme, shall cause, induce, persuade a female person to become an inmate of a house of prostitution, or shall procure for a female person a place as inmate in a house of prostitution or as an inmate of any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed within this state, or any person who shall, by promises, threats, violence or by any device or scheme, cause, induce, persuade or encourage an inmate of a house of prostitution or any other place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed to remain therein as such inmate, or any person who shall, by fraud or artifice, or by duress of person or goods, or by abuse of any position of confidence or authority, procure any female person to become an inmate of a house of ill fame, or to enter any place in which prostitution is encouraged or allowed within this state, or to come into this state or leave this state for the purpose of prostitution, or who shall receive or give, or agree to receive or give, any money or thing of value for procuring, or attempting to procure, any female person to become an inmate of a house of ill fame within this state, or to come into this state or leave this state for the purpose of prostitution, shall be guilty of a felony, to wit: pandering, and upon conviction for an offense under this act shall be punished by imprisonment in the state prison for a period of not less than one year nor more than ten years."

In its charge to the jury, the court declared that "a verdict of guilty of pandering would be unwarranted" under the evidence, but instructed that it was within the legal province of the jury, under the evidence, to find the accused guilty of the crime of an attempt to commit the crime of pandering, if they were convinced by the evidence beyond a reasonable doubt that such an attempt had been made.

Embodied in the brief of counsel for the respondent is the opinion of the trial court, rendered at the time of the granting of the motion, and which sets forth at considerable length the reasons impelling the conclusion of said court that the verdict was not justified or sustained by the evidence. From said opinion it appears that the court is of the view that, although not questioning its verity, the evidence was insufficient, as a matter of law, to uphold a verdict of guilty of the crime of an attempt to commit the crime of pandering, and it further appears therefrom that it was solely upon that view of the evidence that the new trial was granted. Doubtless influenced to a great extent by a consideration of said opinion and the views therein expressed, the Attorney General devotes his brief entirely to a discussion of the question whether, as a matter of law, an attempt to commit the crime of pandering is shown by the evidence, and, concluding that the trial court has thus betrayed a misapprehension of the scope and effect of the evidence adduced before the jury, insists upon a reversal of the order.

[1] But, obviously, the opinion of the trial court setting out the reasons leading it to make the order from which this appeal is taken is no part of the record, and cannot therefore be considered in reviewing this record. We must be governed entirely by the order itself and not by the reasons of the trial court for making it. It will be noted that the order is general in its terms, in so far as is concerned the specific ground upon which it is based, and does not specify any particular reason leading to the making of it.

[2] The rule is thoroughly settled that:

> "The granting or denying a new trial on the ground that the evidence is insufficient to justify the verdict, where there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, rests so fully in the discretion of the trial court that its action is conclusive upon this court, unless it appears that there has been an abuse of such discretion." Domico v. Casassa, 101 Cal. 413, 35 Pac. 1024; Warner v. Thomas, etc., Works, 105 Cal. 411, 38 Pac. 960; Eidinger v. Sigwart, 13 Cal. App. 667, 676, 110 Pac. 521, 524, and cases therein cited.
> "Indeed, it has repeatedly been said in the cases that the action of a trial court in granting a new trial upon the ground of the insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision 'is so far a matter within its discretion that, if there is any appreciable conflict in the evidence it is not open to review.'" Newman v. Overland Pac. Ry. Co., 132 Cal. 74, 64 Pac. 110; Otten v. Spreckels, 141 Pac. 224.

In this case there appears to be a conflict in the evidence upon the vital question here whether the defendant committed any overt act in furtherance of what seems to have been a well-established intention in him to commit the crime charged.

While a trial court will not be allowed to trespass upon the functions of the jury, it is nevertheless true that it is invested with a supervisory control over a trial before a jury, and is legally authorized to grant a new trial where it entertains a well-founded opinion, or one which appears to be sufficiently well-founded to preclude a reviewing court from declaring it not to be, that the result reached by the jury is not justified by the evidence. And, in determining this question upon a motion for a new trial, the trial court may, of course, pass upon the probative value of the testimony submitted in proof of the charge against the accused. In other words, such court may consider, examine, and scrutinize the testimony by the aid of those tests by which the jury are required to measure the worth and weight of the proofs adduced in substantiation of the charge, and if it thus reaches the conclusion that the jury, to reach its conclusion, must have accorded to such testimony undue weight and credit—that is to say, if it be persuaded by a just and fair consideration of the testimony that it is insufficient to establish guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the jury formed an erroneous judgment on the probative power of the evidence—and, accordingly, in the exercise of the discretion committed to it as to such matters, grants a new trial, the order granting the motion must then be held to stand free from disturbance by a court of review.

For aught that may be ascertained from an examination of the record now under review, the trial court might have concluded that, although the testimony presented by the people on its face appeared to disclose the guilt of the accused and, if believable, was sufficient to support the verdict returned the witnesses giving such testimony had so given it as to convince it that they were not telling the truth, and that the jury, in according to the witnesses and their testimony the credit and the weight essential to the support of the conclusion that the defendant was guilty of the crime of which he was convicted, were influenced either by a misconception of the true worth or real evidentiary value of such testimony or by passion or prejudice, superinduced, perhaps, by the sentiment generally prevailing throughout the country against such acts as constitute the foundation of the charge preferred against the defendant. But, whatever might have been the specific reasons persuading the trial court to grant the motion on the ground that the evidence does not justify the verdict, this court is in no position to declare that the action of the court in that regard involved an abuse of the discretion confided to trial courts in disposing of motions for new trials.

[3-5] As before stated, however, the opinion of the learned trial judge appears in the brief of counsel for the defendant as a part of the argument advanced by the latter in support of the order appealed from, and, since it thus appears that it is his opinion that the facts brought to light by the evidence, assuming said evidence is credible and believable, do not bring the acts of the defendant as thereby disclosed within the condemnation of the statute under which he was prosecuted, and, in view of a probable retrial of the case, it is thought to be proper to give herein our conception of the legal effect of said evidence—that is, whether it can fairly and reasonably be said to show an attempt to commit the crime charged.

The facts are: The prosecuting witness, Bessie Edwards, first met the defendant early in the month of February, 1914, in the city of San Francisco. She was at that time just approaching her 19th birthday, and was employed as a domestic in the city of Oakland. The defendant proposed to her that she accompany him to the city of Stockton, where, he said, he would be able to secure a position for her as a waitress in a restaurant, at which nothing but "soft drinks and black coffee" were served with the meals. The prosecutrix assented to the proposition and, on the 2d day of February, 1914, went to the city of Stockton in company with the defendant. The defendant took her to a room in a rooming house situated near one of the railroad depots in said city, and there they remained together, occupying the same bed that night. The following day he secured a room in the Dale Hotel, where he registered himself and the young woman as husband and wife. They occupied the room together up to the time of the defendant's arrest, or for a period of five or six days. On two different occasions during this period of time the defendant brought men to the room, introduced them to the prosecutrix, and gave her to understand that the purpose of their visits was to have sexual relations with her, and for which each would pay her $1.50. Such relations she had with the men referred to, and the money so obtained by her she turned over to the defendant in obedience to his demand for it. Prior to having these relations with other men, the defendant, so the prosecutrix said, would arise from bed at a very early hour in the morning, would leave the room, and seldom return until late in the day, leaving her alone and without food or means to procure a substantial meal. He would, on his return in the evening, bring her a sandwich. During that time she went out on the streets on but two occasions—on one for the purpose of procuring a few doughnuts at a nearby bakery, and on the other to purchase a cheap waist at a store situated within a few blocks of the Dale. It further was made to appear that, while the couple were rooming at the Dale, he told her of the "Bull Pen," a place in the city of Stockton, to which those houses of prostitution which are each occupied by a single prostitute are confined, and said to her that he would have to "break her in," the inference from that statement being that he intended or desired to initiate her into the business of a prostitute.

On the Saturday evening of the week during which the couple occupied the room in said hotel, the defendant and prosecutrix went to the Union Restaurant for dinner. There they met a prostitute, known as Teddie Smith, and a male friend of the latter. The defendant introduced the prosecutrix to the Smith woman and her friend, and all four ate their meals at the same table. The defendant gave the prosecutrix some beer, but she drank very little of it, saying that she did not like it. When, however, she would drink a small amount of it, the defendant would immediately fill her glass with more beer. Finishing their meals, the Smith woman remarked that it was time for her to return to her "crib" (a term used to designate a place of prostitution of one or two rooms, and occupied by but one female), whereupon the defendant asked her to take the prosecutrix with her, saying, "I wish you would get her to work to-night, because I have the last dollar in my pocket." Miss Smith then inquired whether the girl had ever "worked" in a "crib," and the defendant immediately replied that she had "worked" in a "parlor house." "I thought she looked green," continued Miss Smith, "and I says, 'How old are you?' and he [defendant] said 'Twenty-three.'" The Smith woman then said that she would take the prosecutrix with her to the "crib," and thereupon the two women left the restaurant together and the two men departed in another direction. Miss Smith continued:

> "Well, I knew she couldn't get work Saturday night, and I knew that she wasn't in the hands she ought to be; I wanted to get her alone to find out whether she was a sporting girl. So we got outside, and I asked her, and she owned up to it—she owned up to me—she said she was afraid, though, she would have to go, or he would kill her; I told her no, he would not; she said she would have to go or he would kill her; I told her no; I says, 'No, girlie, it is an awful life to live'; she said, 'Well, I don't want to do that,' but she says, 'I will have to do it or he would kill me.' I says, 'No, he won't; I will take you and put you in hands you won't get hurt.'"

Miss Smith took the prosecutrix to her apartments or "crib," which was one of a number of "cribs" or houses of prostitution constituting the "Bull Pen" before referred to. She telephoned from there to police headquarters and reported the case to the officers, and a policeman was at once dispatched to the "crib" and took charge of the girl.

The above statement of the facts embraces, in substance, the stories as told before the jury by the prosecutrix and Miss Smith.

The theory of the learned trial judge, as indicated by the opinion rendered by him when granting the motion for a new trial in this case, is that the facts as given above disclose nothing more than mere preparation to commit the crime of pandering—that is to say, that, while the evidence shows that the defendant had the intent to commit said crime and was engaged in making preparation to carry out that intent or to consummate the offense, it does not show that he made an attempt to do so; that, to complete the offense of an attempt to commit the crime of pandering, the accused must have attempted to secure a room or a house to be used by the female for the purposes of prostitution. In support of its conclusion, as above stated, the court cites and relies upon the following cases: People v. Matsicura, 19 Cal. App. 75, 124 Pac. 882; People v. Murray, 14 Cal. 159; Ex parte Floyd, 7 Cal. App. 588, 95 Pac. 175; Ex parte Turner, 3 Okl. Cr. R. 168, 104 Pac. 1071. We are unable to persuade ourselves that those cases support the conclusion reached by the learned trial judge in the case at bar. In other words, we are of the opinion that the evidence in this case, assuming only for the purposes of this discussion that it was not for any reason unworthy of credence or belief, goes much further than any of the cases referred to and shows a clear attempt by the defendant to commit the crime with which he was charged.

> "An attempt to commit a crime is compounded of two elements: (1) The intent to commit it; and (2) a direct ineffectual act done towards its commission." 2 Bishop, Crim. Proc. par. 71.

Or, as Wharton, page 268 of the eleventh edition of his work on Criminal Law, defines it: "An attempt is an intended apparent unfinished crime." Of course, as that learned author proceeds to say, "there must be some appreciable fragment of the crime committed," and if it be in such progress that it will be consummated unless interrupted by circumstances independent of the will of the attempter, then the attempt is complete. In other words, "to constitute the crime of an attempt to commit a crime, the acts of the defendant must go so far that they would result in the accomplishment of the crime unless frustrated by extraneous circumstances." People v. Grubb, 141 Pac. 1051; 1 Wharton, Crim. Law (10th Ed.) § 181; Clark & Marshall's Law of Crime (2d Ed.) § 123.

That the evidence in this case clearly shows that the defendant's intention was to place the prosecutrix in a house of prostitution for the purpose of carrying on that business is not denied. Manifestly, as the cases cited by the trial court in its opinion and above mentioned say, the mere intention to commit a crime does not of itself constitute an attempt to commit it; nor does the mere preparation to commit the crime, unaccompanied by any overt act, constitute an attempt to commit it. And if the evidence in this case disclosed nothing more than an intention and preparation to commit the crime of pandering, we would be compelled to hold with the trial court that the crime of an attempt to commit said offense was not established. But we think that the evidence clearly shows that the defendant went much further than merely to form the intent to commit the crime charged and to take certain preliminary steps, amounting only to preparation, looking to the execution of such intent.

In the first place, it is to be remarked that the statute, among other things, provides that any person who, by any device or scheme, shall cause, induce, persuade, or encourage a female person to become an inmate of a house of prostitution is guilty of a felony. It is further to be observed that an examination of the information will disclose that it is in the language of the statute, and that, among other things, it charges the defendant with having induced, persuaded, and encouraged the prosecutrix to become an inmate of a house of prostitution. It cannot be doubted that, under the language of the statute, where it is made to appear that such inducement, persuasion, or encouragement had reached the point that its effect would have been to cause the female to become an inmate of a house of prostitution but for the intervention of circumstances apart from and independent of the will of the persuader, the crime of an attempt to commit the crime denounced by the statute had been fully accomplished. It seems clear to us that the acts of the defendant had, according to the face value of the evidence, reached that very point. He, indeed, seems to have done all that he could do to induce her to become an inmate of such a house. While it is true that he did not personally procure for her a house or a room to be used by her for the purpose of plying the business of a prostitute (an act which we do not conceive to be indispensably essential to the consummation of the offense in all cases), he nevertheless, evidently having her under his domination and control, turned her over to the custody of a keeper of a house of prostitution, with instructions to put her to "work" at once, saying in effect that his supply of money was about exhausted, and the woman into whose charge she was thus placed, acting upon his persuasions, took her to a house of prostitution. If he had himself taken her to such a house for the purpose of making her an inmate thereof, no one would be found to say that such act would not constitute an attempt to commit the crime of pandering as defined by the statute upon which the information is based. And we are unable to perceive any difference in principle between such an act and the act of the accused in turning the prosecutrix over to the custody of a keeper of a house of prostitution with instructions that the latter place her in such a house to become an inmate thereof for the purpose of carrying on the business of prostitution. What the motive of the woman, Smith, might have been in taking the girl to her house of ill fame—whether to make her an inmate thereof in compliance with the expressed wish and request of the defendant, or only to secure an opportunity for placing her in the charge of the authorities and thus protecting her against the iniquitous designs of the accused—is immaterial, so far as the defendant himself is concerned. That circumstance did not and could not have the effect of rendering his conduct any the less an attempt to commit the crime of pandering. Indeed, but for the part that was finally played in the matter by Teddie Smith, the prosecutrix would undoubtedly there and then have entered upon the career of a common prostitute as the direct result of the acts of the defendant. That she did not was due entirely to the will and act of the Smith woman, and not to any act or wish of the accused. And it was this most commendable and humane intervention in the malodorous transaction by the fallen woman, Teddie Smith, that constituted the "extraneous circumstances"—circumstances arising independently of the will of the accused—which frustrated or prevented the execution of his purpose to place her in a house of prostitution as an inmate thereof.

As stated, the facts developed in the cases in which the learned trial judge perceives support for the conclusion declared in his opinion are very much different from those of the present case.

In the case of the People v. Matsicura, supra, the defendant was convicted of the crime of pandering under the statute in question. The undisputed evidence showed that the defendant was the owner or lessee of a house of prostitution, in Bakersfield, Kern county, and that the prosecutrix, some months prior to the date of the alleged commission of the crime of which the defendant was convicted, occupied a room in said house and there carried on the business of prostitution; that she had left said house and gone to Stockton, where she engaged in said business for a short period, when she sent word by wire to the defendant to either go to Stockton and take her back to Bakersfield or send her a railroad ticket to the latter place. The defendant forwarded a ticket to her, and she arrived at Bakersfield early on the following morning. She immediately repaired to the house of the defendant, who was then still in bed, and awakened him and accompanied him to a restaurant, where they had their breakfast. During the course of the meal she asked the defendant whether her "crib" was ready for her, and he replied, "No, not yet, but after breakfast I will fix it up for you." The defendant was arrested while at breakfast and charged with the crime of pandering, of which he was convicted upon evidence disclosing no other facts than those above detailed. It will at once be noted that the court in that case was dealing with a verdict of conviction of the crime of pandering itself, and not of an attempt to commit that crime. Obviously, the uncontradicted facts utterly failed to establish said crime, but it is not declared in the opinion that a conviction of an attempt to commit it might not have been thereby sustained.

In respect of the facts, we perceive no parallel between the other cases cited by the learned trial judge in his opinion and the case at bar. The evidence in those cases revealed no overt acts by the accused directed toward the commission of the specific crimes charged, but merely disclosed preparation of the means whereby said crimes might have been committed.

We are satisfied that the evidence, as disclosed by the record, if not for any reason unbelievable, is sufficient to establish an attempt on the part of the defendant to commit the crime of pandering as the same is described by the statute upon which the information is founded.

However, for the reasons stated in the outset of this opinion, the order appealed from must be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; BURNETT, J.

WELLER v. BROWN et al. (Civ. 1244.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 28, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1099*)—Law of the Case—Decision on Former Appeal.

The decision on a former appeal, in a suit to quiet title, that an oral agreement that a deed from plaintiff to defendant to a strip of land, "to be used as a public street, and not as a lot for building purposes," should constitute a reservation in favor of the owners of adjoining land of rights in a public street and of a negative easement prohibiting the erection of any building showed no more than that an immediate dedication to the public was not contemplated was the law of the case on a subsequent appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 4370–4379; Dec. Dig. § 1099.*]

2. Quieting Title (§ 47*)—Trial—Findings—Constructon.

A finding, in a suit to quiet title, that it was "never agreed," between the parties to a deed to a strip of land "to be used as a public street," that the grantors should reserve any rights in the land which they would have were it a public street was not in irreconcilable conflict with a finding that such an agreement existed, where it appeared from the concluding clause of the first finding that it meant that there was no "express" agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 95–97; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

3. Quieting Title (§ 54*)—Costs—Allowance.

Where the only issue, in a suit to quiet title, was the existence of an easement in favor of defendant for a right of way, as to which issue the judgment was for defendant, plaintiff was not entitled to costs, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, providing when costs shall be allowed to the plaintiff, though he was found to be the owner of the fee.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Action by H. A. Weller against R. M. Brown and another. From judgment and order for defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 160 Cal. 515, 117 Pac. 517.

Mannon & Mannon, of Ukiah, for appellant.
Preston & Preston, of Ukiah, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. On June 15, 1906, respondent Louisa M. Brown (wife of her codefendant), being the owner of a tract of land in Ft. Bragg, Mendocino county, conveyed to appellant by a grant deed a strip 60 feet wide extending across the entire width of her tract and leaving her with a parcel adjoining it on each side; all three parcels fronting on Main street. The deed was in the usual form, purporting to convey the absolute title, except that it contained the following clause:

> "It is hereby mutually agreed between the parties of the first part and the party of the second part that the above-described land is to be used as a public street and not as a lot for building purposes."

An action was brought by plaintiff to quiet his title to this strip, and a judgment was rendered in his favor in the superior court of said Mendocino county, but this was reversed by the Supreme Court, and the cause remanded for a new trial. 160 Cal. 515, 117 Pac. 517. Before the action was tried again, plaintiff amended his complaint, alleging that, by reason of a mistake as to the legal effect of the language of said deed, it did not correctly express the intention of the parties to the contract, in that it was no part of the agreement that the respondents should have any interest in the land conveyed by them.

By stipulation, the original answer of the respondents was considered as their answer to the amended complaint, and it was further agreed that any additional allegations in the amended complaint should be deemed denied. Afterwards the court found:

> "(3) That the said plaintiff agreed to pay to the said defendants, and the said defendants agreed to accept, the sum of $450 in gold coin of the United States for said lot, and plaintiff agreed not to use said lot for building purposes, but that he would buy it and pay for it and hold it until the city needed it for a street, and, when said city repaid him the consideration he was to pay defendants for the land, he would convey it to said city for a public street, and that no other or further agreement was made between plaintiff and the defendants herein in relation to said land.
> "(4) * * * That plaintiff did not then or there or at any other time or place claim to be acting for, by, or on behalf of the public, nor did he take said deed from the defendant Louisa M. Brown for the land in controversy with the understanding or agreement, whether duly or regularly made or otherwise, that the said land in controversy should be or become a public street or highway for public use or travel, unless and until the city repaid plaintiff the consideration he paid defendants therefor, or that the same should be or become an easement appurtenant to the remaining lands so owned by said defendant Louisa M. Brown, whether for the purpose of ingress or egress thereto or therefrom, unless the facts found in paragraph 3 hereof, taken in connection with the situation of the land in controversy as herein found, reserved to defendant Louisa M. Brown such rights as a matter of law; that the right to travel or use said land in controversy is not necessary but is convenient for the use or occupation by said defendant Louisa M. Brown of the lands she owns that adjoin the land in controversy.

"(5) That at the time of the execution of said deed, and thence up to the 7th day of August, 1911, the plaintiff supposed and believed that said deed expressed the true agreement of the parties thereto as set out in paragraph 3 of these findings, but that on said last-mentioned day the Supreme Court of the state of California decided that the language of said deed, as a matter of law, reserved to the said defendants all of the rights in the lot thereby conveyed which they would have were it a public street; that it was never agreed between the parties to said deed that the defendants or either of them should reserve all or any of the rights in said lot which they would have were it a public street, and that the reservation of such rights was inserted in said deed by mistake as to the true legal meaning of the cause thereof in this paragraph above quoted; and that therefore the said deed did not and does not express the true agreement of the parties thereto, unless the facts found in paragraph 3 hereof, taken in connection with the situation of the land in controversy, as herein found, reserved to defendant Louisa M. Brown such rights as a matter of law.

"(6) That the failure of said deed to express the true agreement of the parties arose from a mistake as to the legal effect of the language contained in said deed and quoted in paragraph 5 of these findings; that plaintiff at the time of accepting said deed, and at all times up to August 7, 1911, supposed that he knew and understood the legal effect of the language used in said deed, and that such legal effect was to express the true agreement of the parties, as set forth in paragraph 3 of these findings; that the defendants did not make the same mistake as to the legal effect of said deed as did said plaintiff, but that they and each of them knew of plaintiff's said misapprehension of the law as to such legal effect at the time of executing said deed, but that said defendants did not, nor did either of them, at that time or at any other time, rectify plaintiff's said misapprehension of the law.

"(7) That plaintiff was at the time of the commencement of this action, ever since has been, and now is the owner, seised in fee, in the possession and entitled to the possession, of all of the lot of land described in paragraph 3 of these findings, subject to the right of the defendant Louisa M. Brown by virtue of the said deed; that the public at large has no right to travel over or to use the said land in controversy or any part thereof as or for a public street or highway."

As conclusions of law the court found:

"That plaintiff is entitled to a decree of this court reforming the said deed so as to express the true intention of the parties thereto by striking therefrom the words 'is to be used as a public street and not as a lot for building purposes,' and by inserting in lieu thereof the words 'is not to be used as a lot for building purposes, but is to be held by the party of the second part until the city of Ft. Bragg needs it for a street, and, when said city repays said party of the second part the sum of $450, said party of the second part will and shall convey the land hereby conveyed to said city for a public street,' and that said reformation should take effect as of the date of said deed. That the defendant Louisa M. Brown is entitled to judgment that she is the owner of an easement for a right of way over the land described in paragraph 3 of these findings, with the right to ingress and egress thereon, being the same rights that she would have in said land in controversy if the same were a public street, and that said easement is appurtenant to the remaining lands of the said defendant. That the plaintiff is entitled to a judgment declaring that he is the owner and seised in fee, in the possession and entitled to the possession, of all the land in paragraph 3 of the findings of fact described, subject to the said right and easement of the said defendant Louisa M. Brown therein, as hereinabove set forth."

While the deed was reformed, as we have seen, there seems to be no appreciable difference in legal effect between the decisive findings here and those at the former trial. Then it was found by the court:

"That at the time of the execution and delivery of said deed, and concurrently therewith, the plaintiff verbally agreed with the defendants that he would pay to them the full value of said land and hold possession of the same. That, if the city of Ft. Bragg could be induced to buy said land and dedicate it to street purposes, the plaintiff would deed said land to said city upon receipt by him of the amount he paid defendants therefor, and that then, and not till then, the same might become a public street. That no further or other agreement was ever had or entered into between the plaintiff and defendants or between plaintiff and either of the defendants respecting the lands in controversy or the use thereof."

[1] The deed itself provided that:

"The above-described land is to be used as a public street and not as a lot for building purposes."

In reforming the deed, however, the court added to the above-mentioned covenant virtually said oral agreement, so that the deed now contains substantially and almost identically the language of the former written and also the oral covenant as to the use of the land. In other words, the whole agreement was formerly set forth, partly in the deed and partly in parol, but now it appears in the deed itself. The meaning and effect, however, of the completed covenant have not been changed, and no different construction of the contract of the parties is permissible.

But in the opinion of the Supreme Court in the former appeal, written by Mr. Justice Sloss, it was said:

"The question to be decided is whether the deed, read in connection with these circumstances existing at the date of its execution, reserved to the grantors any interest in the land conveyed."

And, after considering the nature of said restrictive covenant in the deed, the opinion proceeds:

"Apart, however, from the various considerations above suggested, there still remains a way by which the restrictive words of the deed may be given effect; that is, by construing them as intended to reserve an easement in the land granted for the benefit of the remaining and adjoining land of the grantors."

And the court holds that this is the natural and reasonable conclusion to be drawn from the facts found, and that, while the agreement would not of itself effect a dedication of the strip as a public street, it was sufficient, as between the parties, "to constitute a reservation in favor of the owners of the adjoining land of such rights as they would have in a public street, and further to reserve to them a negative easement prohibiting the erection of any building upon the strip." As to the effect of said oral agreement, which is now a part of the deed, it was declared that "it shows no more than that an immediate dedication to the public was not contemplated," and that it "may be given full effect without setting aside the covenant restricting the grantee's use of the land pending a purchase by the city." We look upon this decision of the Supreme Court as embodying the law of the case and controlling on this appeal.

[2] The findings, as set forth, may be lacking somewhat in precision, but, when properly understood, we think there is no irreconcilable conflict. The declaration "that it was never agreed between the parties to said deed that the defendants or either of them should reserve all or any of the rights in said lot which they would have were it a public street," etc., is modified by the concluding clause of the finding, and manifestly means that there was no express agreement to that effect.

It is to be observed in this connection that there is no finding that it was not the intention of the parties or either of them that the grantors should reserve any rights in the premises. If there were, some embarrassment might be met in the effort to affirm the judgment.

The finding as to the mistake of the grantee means, as we understand, that he believed the covenant, as incorporated originally in the deed, had the same significance as that now embodied therein by order of the court. The legal effect, however, of the agreement of the parties not having been changed, we can see no vital importance in this consideration.

[3] The point is made by appellant that, even if the court below properly construed the deed, costs should have been awarded plaintiff, under the authority of Petitpierre v. Maguire, 155 Cal. 242, 100 Pac. 690, wherein it was held that, under section 1022 of the Code of Civil Procedure, plaintiff was entitled to his costs; it appearing that he was the owner of the land in fee, the defendant having taken issue as to such title. Sierra Union, etc., Co. v. Wolff, 144 Cal. 430, 77 Pac. 1038, and Gibson v. Hammang, 145 Cal. 454, 78 Pac. 953, were therein cited in support of the ruling.

In the former of these it was held that:

> "Where the plaintiff has any judgment in his favor in an action to quiet title, though it be for only a part of the property, and though the defendant has judgment in his favor for the residue, the plaintiff is entitled, under the terms of the statute, to recover his costs as of course."

In the Gibson Case the action was to annul a deed made by a testatrix in her lifetime to defendant, and was brought by the heirs at law, who were devisees under the will, and it was held that it was an action involving the title to the land in question, and that plaintiffs were entitled to their costs, since they recovered part of the property sued for.

We do not think, however, that these cases are controlling here.

Construing the answer as a whole, we find that the only material issue was as to the existence of the easement in favor of defendant Louisa M. Brown for a right of way, and, as to this, the judgment was in favor of said defendant. There would be, therefore, as much reason for invoking section 1024 of the Code of Civil Procedure in favor of said defendant as said section 1022 in favor of plaintiff. At any rate, we think the court was justified in striking out plaintiff's cost bill.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

2. Waters and Water Courses (§ 263*)—Breach of Contract for Water for Irrigation—Measure of Damages.

In an action for damages for breach of a contract to furnish water for irrigation, the measure of damages, under Civ. Code, § 3300, declaring that a party aggrieved by a breach of contract is entitled to compensation for all the detriment proximately caused, is the difference between the market value of the crop planted and the expenses of maturing it.

3. Waters and Water Courses (§ 263*)—Breach of Contract for Water for Irrigation—Actions—Findings — Construction.

A finding, in an action for damages for breach of a contract to furnish water for irrigation, that the cost of producing and marketing the crop would have been the sum of $129, and that the net damages accruing to plaintiff, to wit, the value of the crop that would have been produced, less the sum of $129, was as great as $700, is not a finding that the market value of the crop produced would only be $700, and will support a judgment in favor of plaintiff to that amount.

4. EVIDENCE (§ 419*)—PAROL EVIDENCE—VARYING OF WRITTEN INSTRUMENTS.

Where a contract for the sale of land provided for transfer to the purchaser of irrigation rights, and that he should receive so much water per acre, it was not improper, in an action by the purchaser for damages for breach of the contract, to permit him to testify that the agreement that water was to be furnished was an inducement to his purchase; such testimony not varying the written contract of sale.

5. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 261*)—IRRIGATION—ACTIONS FOR DAMAGES.

Where the canals leading to plaintiff's land were not completed in time to furnish him water for irrigation in accordance with contract, the fact that plaintiff made no demand on defendant for water in accordance with the rules will not preclude plaintiff's recovery; a demand under such circumstances being an idle thing.

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 959*)—PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENTS—ALLOWANCE—DISCRETION OF COURT—REVIEW.

While, under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, the court may allow trial amendments when a party is surprised, and even continue the case, the allowance or disallowance of trial amendments is a matter within the discretion of the lower court, and its ruling will not be reviewed, unless an abuse appears.

7. CORPORATIONS (§ 428*)—NOTICE TO OFFICERS—EFFECT.

Where defendant's answer was verified by its superintendent, defendant, though a corporation, is charged with notice of the averments of the complaint, and cannot at trial claim surprise because of the case made in accordance with the complaint.

8. PLEADING (§ 236*)—AMENDMENTS—ABUSE OF DISCRETION.

In an action against a land company for damages for failure to furnish plaintiff, a purchaser, with water for irrigation according to the contract of sale, the complaint alleged that plaintiff was entitled to receive certain water from an irrigation company organized to supply the lands of defendant; that the irrigating season began April 1st; that plaintiff's crop failed because no water was furnished until May 18th, the canals and ditches leading to plaintiff's land not being completed until that date. The rules of the irrigation company entitled it to three days' notice before it was required to furnish water. Held that, where defendant filed a verified answer, the court did not abuse its discretion in refusing permission to file a trial amendment setting up plaintiff's failure to demand water in accordance with the rule, and that, if such demand had been made, the ditches and canals to plaintiff's land would have been constructed within three days.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 601, 605; Dec. Dig. § 236.*]

9. NEW TRIAL (§ 87*)—RIGHT TO.

In such case, though defendant's counsel, who died shortly thereafter, was found upon post mortem examination to have been suffering from brain trouble, the denial of a new trial, asked on the ground that he was incompetent to protect defendant's interest, was not an abuse of discretion; it appearing that he prosecuted other business at that time with his customary mental vigor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Action by Alexander Allen against the Los Molinos Land Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

McCoy & Gans, of Red Bluff, for appellant.
W. P. Johnson, of Red Bluff, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action for damages under a written contract, made part of the complaint, whereby defendant was to sell and plaintiff was to buy certain 12.54 acres of land, and, among other agreements, plaintiff was entitled to receive from the Coneland Water Company, organized for the purpose of irrigating the lands of defendant and others, "one-fifth miner's inches per acre, at such times and places and subject to such rules and regulations" as may be prescribed by said Coneland Water Company, and for which water plaintiff was to pay $2 per acre annually. Both said companies were under the management of one and the same person. It is alleged in the complaint that the irrigating season was, by a rule of said Coneland Water Company, declared to be from April 1st to October 31st of each year, and said rule was in force from and after April 1, 1912; "that one of the chief inducements of plaintiff to enter into said contract was the provision in said contract in respect to furnishing water for said land" (paragraph 5); that about March 18, 1912, plaintiff had all of his said land planted to potatoes; that said land was prepared for said planting in a farmerlike manner, and agreeably to the custom of good husbandry, and that the soil of said land was suitable for raising large crops of potatoes with proper irrigation, and said contract provided for a supply of all the water necessary for the land for such purposes (paragraph 6); that about April 15, 1912, "said potatoes so planted were growing nicely, and gave promise of making a good crop, but from said date were in need of water for irrigation thereof; that between said date and the 18th day of May, 1912, the growth of said potatoes was arrested because of lack of water, and between said dates said potato crop was continuously in need of water for irrigation thereof" (paragraph 7); "that the defendant and said Coneland Water Company had not had their canals and irrigating ditches in proper condition for the furnishing of water for the said land in accordance with said contract, and that said canals and irrigating ditches were not constructed and prepared so the water could be delivered upon the said land until the 18th day of May, 1912, when water was furnished by said companies to plaintiff for his said land; that no provision had been made by the said companies by which water could have been furnished and delivered to plaintiff for the irrigation of his said land at an earlier date than the said 18th day of May, 1912" (paragraph 8); "that, by reason of the failure of said companies to furnish water between said dates, the growth of said potatoes was arrested, and when water was delivered to the plaintiff for the said crop, as set forth herein, it was too late to save said crop from being a total loss;" that plaintiff depended upon defendant to furnish water for said purpose, and, by reason of its failure so to do, said crop was a total loss (paragraph 9); that, by reason of the foregoing, plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $700 (paragraph 10). Damages are also claimed for the cancellation by defendant of said contract because of plaintiff's failure to pay installments due thereunder, which failure it is alleged resulted from the failure to raise said potato crop. As the court found against plaintiff on this issue, and as plaintiff does not appeal, this branch of the case need be no further noticed.

The complaint and answer are verified. Defendant denied, on information and belief, the averments in paragraph 5 of the complaint, denied the averments of paragraph 6 as to alleged proper planting and preparation of the land, but admits its suitability for growing potatoes, and alleges that said land was not ready to receive water nor properly prepared prior to May 18, 1912. The averments of paragraphs 7 and 8 are admitted by not denying them. Defendant denies the averments in paragraphs 9 and 10. The answer was verified by Thomas H. Means, the general manager of the companies.

The court found paragraphs 1 to 9, inclusive, of the complaint to be true, and "that plaintiff was ready and his land was prepared to receive water earlier than May 18, 1912, and plaintiff was so ready and his land was so prepared in time to have prevented the loss of his crop, if water had been furnished by defendant." The court also found that plaintiff was damaged "in a sum equal to what the value of the said potato crop would have been if water had been furnished, less the additional costs and expenses that would have been incurred in taking care of, harvesting, and selling said crop," which the court found was $129, "and that the net damage accruing to the plaintiff, to wit, the value of the crop that would have been produced, less the said item of $129, was as great as the sum of $700."

Judgment accordingly passed for plaintiff for $700, from which, and from the order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1] 1. The findings as to the preparation of the land for planting, that the land was ready to receive water earlier than May 18, 1912, that the growth of the potatoes was arrested by reason of the lack of water, and that, when water finally was furnished, it was too late to save the crop are challenged as unsupported by sufficient evidence.

Plaintiff testified that the soil is rich loam, well adapted to the growing of potatoes, which defendant admitted; that he prepared the land by deep plowing and sufficient harrowing agreeably to the requirements of good husbandry; that he bought his seed from Oregon of approved varieties, in good condition, and planted it in accordance with approved methods of planting; that the seed came up and showed healthy and promising growth; that in due time he hoed and "hilled up" the earth against the vines in proper manner and kept the ground cultivated to retain moisture and promote further growth. He testified:

> "That spring was a very dry year, and there was a great lack of rain. There was a very long dry spell, at the end of which there was a very hot north wind, and after that there was a very heavy rainstorm, after this dry spell, and which soaked the ground very thoroughly. This was May 19th. This was the day after the water was delivered."

He testified that he examined the vines at this time, and "a second growth" appeared, which he learned later had rendered the crop of no value. He testified that up to May 1st the potatoes seemed to be doing well, but the continued dry weather and lack of moisture, which irrigation would have supplied, was the apparent cause of the "set back" which the potatoes received. He testified that, after water was furnished, there was no lack of moisture, but nothing could then have saved the crop. There was corroborating testimony of some of the essential facts testified to by plaintiff. Defendant introduced witnesses whose testimony tended in some degree to dispute the correctness of plaintiff's testimony, but all that we are at liberty to say of it is that it created a conflict which it was for the trial court to deal with. Its findings have sufficient support and must stand as presenting the ultimate facts in the case.

[2] 2. The evidence was that under favorable conditions "it was a poor year for potatoes." There was testimony that such land as plaintiff's "ought to raise nothing less than 50 sacks per acre, and ought to bring as high up as 150 sacks." Plaintiff in his testimony said that he "was figuring on 50 sacks to the acre of 120 pounds to a sack." He gave the market price of the two varieties he planted at the time they should have matured and have been ready for market. also the cost of producing and marketing the crop, or, as the court expressed it, the market value of the potatoes, less "costs and expenses that would have been incurred in taking care of, harvesting, and selling said crop." With these facts before it, and the acreage planted, the court arrived at what we think was the correct measure of damages, to wit, the market value of the potatoes at the selling place, which the testimony showed was Red Bluff, less the expenses incurred in growing and marketing the crop. The action is for the breach of an obligation arising from the contract, and the measure of damages "is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom." Civ. Code, § 3300.

[3] It is claimed that the finding as to the damages does not support the judgment, and, properly construed, means $700, less $129, to wit, $571, and not $700, as entered in the judgment. The court found the cost of producing and marketing the crop "would have been the sum of $129, and that the net damage accruing to the plaintiff, to wit, the value of the crop that would have been produced, less the said sum of $129, was as great as $700." This is not a finding, as defendant contends, that the value of the crop was $700, but that its value was a sum equal to at least $700, after deducting $129, and supported the judgment for $700. A simple calculation of 50 sacks of 120 pounds each at 1¼ cents per pound, the lowest market price named, would give a net value greater than the sum allowed.

[4] 3. Error is claimed because plaintiff was permitted to testify that the agreement that water was to be furnished for irrigation was an inducement to purchase the land. One of the conditions of the contract of sale was that plaintiff should receive one-fifth miner's inches of water per acre on said land. It was not varying the terms of the contract for plaintiff to say that this was an inducement. The contract itself said as much.

[5] 4. Plaintiff testified that he was familiar with the rules of the water company, and knew there was a regulation that a water user, desiring to irrigate, should notify the company or its officers, in writing, three days in advance of the time water was needed.

> "Q. Did you make any demand in writing for the delivery to you of water? A. Not at that time. I was told it was not necessary. Q. When did you make any demand at all, either in writing or otherwise? Mr. Johnson (plaintiff's attorney): I object on the ground it is incompetent, irrelevant, and immaterial. The pleadings admit that the company didn't have the canals completed and couldn't deliver it (the water) before this particular time (May 18th). What is the use of making demand before they have their canals ready to deliver it? The Court: I will sustain the objection. You allege you were ready to deliver on the 18th of May, and the inference is that you couldn't deliver it before that."

The complaint distinctly alleged that the water company had not completed its canals and was not in condition to deliver water before that date, which was admitted by not denying it. Objection to a similar question was later on sustained. After some further testimony was taken, Mr. Wells, defendant's attorney, asked leave to file the following amendment to the answer:

> "Furthermore, answering the complaint of plaintiff, the defendant admits that the canals and ditches were not in perfect condition to deliver water, but defendant alleges that it could, and that it would have put the ditches into condition to furnish any and all of the water needed, had demand been made for the same, and defendant alleges that plaintiff or any other person did not make demand. Defendant further says that it could within a very few days have furnished water after a demand is made. * * * The Court: I will deny the application to amend the answer at this late stage of the case."

The complaint alleges that by the rules of the water company the irrigating season began on April 1st, and that the defendant was not prepared to deliver water to plaintiff until May 18th, and the evidence was that the damage became irreparable prior to the latter date. There was no denial that the company was unable to furnish water sooner than May 18th; it was therefore immaterial whether or not a demand for water was made. Plaintiff was not called upon to perform the idle act of making a demand concededly impossible of being complied with.

[6-8] In support of its offer to amend the answer and of its claim that the court erred in refusing to allow the amendment offered, many cases are cited in illustration of the meaning of section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to the effect that amendments to pleadings are favored to enable a party to prove all the facts necessary to his cause of action or defense. Crosby v. Clark, 132 Cal. 8, 63 Pac. 1022, and San Francisco, etc., Society v. Leonard, 17 Cal. App. 254, 119 Pac. 405, are cited as distinctly so holding. The court is empowered to impose terms where a party is taken by surprise and may even continue the case. While this is true, it is also ruled that the allowance or disallowance of an amendment in the midst of a trial is within the discretion of the trial court, and its ruling will not be disturbed, unless such discretion has been abused. Manha v. Union Fertilizer Co., 151 Cal. 581, 582, 91 Pac. 393; Salmon v. Rathjens, 152 Cal. 290, 92 Pac. 733. The answer was verified by the superintendent of both companies, and defendant is charged with knowledge of the averments of the complaint. The allegation that defendant had not so far completed its canals and ditches as to make it possible to furnish plaintiff's land with water earlier than May 18th could not have escaped the notice of defendant or its attorney and hence defendant cannot complain that it was surprised. Presumably the averment was not denied because it could not be truthfully controverted, and plaintiff had a right so to assume the fact to be when he went to trial. The proposed amendment gives evidence of hasty preparation, and fails fairly to present the issue that defendant was prepared on demand to furnish plaintiff the needed water. The amendment seems to rely on the rule of the water company requiring three days' notice by a water user. The rules of the water company are not in the record, and all we know of this rule is derived from a question on cross-examination of plaintiff by Mr. Wells as follows:

> "Q. Regulation No. 3, which says water users desiring to irrigate shall notify the company or its duly appointed officer three days in advance of the time water is needed, and blanks will be furnished by the company for this purpose, and these blanks are to be filled out, giving time water is desired, the length of run desired, and number of inches needed, and the water user will then be notified when the water can be delivered to him, and he must be prepared for the delivery; you were familiar with that regulation? A. I was. Q. Did you make any demand for the delivery in writing for the delivery to you of water? A. Not at that time. I was told it was not necessary."

It seems to us that this regulation had reference to the delivery of water after the canals and ditches were completed, and was designed to aid the company in its distribution of water to many users. The regulation certainly did not mean that the company would construct its canals and ditches upon three days' notice. By its own regulation the irrigating season commenced on April 1st, at which time the company should have been ready to deliver water. The proposed amendment does not state clearly or at all that its canals and ditches were in a condition to have furnished water within three days. We cannot say that, under the circumstances, the court abused its discretion.

[9] 5. Upon the motion for a new trial appellant submitted certain affidavits tending to show that, at the time the answer was prepared, Mr. Wells, appellant's attorney, was afflicted with brain trouble, of which he, some time after the trial, died. There were counter affidavits from which the inference was fairly deducible that Mr. Wells had not at the time suffered any perceptible diminution of his mental powers. The record bears evidence that Mr. Wells had his case well in hand, and the trial judge was in a position to observe his capacity intelligently to conduct the defense. We cannot see that the court erred in denying the motion on this ground.

Superintendent Means made affidavit in support of the motion that, had plaintiff given notice under rule 3 of the water company, "said canals and ditches would have been constructed and prepared so that water could have been delivered upon the land of said plaintiff for the irrigation thereof according to said contract, within three days after the giving of such notice," and that the reason said canals and ditches had not been so constructed as to deliver water to plaintiff's land earlier than May 18th was that plaintiff had not given any notice as provided in said regulation 3. It will be observed that this statement of the situation is much more specific than is found in the proposed amendment. But it cannot be said, nor is it shown, that it was through surprise or excusable neglect that the facts were not set forth in the answer. It was still within the discretion of the court to grant or deny the motion, and we find no just ground for interfering with its ruling.

It is strongly urged that the mental condition of Mr. Wells was unknown to defendant, and came to its knowledge only through the autopsy after his death, whence, by a posteriori reasoning, his condition at the time of the trial is arrived at. It may be conceded that an incipient stage of brain lesion had developed, but there was evidence that Mr. Wells had returned from treatment at San Francisco and had resumed work in his office, had, shortly before the trial assisted in the trial of a case in court, attended to the business of a bank for which he was attorney, and otherwise exhibited his usual mental vigor. Had it clearly appeared without conflict that Mr. Wells was in fact incapable of framing the answer in this case or of conducting the defense, and that these facts were unknown to defendant, and could not with reasonable diligence have been known to it, a different situation would be presented. We are unable to discover that the trial court abused its discretion.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 706*)—Use of Streets — Negligence — Actions — Instructions—Applicability to Evidence.

4. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—USE OF STREETS — NEGLIGENCE — ACTIONS — INCONSISTENT INSTRUCTION.

In an action for alleged negligence in not properly hitching defendant's team, as required by a city ordinance, the court charged that if, to properly secure the team, a strap or rope should have been passed through the bit and around the neck of one or both horses, then defendant was negligent. There was no evidence that such method was reasonably necessary to properly secure the team. Held, that such instruction was not inconsistent with other instructions given at defendant's request that the ordinance did not prescribe the particular manner of hitching; and, if defendant's servant hitched the team as a reasonably prudent person, using ordinary care, would have done, that was sufficient, etc.

6. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*) — STREETS—HITCHING ANIMALS—CITY ORDINANCE—TIE STRAP—QUESTION FOR JURY.

On an issue as to whether defendant's team was properly secured when left unattended in a street, as required by a city ordinance, evidence held insufficient to require a finding that the strap with which the team was hitched was such as would properly secure the horses under ordinary circumstances.

7. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—USE OF STREETS — NEGLIGENCE — ACTIONS — MISLEADING INSTRUCTIONS.

Where suit was brought for injuries resulting from alleged negligence in failing to comply with a city ordinance requiring horses to be properly secured when left unattended in the street, and the court charged that defendant was bound to exercise ordinary care to prevent its teams from running away and injuring persons using such streets in common with it, such instruction was but a statement of a common-law principle consistent with the ordinance, and not objectionable as an abstract statement of duty, disassociated from the facts of the case.

9. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 705*)—USE OF STREETS—NEGLIGENCE—INDEPENDENT "CONCURRING CAUSE"—PROXIMATE CAUSE.

Where defendant's horses were left standing in a street tied, but not "properly secured," as required by a city ordinance, and, being frightened by the discharge of a pistol by a boy, broke the strap by which one of them was tied, ran away and injured plaintiff, the act of the boy in frightening the horses was not such an intervening independent cause of the accident as would relieve defendant from liability, but was a concurring cause, within the rule that an independent wrongful act, to constitute the proximate cause, displacing the original primary cause, must be so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the damage occasioned was in no way a natural or probable consequence of the original wrongful act or omission.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by Hirst Parkin against the Grayson-Owen Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, and from an order denying defendant's motion for a new trial, it appeals. Affirmed.

Myrick & Deering, of San Francisco, for appellant. Stanley Moore, of San Francisco, and B. H. Griffins, of Oakland, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. The cause of action is for damages arising out of the alleged violation of the following ordinance of the city of Oakland:

> "No person shall leave or allow any horse or mule to be or remain standing upon any of the public streets of the city of Oakland unless such animal is in some way properly secured either by hitching or being under the personal control of some person of suitable age."

This is the second appeal taken by the defendant in the case, and is from the judgment and order denying motion for a new trial in an action for personal injuries. The decision on the first appeal is reported in 157 Cal. 41, 106 Pac. 210.

In its opening brief appellant makes a statement of facts which is sufficient to give an understanding of the case, although respondent says it is inaccurate in some not very important matters, inasmuch as the errors claimed relate to instructions given or refused. We shall use the statement as made by appellant:

> "The plaintiff complains that the defendant's delivery wagon, to which there were attached two horses, a black and a bay, were improperly hitched, and that by reason thereof the said horses broke from their fastening, ran north on San Pablo avenue, turned easterly into Sixteenth street, and collided with the buggy in > which the plaintiff, as driver, was riding with a doctor, overturning the buggy, throwing plaintiff to the pavement, and injuring his knee.

> "The driver of the delivery wagon, George Vincent, drove up in front of a restaurant on San Pablo avenue, between 10:30 and 11 o'clock in the forenoon. Vincent had left the barn about 5 o'clock in the morning, and had completed his delivery. He was an experienced driver; was 29 years of age; and for eight years had been a stage driver in Siskiyou county. He carried with him a hitching strap. He testified that he drove up to the restaurant, set his foot brake down hard and sufficiently tight to block the wheels, wrapped the reins three or four times around the brake, got down, snapped the snap of the hitching strap in the bit of the black horse, and tied it around the telegraph post. He further said that after he had ordered his luncheon he heard the report of a pistol. Before the driver could get to the door of the restaurant, the pistol was fired again, and the team broke loose. Vincent had previously testified that before he had gone into the restaurant he spoke to a small boy, who had a toy pistol in his hand, and cautioned him not to fire.
> "The strap that Vincent used for the purpose of hitching the horses was an ordinary hitching strap that had been patched, and there was considerable testimony at the trial as to this patching or repairing of the strap; plaintiff claimed that the strap was old and rotten, and insufficient for the purposes of a hitching strap.
> "I. D. Tobin, a police officer, called by the plaintiff, testified that he was on duty that day, and before the runaway he noticed that the team was very nervous, and that the bay horse was crowding the black one up against the sidewalk. The black horse was pulling to and fro on the strap that he was tied to. 'I noticed that the black horse was tied.' On cross-examination this officer stated: 'There was nothing in the action of the horses, or in the way in which they were hitched, to arouse my suspicion that there was any danger at all. So far as I saw, everything was all right.' He also testified on cross-examination that: 'If the horse had not been properly hitched at that time it would have been my duty to have taken action in the matter. I did nothing. I saw how the horse had been hitched, how it was hitched at that time. I patted the horse; he calmed down.' Immediately afterward the runaway occurred.
> "Defendant complains that the lower court committed error in the instructions it gave to the jury, asserts that the case was not properly left for decision by the jury, and takes this appeal in order that the issues involved may be submitted to a jury under proper instructions."

[1] 1. It is contended that the court erred in giving the following instruction (No. 22):

> "If you believe from the evidence that, in order to have properly secured the defendant's team upon the occasion in question, a strap or rope should have been passed through the bit and around the neck of one or both of the horses in said team, then in such case I charge you that the defendant was guilty of negligence in merely snapping the hitching strap to the bit of one of said horses, even though you further believe that said strap was entirely sound."

The evidence was that the strap was fastened in the bit of the black horse next to the telegraph post.

Appellant makes several objections to this instruction: (A) That the court had no right to suggest to the jury how the horses might have been fastened, viz., by passing a strap or rope through the bit and around the neck of one or both; (B) it was prejudicial to suggest that to secure the team the strap should have been passed around the necks of both horses; (C) that the court, in so charging, disregarded the law of the case as laid down on the former appeal (157 Cal. 41, 48, 106 Pac. 210, 214), where the court said, "We consider it unreasonable to hold that, when a team is left standing, and unattended, the ordinance requires in any event that every horse constituting the team should be hitched;" (D) the instruction leaves out the important things done by the driver, Vincent, to secure the team (i. e., in setting the brake down and wrapping the reins around it); (E) the instruction in effect assumes that there is but one way properly to secure a horse, by passing the rope or strap around his neck and through his bit, and, where there are two horses, the same should be done with both.

Appellant recalls the fact that at the former trial expert testimony was received upon the subject of hitching horses. At the present trial appellant says, in its brief:

> "Plaintiff carefully refrained from calling experts at the time, and there was absolutely nothing said at the trial about passing a rope or strap around the horse's neck and through the bit."

The brief states:

> "The court knew, and so did the jury, that the strap was snapped into the bit of the black horse; that it was not passed around the neck of either animal."

It is contended that "the instruction contained an element nowhere found in the evidence, and was not fair to the defendant;" also that it was prejudicial "in that it suggested that, to secure the team properly, the strap should have been passed around the neck of both horses," and that the instruction "assumes there is but one way properly to secure a horse," or two horses, where there are two (that is, by the way pointed out in the instruction); and finally that the instruction disregarded the law of the case as held in the former appeal above quoted. We have thus grouped the claims made in paragraphs of the brief marked A, B, C, and E. Assuming it to be true that there was no evidence at all as to hitching a horse by passing the strap through the bit and around the neck, the most that can be said of the instruction is that it suggests something entirely outside the evidence. The jury were told that if they believed from the evidence that, in order properly to secure defendant's team, a strap or rope should have been passed through the bit and around the neck of one or both horses, merely snapping the hitching strap into the bit of one of the horses would constitute negligence under the ordinance. The ordinance required that the horses should "in some way be properly secured either by hitching or being under the personal control of some person of suitable age." If, therefore, the evidence had convinced the jury that the horses could have been "properly secured" only in the particular way pointed out in the instruction, less than that—"merely snapping the hitching strap to the bit of one horse"—would have been a violation of the ordinance. But there was no evidence upon which to base the instruction, and hence it seems to us that the only question is: Did it necessarily have a tendency to mislead the jury?

At defendant's request the court gave the following instructions:

> "(34) You are further instructed that the ordinance does not prescribe any particular manner of hitching; it does not prescribe that a rope should be used in preference to a leather strap, nor does it prohibit the use of a hitching strap with a snaffle, nor does it prescribe the strap should be fastened about the animal's neck rather than to the bit. The ordinance merely requires the horse to be properly secured by hitching, or that it be under the control of a person of suitable age. If you find that Vincent secured the horses in the present case by hitching them as a reasonable and prudent person using ordinary care, skilled in the handling of horses and experienced in driving would have done, then you would be justified in finding that the horses were properly secured by hitching, and, for their subsequent breaking away and injuring the plaintiff, the defendant would not be liable, and, if you so find, your verdict should be for the defendant.
> "(35) You are also instructed that the said ordinance does not in terms prescribe that where two horses attached to a wagon, as in the case at bar, are left standing in the street, both horses should be hitched; if you find that one of the two horses attached to defendant's delivery wagon was properly secured by hitching when Vincent, the driver, left the wagon and went into the restaurant, and that, to properly secure both horses by hitching, a reasonable and prudent man, skilled in the handling of horses and experienced as a driver, would have hitched but one horse, as was done by Vincent in this case, then your verdict should be for the defendant."

It will be observed that notwithstanding there was, as defendant claims, no evidence referring to passing the strap around the neck of one or both horses to "properly secure" them, the suggestion was found in these instructions, and was as much out of place here as in the instruction complained of, and appellant was equally responsible for the suggestion. Waiving that fact as immaterial in view of the want of evidence on the subject, it seems to us, conceding the instruction 22 should not have been given, that it was not necessarily misleading, for the instructions (34 and 35) given at defendant's request placed the matter very clearly before the jury and left them to decide upon the evidence before them whether the ordinance had been violated; the question of what would constitute the proper hitching of a horse was left with the jury as matter of common knowledge. 157 Cal., supra.

The law of the case, enunciated in the former appeal, was that it was error to instruct the jury that it was negligence not to have properly secured both horses. Said the court:

> "We consider it unreasonable to hold that, when a team is left standing and unattended, the ordinance requires in any event that every horse constituting the team should be hitched."

The instruction in question, as we read it, left the matter with the jury upon the evidence before them, and, as there was no evidence with regard to passing the strap around the neck of one or both horses, that feature was eliminated from the case.

[2] That the instruction omitted the fact that Vincent secured the team by setting the brake and wrapping the reins around it was not error. Since the ordinance expressly provides that a horse "properly secured" must be hitched or left in personal control of some person of suitable age, the fact could properly be omitted.

[3] If, however, this fact should have been considered by the jury, they had the benefit of it in the following instruction given at defendant's request:

> "If you find that, upon driving up to the sidewalk upon dismounting to go into the restaurant, Vincent, the driver, set the brake hard, wound the reins around the brake, and then fastened one end of the hitching strap, reasonably fit for that purpose, to the bit of one of the horses, and the other end to a post at or near the edge of the sidewalk, you must consider all these circumstances in determining whether the driver used reasonable care and caution to secure the horses in thus hitching them."

[4] It is further contended that instruction numbered 22 is inconsistent with instructions 34 and 35, above quoted. If we are correct in our view of instruction 22, the jury were not called upon to consider the passing of the strap through the bit and around the neck of one of the horses, because there was no evidence upon which to base a belief that such method of hitching was involved.

[5] Inconsistent instructions must be plainly misleading or confusing to make them prejudicial. Instructions 34 and 35 were given at defendant's request, and were in themselves a correct and easily comprehended guide to the jury. We can discover no inconsistency between them and No. 22, and certainly none such as would justify a reversal of the case. Nor do we think, apart from any alleged inconsistency between these instructions, that instruction 22 was prejudicial conceding error in giving it. If the jury believed from the evidence that the only way to have properly secured the team was to pass the strap through the bit and around the neck of one of the horses, the court was justified in telling the jury that merely to snap the hitching strap to the bit of one of the horses would have constituted negligence. The latter part of the instruction must necessarily be correct, following the assumptions of the first part of the instruction.

[6] Respondent contends that the verdict can be sustained upon other acts of negligence, independent of the method of hitching the horses or of the fact that but one horse of the team was hitched. Hence, if objectionable, the instruction complained of is without prejudice. It was alleged in the complaint, and the evidence concerning it was made the subject of instructions, that defendant failed to furnish the driver of the team with a proper hitching strap. Vincent testified:

> "The hitching strap I had with me was a strap I had on the horses, the strap that broke when I had my runaway. It was the same strap that I found in the warehouse or mending room. The strap was sewn, and there was a rivet in it also—one rivet. The strap was pared down. I should say that the strap had been used more in that portion than it had up next to the horse's bit; that it was some thinner from use."

He testified that he "considered it to be a safe hitching strap," and saw nothing about it "to indicate that it was weak." He testified:

> "I mean to say that the strap was not weaker in the center by reason of this sewing together and paring of ends and thin from use. It was worn apparently a little bit. I do not mean to say that the thinning of the strap from use, if it had become a little thinner from use, would not weaken it at all; I do not mean that exactly. Certainly it was weaker after tying over this here sewed piece. * * * I riveted the strap together about a month after the accident. I have not used it since, not at all. It is now the same as it was immediately after the accident, except that it is riveted together, and except that I have thinned down the edges there on riveting them together. Q. I understand you to say that the strap had been stitched as well as riveted once? A. Yes, it had. Q. What has become of the stitching? A. Well, I tore them off, smoothed them down when I riveted it together. The stitching went clear through both ends. It is now lapped over further. I think I cut off 2½ inches from one piece where the snaffle was before I riveted it. The Court: You don't mean to say it is exactly in the same condition with the exception of the rivet, because a piece of it has been cut off? A. Well, I don't know how to express that. I cut off the piece where the stitching marks were." He was asked why he "did not leave it in the condition it was. A. Well, that is something I could not explain myself, and why I put the strap back together. I fastened them together, not because I wanted to use the strap again, but simply because I wanted to fasten it together in order to hold both pieces together."

Respondent invokes the familiar rule that a general verdict found for a party litigant in a case imports a finding in his favor upon all the issues in the case, citing Hayne on New Trial and Appeal, § 236, and cases there cited. It is urged that, if the verdict can be supported on the theory that the defendant was guilty of negligence in furnishing an improper hitching strap, it must stand. The court instructed the jury that if they believed from the evidence that defendant—

> "failed to furnish its driver, George Vincent, with a hitching strap strong enough to properly secure its team when it should be left standing unattended on the public streets, * * * and that, while said team was left standing, * * * it * * * became frightened by the firing of a toy pistol, and broke loose by reason of being improperly secured, and therefore ran away, * * * then in such case your verdict must be against the defendant. * * *"

The correctness of this instruction is not challenged. We cannot say the jury were unwarranted in finding that the strap was not such as would properly secure the horses when hitched there with it. If it be conceded that the way Vincent secured the team was a reasonable and sufficient compliance with the ordinance, certainly the means used (the strap) should have been free from defects that would weaken or make it unsafe. The jury had the right to pass judgment upon this point, and were not bound to accept the opinion of the driver that the strap was in his belief safe and sound. It is not necessary, however, to rest the decision upon respondent's contention, and we do not pass upon it.

[7] Some instructions were given (9, 10, and 14) which appellant complains, related to the common-law duty of drivers of horses upon public streets, whereas the action is for violating an ordinance requiring certain particular things to be done. Instruction 9 is illustrative of the other two:

> "The Grayson-Owen Company, while operating its delivery wagons upon the public streets of this city, was in duty bound to exercise ordinary care, vigilance, and foresight to prevent its teams from running away and injuring others upon the streets and using such streets in common with it."

It was perhaps unnecessary to give these instructions, in view of others dealing more directly with the immediate cause of the accident, but we cannot see that they were abstract statements of duty wholly dissociated from the facts of the case. If there were no ordinance requiring horses being used for delivery purposes in a city to be properly secured when left unattended, we think it would be negligence at common law to neglect this precaution against the happening of just such an accident as we have here. In a sense the ordinance is but the statement of a common-law principle. At any rate, it is plain enough to our minds that there was nothing prejudicially misleading in these instructions or calculated to divert the minds of the jury from the issues in the case. The instructions we think quite consistent with the ordinance.

Respondent calls attention to the fact that all the instructions objected to by appellant, particularly instruction 22, were given at the former trial and excepted to, but were not commented upon in the opinion reversing the judgment. We have not felt at liberty to treat the points now made as "deemed to have been passed upon as without merit."

[8] The fact may have some significance, but no point in a case can be said to have been decided, except the one specifically dealt with, and such others as may be said to be necessarily determined by the decision of the point under discussion.

[9] Error is claimed in the instruction given and in the instruction refused as to the effect of an independent intervening cause. It was alleged in the answer that a small boy discharged a pistol twice near the horses, frightening them, and "causing them to spring forward and break said hitching strap, causing them to run away; that said hitching strap was sound and was a perfect hitching strap," and the horses broke away from their fastening and ran "on account of the carelessness and negligence and thoughtlessness of said small boy in discharging said pistol, and not otherwise." Defendant requested, but was refused, several instructions upon this subject, one of which will illustrate the point now made:

> "Damages cannot be recovered in an action for personal injuries, such as in the present one, when an independent act of another person, such as a boy's firing off a pistol near the horses, intervened between the driver, Vincent's, leaving the team and the injury to the plaintiff, if that injury would not have occurred but for such act."

Vincent testified that, when he went into the restaurant to get his lunch, he saw a small boy with a toy pistol standing on the sidewalk almost opposite his team; that he cautioned the boy not to snap the pistol; that, after entering the restaurant, he heard the report of the pistol and started immediately for his team, and as he reached the door he heard another report, and before he got through the door the horses broke loose. The court gave the following instruction:

> "I charge you that it is immaterial in this case, so far as plaintiff's right to recover damages is concerned, whether a small boy fired off a toy pistol, thereby frightening defendant's horse or not, provided you believe from the evidence that said horses were improperly and negligently hitched by a weak and defective strap, and that they were able to break loose by reason of such improper and negligent hitching."

Appellant relies upon a rule which, when applied to a proper case, may be said to be well settled:

> "That an injury is not actionable which would not have resulted from the act of negligence, except for the interposition of an independent cause."

Respondent aptly replies that:

> "Counsel has lost sight of the fact that, if the horses were negligently hitched by a weak and defective strap, this was a continuing act of negligence. Every moment the horses were so hitched, the defendant was negligent. His negligence was continuing. Under such circumstances, the act of the boy in firing the pistol is not an independent act, but a mere concurrent act, and the defendant is liable notwithstanding."

Among the cases, in our appellate courts, illustrating the principle are Pastene v. Adams, 49 Cal. 87, which was a case of piling timbers, so that some of the ends protruded, and when run into negligently were thrown down injuring plaintiff; Barrett v. S. P. Co., 91 Cal. 296, 27 Pac. 666, 25 Am. St. Rep. 186, was a turntable case; Spear v. United Railroads, 16 Cal. App. 637, 117 Pac. 956, was the case of a collision between an express wagon and a street car.

The doctrine was quite exhaustively treated by Mr. Justice Henshaw in Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 158 Cal. 499, 504, 111 Pac. 534, 536 (31 L. R. A. [N. S.] 559, 139 Am. St. Rep. 134), where the plaintiff was injured by the explosion of gas which the defendant gas company had negligently allowed to escape, and which was ignited through the negligence of the proprietor of the restaurant where the gas was escaping. After giving some examples to show the application of the principle involved, the learned justice says:

> "The cases serve to illustrate the true rule, which is that the independent wrongful act, to constitute the proximate cause by displacing the original primary cause, must be so disconnected in time and nature as to make it plain that the damage occasioned was in no way a natural or probable consequence of the original wrongful act or omission."

The case here falls clearly within the class treated in Merrill v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. If the horses were negligently hitched, and this negligence was the cause of the injury, defendant's liability cannot be escaped because of the contributory negligence of the small boy. As said in the case last cited, "Each is and both are the proximate cause of the injury." The instruction given was a correct statement of the law, and it was not error to refuse the instructions requested by defendant.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

On Petition for Rehearing.

CHIPMAN, P. J. No new points are made, and while it is not improbable that we have mistaken the force of defendant's principal objection to the judgment, namely, that instruction numbered 22 given by the court was prejudicial error, we see no reason for opening the case for further argument.

Appellant is in error in assuming that it was said in our opinion heretofore filed that this "is the fourth judgment and order denying a motion for new trial." The statement, as it appears in the opinion on file, is:

> "This is the second appeal taken by the defendant in the case, and is from the judgment and order denying motion for new trial."

It was not our intention to express any opinion on the merits, for we had none, and feel quite sure that nothing in the opinion can be so understood; but, if so, we freely withdraw the same.

The petition is denied.

We concur: BURNETT, J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. RABER. (Cr. 1835.)

1. Homicide (§ 29*)—Conspiracy—Intent.

Where defendant and two others conspired to rob decedent of her jewelry and money, and during the process one of the conspirators choked decedent to death while defendant searched her apartments for valuables, it was not material to defendant's guilt of murder that the actual killing was done by his co-conspirator, since each of the parties to a criminal enterprise is responsible for all acts done by the other in the prosecution thereof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. § 47; Dec. Dig. § 29.*]

2. Homicide (§ 18*)—First Degree Murder—Perpetration of Robbery—Intent.

Where certain conspirators killed decedent in the perpetration of a robbery, they were guilty of murder in the first degree, as provided by Pen. Code, § 189, though neither had contemplated decedent's death as a part of the transaction.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Homicide, Cent. Dig. §§ 24–31; Dec. Dig. § 18.*]

3. Criminal Law (§ 729*)—Trial—Opening Statement—Conduct of District Attorney.

Defendant and D., with another, conspired to rob decedent, and in carrying out the plan D. killed her. The district attorney, in his statement of facts to the jury, said that after the return of the prisoners to Sacramento D. had told the whole story, "told of a plan engineered by defendant and suggested by C. to rob," at which point defendant's counsel interposed, whereupon the district attorney withdrew the statement as to what D. had stated and told the jury that he had no right to state the confession of D., and asked the jury to pay no attention to it. Held, that the district attorney, under such circumstances, was not guilty of prejudicial misconduct.

4. Criminal Law (§§ 419, 420*)—Evidence—Hearsay.

Where defendant and D. were arrested for killing decedent, evidence that, while they were confined in jail, D. stated to his fellow prisoners that he and not defendant killed decedent was inadmissible as hearsay.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 973–983; Dec. Dig. §§ 419, 420.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 814*)—Instructions—Circumstantial Evidence.

Where, in a prosecution for homicide, the unlawful killing and defendant's participation therein were affirmatively shown by defendant's own testimony, though no eyewitness was produced, it was not error to refuse instructions applicable to cases, where the proof is circumstantial only, that a conviction is not warranted unless the proof is inconsistent with any theory or hypothesis other than that of defendant's guilt.

6. Criminal Law (§ 829*)—Trial—Requests to Charge—Instructions Given.

A requested instruction dealing with the presumption of innocence was properly refused, where the subject was sufficiently covered by instructions given.

7. Criminal Law (§ 781*)—Trial—Instructions—Admissions of Accused—Weight.

It was not error to refuse to charge that evidence of oral admissions of defendant ought to be viewed with caution, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 2061, providing that the jury is to be so instructed "on all proper occasions," since such instruction is mere commonplace and may be given or refused without error.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Samuel J. Raber was convicted of murder, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. M. Inman, of Sacramento, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SLOSS, J. Samuel J. Raber was found guilty of the murder of Cherry de St. Maurice, and sentence of death was pronounced. He appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1, 2] The proof of appellant's guilt was complete and convincing, and no question of the sufficiency of the evidence is made. It was shown that Cherry de St. Maurice, the deceased, was the keeper of a house of ill fame, known as the Cherry Club, in Sacramento. One of the inmates was a woman named Cleo Sterling. The information on which Raber was tried charged him, jointly with Cleo Sterling and one Drumgoole, with the murder. It was shown that the three had united upon a plan to rob the deceased of her jewelry and money. Drumgoole and Raber entered the Cherry Club with the connivance of Cleo Sterling, were admitted to her room, and, after there disguising themselves by blackening their faces and otherwise, gained admission to the room occupied by Cherry de St. Maurice. The woman was seized and overpowered, and while one of her assailants held her, the other searched the room and found a quantity of jewelry. In the course of the struggle, Cherry de St. Maurice was choked to death. Raber and Drumgoole, after removing their disguises, left the house with their booty. They made their way to San Diego, where they were apprehended in the effort to dispose of some of the stolen jewelry. After their return to Sacramento, Raber made a confession which embraced the foregoing facts relating to the robbery and killing. His testimony in his own behalf was to the same effect. He claimed, in his confession and at the trial, that he had had no intention of killing the woman, and that the violence which caused her death had been inflicted by Drumgoole while he, Raber, was searching for valuables. Whether the actual killing was done by one or the other is entirely immaterial. Each of the parties to the criminal enterprise was responsible for all acts done by the other in the prosecution of that enterprise. Nor is it of the slightest consequence that the conspirators may not have intended to bring about their victim's death. The killing, having occurred in the perpetration of robbery, was murder of the first degree. Pen. Code, § 189.

[3] The appellant claims that his rights were prejudicially affected by a declaration of the district attorney. That officer, while making a somewhat elaborate statement of the facts to be proven, said that, after the return of the prisoners to Sacramento, Drumgoole had "told the whole story. He [Drumgoole] commenced with his leaving Reno with Raber; told of coming to Sacramento; told of a plan engineered by Raber and suggested by Cleo to rob. * * *" At this point defendant's counsel interposed, whereupon the district attorney said: "Excuse me: I will take that back. I have no right to state the confession of Drumgoole." He went on to say to the jury that any confession of Drumgoole was not testimony against the defendant, and directed or requested the jury to "pay no attention to anything he had stated that Drumgoole had said." The mere statement of what had occurred should be sufficient to answer the claim of prejudicial misconduct. The prosecuting officer, immediately upon objection being made, withdrew his statement regarding Drumgoole's confession, and frankly admitted to the jury that such confession could not be used against Raber, and should not be considered against him. Such prompt retraction would, except under extreme and unusual circumstances, remove the possibility of prejudice. Here the conditions were not such as to make the impropriety of the statement irremediable. The reference to Drumgoole's confession had gone no further than to indicate the formation of a plan of robbery. That such plan had been made and carried out, and that Raber was an active participant in it was admitted by the appellant himself. If it be said that the suggestion that such plan was "engineered" by Raber might have had a harmful effect, the simple answer is that Raber's confession and testimony made it perfectly clear that this description of his part in the enterprise was in substantial accord with the facts as related by himself. Even in the absence of the provisions of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution, we should unhesitatingly hold that the language complained of did not constitute misconduct warranting a reversal.

[4] After their arrest, Raber and Drumgoole were confined in the county jail at Sacramento. The appellant offered to prove, by the testimony of two fellow prisoners, that Drumgoole had stated to them that he, and not Raber, had killed Cherry de St. Maurice. The objection to this testimony was properly sustained. The alleged statement of Drumgoole was clearly incompetent as hearsay.

[5] The remaining points raised have to do with the refusal to give certain instructions requested by the appellant. Two of these were designed to present the proposition that a conviction in a criminal case is not warranted unless the proof made is inconsistent with any theory or hypothesis other than that of guilt on the part of the accused. Instructions embodying this principle have frequently been held to be proper in cases where the proof was circumstantial merely, and in such a case an instruction declaring the rule stated should, if requested, be given. People v. Dick, 32 Cal. 213. But here, while the prosecution produced no eyewitness to the homicide, the unlawful killing of the deceased, and the appellant's participation in that killing, were admitted, or, rather, affirmatively shown, by the appellant's own testimony. In this state of the case, it is difficult to see how there could be any choice between two theories—one pointing to appellant's guilt and the other to his innocence. The appropriateness of the requested instructions to the particular case is, at least, questionable. At any rate, under the facts shown, every substantial right of the appellant was protected by the action of the court in giving, as it did, very full instructions defining reasonable doubt and emphasizing the obligation of the prosecution to establish, beyond such doubt, every material allegation of the information.

[6] A requested instruction, dealing with the presumption of innocence, was refused, but the subject was sufficiently covered by the instructions given.

[7] The appellant requested the court to charge that "evidence of the oral admissions of the defendant ought to be viewed with caution." The Code of Civil Procedure, § 2061, provides that the jury is to be so instructed "on all proper occasions." It is, however, settled by the decisions of this court that such instruction, if not in violation of the constitutional injunction against charging juries on matters of fact, is one that may properly be refused as a "mere commonplace." In short, a judgment will not be reversed either for the giving or the refusing of this instruction. People v. Newcomer, 118 Cal. 263, 50 Pac. 405; People v. Wardrip, 141 Cal. 229, 74 Pac. 744; People v. Tibbs, 143 Cal. 100, 76 Pac. 904; People v. Hower, 151 Cal. 638, 91 Pac. 507.

The appellant makes no other points, and none presents itself to us upon a careful reading of the record. The appellant was fairly tried and justly found guilty as charged.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

TABER et ux. v. PIEDMONT HEIGHTS BLDG. CO. (Civ. 1233.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. July 28, 1914.)

1. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 31*)—Rescission for "Mistake"—Matter Known to be Doubtful.

While, in view of Civ. Code, § 1577, defining a "mistake" as an unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a fact, equity will not relieve against a mistake where the parties to a contract treat upon the basis that the matter is doubtful, or where the parties have knowingly entered into a speculative contract, where the purchasers of a city lot distinctly pointed out to the seller's agent the particular parcel that they were willing to purchase, and distinctly told him that they would not purchase the land to the west of that pointed out, but in reliance upon his mistaken representation that the lot designated as lot 35 on a map was that which they had selected, contracted for the purchase of lot 35, a large part of which lay west of that selected, they were entitled to rescind.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. §§ 35–37; Dec. Dig. § 31.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Mistake.]

2. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 34*)—Rescission—Misrepresentation.

Purchasers of a city lot had a right to rely upon representations of the seller's agent that the lot selected by them was the lot designated as lot 35 on a map, and the vendor could not escape responsibility by showing that the purchasers might have ascertained that such representations were untrue, though the agent believed his representation to be true.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Vendor and Purchaser, Cent. Dig. § 39; Dec. Dig. § 34.*]

3. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 341*)—Recovery of Purchase Price—Right to Recover Interest.

Under Civ. Code, § 3288, providing that in every case of oppression, fraud, or malice, interest may be given in the discretion of the court, and section 1917, providing that interest is payable at the rate there specified on all moneys "after they become due," in a suit to rescind a contract for the sale of a city lot for mistake as to the location of the lot covered by the contract, where though it appeared that the vendor's agent misrepresented its location, it further appeared that he was honestly mistaken, and that there was no fraud, willful concealment, or misrepresentation of facts, interest was recoverable on amounts paid by the purchasers only from the date of their election to rescind.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

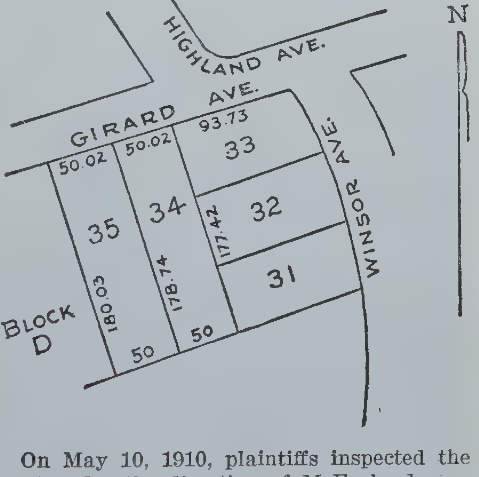
Action by Charles A. Taber and wife against the Piedmont Heights Building Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald & Abbott, of Oakland, for appellant. L. D. Manning, of Oakland, for respondents.

CHIPMAN, P. J. This is an action for the rescission of a contract for the purchase of a certain lot designated as lot 35 in block D upon defendant's map of Piedmont Knoll, Oakland, and to recover judgment for the money paid on account of said purchase. Plaintiff had judgment as prayed for from which, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

The pleadings are verified; and most of the material averments of the complaint on which plaintiff relies were denied in the answer. As the findings follow quite closely the averments of the complaint, the issues will sufficiently appear from the findings of fact, which we proceed to state.

Plaintiffs are husband and wife. Defendant was, at all times mentioned in the complaint, the owner of lots 34 and 35 in said block D, and one Andrew McFarland was defendant's agent, with authority "to exhibit the lands and negotiate agreements of purchase of the lands of defendant." The following sketch of part of block D is necessary to an understanding of the findings and testimony in the case:



On May 10, 1910, plaintiffs inspected the land under the direction of McFarland—

> "as agent of defendant, for the purpose of selecting, and plaintiffs did then and there select a piece of land and did inform Andrew McFarland, as agent for defendant, that they selected and would purchase the piece of land on which they then stood; that plaintiffs were at that time unfamiliar with the designations and descriptions of the land, and Andrew McFarland, as agent of defendant with intent to induce plaintiffs to purchase a piece of land, paced the distance from a point which he stated to plaintiffs was the probable line of Winsor avenue, and stated the distance to be about 143 feet from Winsor avenue, and walked over the piece of land so selected by plaintiffs, and pointed out to plaintiffs the approximate boundary lines thereof and exhibited to plaintiffs printed copy of the map of Piedmont Knoll, and stated to plaintiffs that such piece of land so selected by plaintiffs was designated on said map as lot No. 35 in block D. At that time a person unfamiliar with the land could not determine the true line of Winsor avenue or the true lines as designated on the map of the land selected by plaintiffs from an inspection or examination of the land. The plaintiffs relied solely upon such representation of Andrew McFarland, and from such recommendations believed that the land selected by them was designated and described as lot 35, block D, on the above-mentioned map, and were solely induced thereby to execute the contract admitted in evidence, made and entered into on May 10, 1910, and following the selection of such land, by the terms of which contract plaintiffs agreed to purchase and defendant agreed to sell" the lot above described as lot 35. "That on or about September 29, 1911, plaintiffs were informed by said Andrew McFarland as agent for defendant that a mistake had been made in the description of the piece of land selected by plaintiffs and that lot numbered 35 did not designate the land intended to be sold by defendant to plaintiffs, and did not include the land selected by plaintiffs. That plaintiffs thereupon demanded that defendant agree to convey to them the piece of land so selected by plaintiffs, but defendant refused on such demand to so agree to convey the land so selected. That the land selected by plaintiffs lies on the side of a knoll or raise at and above the level of the street and of the surrounding land, excepting a small part in the rear of the lot, and it is desirable for a residence site, while lot No. 35 lies adjoining and almost wholly in a hollow or depression below the level of the street and of the surrounding land, is partly filled ground, and is less desirable and is of less value for a residence site than the land selected by plaintiffs. The greater portion of the land selected by plaintiffs would be in lot No. 34 and a small portion in lot 35 of said block D. That at the time of executing such contract of purchase plaintiffs and Andrew McFarland believed the land described in such agreement as lot numbered 35 was identical with and was the proper description of the piece of land selected by and designated by plaintiffs to Andrew McFarland, as agent of defendant, as the land plaintiffs desired to purchase, and plaintiffs had no knowledge to the contrary until so informed by said Andrew McFarland on or about September 29, 1911. That plaintiffs would not have purchased said lot No. 35 nor have entered into such contract of purchase had they not relied upon and acted upon such representations of Andrew McFarland that plaintiffs were purchasing and entering into an agreement to purchase the land selected by plaintiffs. On October 2, 1911, plaintiffs notified defendant that they rescinded the agreement for the purchase of the land designated as lot No. 35, and plaintiffs offered to restore to defendant everything of value received under the contract by plaintiffs, and did tender a transfer in writing executed by plaintiffs conveying and releasing to defendant all interest held by plaintiffs in lot No. 35. That plaintiffs performed all the covenants of the agreement of purchase on their part to be performed, and paid $738.48 taxes and installments under the terms of the agreement. The interest accruing on the sum of $738.48 computed from the dates of the payment of the several installments up to October 2, 1911, the date of rescission, is found to be $55.93, and the additional sum of $25.44 interest computed from October 2, 1911, to this date. The allegations of the answer are untrue, except as above found."

As conclusions of law the court found:

"That the consent of plaintiffs to the above-mentioned contract was not mutual; that plaintiffs did not purchase the land now known to be designated and described as lot No. 35 in block D on said map, and that the designation in the contract of the land to be purchased as being lot No. 35 was agreed to by plaintiffs in the sense of being a description of the parcel of land indicated by plaintiffs to defendant at the time of selection as being the land they intended to purchase. That on October 2, 1911, plaintiffs rescinded such agreement as to lot No. 35. That plaintiffs are entitled to judgment as prayed for in the complaint upon conveying to defendant all interest received or held by them in lot No. 35 above mentioned."

Defendant presents but two questions in its brief: First. "Can a purchaser of a city lot rescind the purchase upon the ground of mistake in location, when he knew at the time of the purchase that he did not know the location, except approximately; in other words, is section 1577 of the Civil Code to be extended and enlarged so that mistake can be predicated on conscious ignorance of a material fact, as well as upon unconscious ignorance?" Second. Where there is no fraud, oppression, or malice, is it proper in a suit for rescission to charge interest from the date of payment on the land, and before the plaintiff has elected to rescind and while he is still making his payments and treating the contract as subsisting?

[1] Defendant does not in its brief attack the findings of fact as unsupported by the evidence; indeed, its points are based upon the findings. The argument proceeds upon the assumption that rescission is sought on the ground of mutual mistake which section 1577 of the Civil Code defines as "an unconscious ignorance or forgetfulness of a fact," while it is claimed that "all the evidence shows that the ignorance was conscious ignorance" of the location of the lot.

> "And there being no unconscious ignorance of that material fact, but rather a conscious ignorance, there was no mistake at all entering into the contract. The contract was based upon facts that were known to be doubtful. The plaintiffs knowingly made a speculative contract, and now cannot allege mistake simply because they speculated upon the location of the lot and do not now know and never knew its exact location."

Defendant brings to its aid the rule as stated in 9 Cyc. 398:

> "Where the parties treat upon the basis that the fact is doubtful, and the consequent risk each is to encounter is taken into consideration in the stipulations assented to, the contract will be valid, notwithstanding any mistake of one of the parties."

The rule is elaborated in 2 Pomeroy on Eq. Juris. § 855, quoted in Colton v. Stanford, 82 Cal. 351, 388, 389, 23 Pac. 16, 16 Am. St. Rep. 137. The cases put by Mr. Pomeroy presuppose—

> "an arrangement based upon uncertain or contingent events purposely as a compromise of doubtful claims arising from them, and where parties have knowingly entered into a speculative contract or transaction—one in which they intentionally speculated as to the result—and there is in either case an absence of bad faith, violation of confidence, misrepresentation or concealment or other inequitable conduct." "In such classes of agreements and transactions," says the learned author, "the parties are supposed to calculate the chances, and they certainly assume the risks, breach of confidence, misrepresentation, culpable concealment, or other like conduct amounting to actual or constructive fraud."

Defendant still further relies upon the rule as stated in Ashcom v. Smith, 2 Pen. & W. (Pa.) 211, 21 Am. Dec. 437, where acreage was estimated. The court said:

"Equity will indeed relieve against a plain mistake, as well as against misrepresentation and fraud. But can mistake be alleged in a matter which was considered as doubtful, and treated accordingly? Where each of the parties is content to take the risk of its turning out in a particular way, chancery will certainly not relieve against the event."

The difficulty we find is in applying these very sound equitable principles to the evidence and findings of fact in the present case. The testimony of both plaintiffs, corroborated by friends who were present when they all went together with Mr. McFarland to view the lot, is very clear that plaintiffs distinctly pointed out to McFarland the particular piece or parcel of land and no other that they were willing to purchase, which turned out to be lot 34 instead of lot 35. They as distinctly told McFarland that they would not purchase the land which all present saw lay west of the land selected and "down in a swale or draw," some 25 feet below the street grade. Plaintiff Charles A. Taber testified:

"He, McFarland, had his map with him and he said the corner lot which faced east and the key lot (34) immediately back of it, according to his map, were sold, but he said, 'This lot here'—of course, while he had his map, and the numbers on it, I didn't pay any particular attention to the numbers because I was looking at the ground and noticing the topography of it and he stepped it off in a way. He said, 'Now this lot is 50 by 178 feet,' and I said, 'Does any of it go down in that swale or draw?' He says, 'No, not a bit of it, the west line of the lot as you will see, is right along the edge of it.' Well, I went to stepping it off. He says, 'It is 140 feet from the corner lot, but I can't locate the corner very well as the road has not been laid out as it should be, and we haven't the lines yet.' Well he paced it off and seemed satisfied with it, and I saw him go down into the fill just below the western edge of this high ground. I said, 'Now, we don't want to go down there at all.' He said, 'No, you are not coming down here at all.' And we were very well satisfied with it; we agreed on the terms, and got into the machine and drove back home. He wrote out a receipt for the money that we were to pay at that time, and I thought no more about it, leaving it entirely to Mrs. Taber."

Mrs. Taber testified:

"About the 10th of May, 1910, we all went out with Mr. McFarland in the automobile, Mr. Taber and Mr. Neece and my daughter and myself, and Mr. McFarland showed us the lot, and we said immediately that we would like that lot there, but we did not want the one in the hollow; that we wouldn't have it under any considerations. Mr. McFarland said, 'We are standing right on the lot.' And we walked to the back of the lot and all around, and we said, 'Are you sure this is the right lot?' and he said, 'Yes.' I saw them pacing it off, but I didn't know anything about pacing."

Some months later, Mrs. Taber thought it was in February, she went to McFarland's office to pay her monthly installment and said:

"Mr. McFarland, I think there is some mistake about the lot. He says, 'Oh, Mrs. Taber, don't worry; it is all right.' I says, 'Mr. McFarland, is it on the top of the hill, on the very ridge?' and he said 'Yes'. I says, 'It is not the one in the hollow, is it?' and he says, 'No.' It was along in February, I guess, that we had this conversation. The first time I asked him to go out and see about it, and he said for me to go; he said for me not to worry."

At another point in his testimony Mr. Taber testified:

"From our standpoint the lot that we selected was the only one of the two that we would care to consider at all. We made that point very clear to Mr. McFarland. I was standing on the fill just to the west of the lot we were selecting and looking at, and I told him that we didn't want to go down there at all under any circumstances. He says, 'No, your line is just east of this.'"

It is very certain that plaintiffs did not believe that they had "knowingly entered into a speculative contract or transaction—one in which they intentionally speculated as to the result," a condition which Mr. Pomeroy says is essential to the application of the rule relied upon by defendant. Nor was this (the location of the lot) "a matter which was considered doubtful and treated accordingly, where each of the parties" was "content to take the risk of its turning out in a particular way," as was essential to the rule given in Ashcom v. Smith, supra.

[2] Much reliance is placed by appellant upon finding 10:

"That at the time of executing such contract of purchase plaintiffs and Andrew McFarland believed the land described in such agreement as lot No. 35 was identical with and was the proper description of the piece of land selected by and designated by plaintiffs to Andrew McFarland, as agent of defendant, as the land plaintiffs desired to purchase."

McFarland's belief may acquit him of intentional misrepresentation or fraud, and we think the finding should be so understood, but as the sales agent of defendant, his belief does not acquit him of having sufficient knowledge or means of knowledge as to the location of the subdivided tracts he was selling to warrant his giving the assurances on which plaintiffs founded their belief and on which they relied and paid their money. The finding that they believed that they were getting the land they selected and pointed out to McFarland is entirely consistent with the finding that they were acting upon his confident assurance rather than upon any belief they may have had, and the evidence in no wise tends to show that as to the location of the lot they were intentionally speculating, or that they were taking the risk of getting the piece of land they selected. Plaintiffs had a right to rely upon the representations of defendant's agent "and the seller cannot escape responsibility by showing that the purchaser might have ascertained that such representations were untrue." Morris v. Courtney, 120 Cal. 63, 52 Pac. 129.

[3] The court made a finding of unpaid accrued interest to the date of rescission, to wit, $55.93, and interest computed from date of rescission to date of the judgment, to wit, $25.44. There is no allegation in the complaint of fraud or willful concealment or misrepresentation of facts, and there is no such finding. The court found that McFarland believed that the land selected by plaintiffs was the land intended in the contract. In this he was mistaken but, so far as appears, honestly mistaken. There was no rescission until October 2, 1911, and it seems to us the rule warrants no interest prior to that date. It is true that section 3288, Civil Code, provides that:

> "In every case of oppression, fraud, or malice, interest may be given, in the discretion of the jury."

We find nothing in the pleadings, evidence, or findings justifying the claim that any one of these elements entered into the transaction. Kiger v. McCarthy Co., 10 Cal. App. 308, 101 Pac. 928, bears no resemblance to the case here; nor does Morris v. Courtney, 120 Cal. 63, 52 Pac. 129. There was nothing due plaintiffs from defendant until they rescinded, and the action there was for money had and received and not on the contract. In the absence of an agreement to pay interest, the law only awards interest upon money from the time it becomes due. Civ. Code, § 1917; Hayt v. Bentel, 130 Pac. 432. The error may be corrected upon the appeal from the judgment inasmuch as it clearly appears from the findings and may be corrected by an amendment to the judgment.

Interest prior to October 2, 1911, will be stricken out of the judgment, and otherwise the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

SALO v. SMITH et al. (Civ. 1226.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 7, 1914.)

1. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 8*)—UNLAWFUL DETENTION—LIABILITY OF OFFICER.

Where a sheriff believing that plaintiff had committed an assault with intent to murder, lawfully arrested him, but, in order to determine the character of the offense, depending on the recovery of the person injured or otherwise, kept plaintiff in jail without filing a formal charge against him and taking him immediately before a magistrate, as required by Pen. Code, § 849, the officer was guilty of a trespass, and liable to plaintiff for the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 68–73; Dec. Dig. § 8.*]

2. FALSE IMPRISONMENT (§ 36*)—TRESPASS—DAMAGE.

In an action against a sheriff for false imprisonment in keeping plaintiff in jail an unreasonable time without filing a formal charge against him and taking him before a magistrate, as required by Pen. Code, § 849, defendant's answer was held insufficient, and plaintiff moved for judgment. The complaint merely alleged that such wrongful detention had damaged plaintiff in the sum of $25,000, and admitted that there was no element of malice. The case was submitted without any evidence as to plaintiff's character, standing, or earning capacity. Held, that the court was entitled to consider the sheriff's absence of malice in mitigation of damages, and that an order awarding plaintiff nominal damages only was correct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see False Imprisonment, Cent. Dig. §§ 110, 113–115; Dec. Dig. § 36.*]

3. PLEADING (§ 350*) — MOTION FOR JUDGMENT ON PLEADINGS.

A motion for judgment on the pleadings is, in substance, both a motion and a demurrer, challenging the complaint to state a cause of action or the answer to state a legal defense, and also operates as a motion for the entry of judgment without further proceedings, in which case the court becomes the exclusive judge of both the law and the facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1053, 1054, 1070–1077; Dec. Dig. § 350.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; Emmet Seawell, Judge.

Action by E. Salo against John K. Smith and the Pacific Surety Company. Judgment for plaintiff for nominal damages, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. D. L. Held and T. J. Weldon, both of Ukiah, for appellant. Clarence F. Lea and T. J. Butts, both of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

HART, J. This is an action for damages for the wrongful detention of the person of the plaintiff, and grows out of the arrest of the plaintiff by the defendant Smith, as sheriff, and the failure of that official to comply with the mandates of section 849 of the Penal Code, which provides:

> "When an arrest is made without a warrant by a peace officer or private person, the person arrested must, without unnecessary delay, be taken before the nearest or most accessible magistrate in the county in which the arrest is made, and an information, stating the charge against the person, must be laid before such magistrate."

It appears that the defendant Smith was the sheriff of Sonoma county, and the defendant surety company surety on his official bond, at the times mentioned in the complaint.

The complaint alleges:

> "That on the 2d day of January, 1911, and within four months prior thereto, a felony had in fact been committed in the county of Sonoma, state of California, to wit, the crime of assault with a deadly weapon with intent to commit murder; * * * that the defendant John K. Smith, sheriff as aforesaid, had reasonable cause to believe the plaintiff to have committed the same."

It is further alleged that, on the 10th day of October, 1910, said sheriff, by virtue of his duties as such officer, and without a warrant of arrest, took the plaintiff into his custody, in the city of Point Arena, in Mendocino county, and thereupon removed him from said county to the county of Sonoma, where he incarcerated him in the county jail of the latter county; that said sheriff did detain said plaintiff in said county jail, and thus restrain him of his liberty until June 1, 1911, when, the plaintiff having been acquitted by a jury of the above-mentioned charge, said sheriff discharged him and restored him to liberty.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The gravamen of the plaintiff's complaint is then set forth as follows:

"(6) That on said 10th day of October, 1910, there was in said city of Point Arena, and during all of the time intervening between said 10th day of October, 1910, and the 30th day of January, 1911, there was in said Santa Rosa, a magistrate, competent, willing, able, and ready to have taken before him this plaintiff and to have laid before him an information stating the charge against this plaintiff, and during all of said time such magistrate was accessible and convenient, and this plaintiff was, during all of said time, physically and mentally in a condition to be brought before such magistrate.

"(7) That said defendant John K. Smith did not as such sheriff, or at all, take this plaintiff before any magistrate in the county in which he so arrested this plaintiff, or elsewhere, or at all, until January 30, 1911, nor did said defendant, as such sheriff, or at all, lay any information, stating the charge against this plaintiff, or any information against him at all, before said or any magistrate until January 30, 1911, nor was this plaintiff at all taken before any magistrate until said January 30, 1911; nor was any information at all laid against him until said January 30, 1911; and in this behalf plaintiff alleges that the delay in so taking him before a magistrate and in so laying an information against him was unnecessary."

It is alleged that that portion of the restraint imposed by said defendant sheriff between October 10, 1910, and January 30, 1911, "and so much of said detention as occurred between said dates, was in excess of, and an abuse of, the power vested in said defendant sheriff, as such," etc.; "that by so much of said detention as occurred between January 2, 1911, and January 30, 1911, this plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $25,000."

The joint answer of the defendants admits the arrest of the plaintiff under the circumstances as described in the complaint; admits that the defendant sheriff did not lay any information or prefer any charge against said plaintiff before any magistrate until January 30, 1911, and admits that, during all of the time the said defendant had the plaintiff in his custody, a magistrate was accessible and convenient; alleges that the defendant sheriff did not and could not know what charge to place against the plaintiff, "for the reason that the person assaulted was dangerously injured, and it was thought that he would not live, but would succumb to the injuries so inflicted upon him by the assault made upon him, and in that case the charge would have been murder, and that the delay in filing the complaint against said plaintiff was caused by the inability of the defendant John K. Smith to determine what charge should be placed against him"; denies "that by so much of said detention of plaintiff as occurred between the 2d day of January, 1911, and January 30, 1911, said plaintiff has been damaged in the sum of $25,000, or any other sum or at all."

When the cause was called for trial, the plaintiff, claiming that no legal defense to the cause of action alleged in the complaint was set up by the answer, applied to the court for judgment upon the pleadings. The defendants, admitting that a tort had been committed by the defendant sheriff against the plaintiff, consented to the motion, and the court thereupon rendered judgment upon the pleadings in favor of the plaintiff and awarded him nominal damages—the sum of $1. This appeal is by the plaintiff from said judgment.

The complaint against the judgment is that the court abused its discretion in the matter of assessing damages; the contention being that, on the facts as disclosed by the pleadings, the plaintiff was entitled to an award of substantial or compensatory, as distinguished from mere nominal, damages.

[1] That the plaintiff was entitled, on the facts stated and admitted by the pleadings, to a judgment is not and cannot be questioned. The only question is whether, under the facts, the trial court abused its discretion by awarding merely nominal damages.

No evidence showing the extent of the injury suffered by the plaintiff by reason of the tort or trespass complained of was presented to the court, and the complaint merely alleges general damages. It does not set up special damages, or, as is said in the written opinion of the learned trial judge, filed on rendering the decision herein and which is incorporated in the record:

"The complaint does not in a general way, or at all, state the business of plaintiff or that he suffered or sustained loss by reason of humiliation or disgrace, occasioned by said detention, or suffered from loss of time or inability in any way to follow the ordinary avocations of life. In other words, his station in life, earning ability, or opportunities to earn money in any way whatsoever are not alleged or suggested by the pleadings."

[2] The complaint admits that the defendant sheriff, in arresting and detaining the plaintiff, acted upon probable cause—that is, that he had reasonable ground for believing that the plaintiff had committed a felony—and this admission removes from said act of the sheriff any element of malice which might be inferred from a general undisputed allegation of an arrest effected without a warrant of arrest. Thus it will be observed that the trial court was without the aid of facts more specific than those contained in the complaint upon which to form a judgment in the matter of the admeasurement of damages. In other words, the court was required to base its assessment of damages upon a general statement or charge that a trespass had been committed upon the person of the plaintiff and without being apprised of the extent of the injury suffered by the plaintiff. As the trial court said in its opinion:

> "The court had, and has, no means of knowing the moral character, standing, or earning capacity of the plaintiff. The court did not even have an opportunity to observe him, and knows nothing of his past or present history or of his prospects for the future. All that it can know of him, touching his character, even in a limited degree, is the fact that there was reasonable cause to believe that he had committed an assault with intent to commit murder."

With much force the trial court then inquires:

> "On such a statement as here presented should the court award to plaintiff nominal damages, or damages in the sum of $100, or $500, or $5,000? Which of the three amounts would best comport with justice, without any evidence or suggestion touching the extent of his injury?"

That the sheriff had the right to arrest and detain the plaintiff is not disputed, and the fact that that official did not, immediately, upon making the arrest, formally charge the plaintiff with a felony constituted nothing more than a technical trespass. The complaint does not say that the plaintiff would have been the better able to have released himself, at least temporarily, from his detention had the sheriff promptly complied with section 849 of the Penal Code; nor is it to be inferred from the mere general statement of the sheriff's failure to comply with said section that the plaintiff's condition, so far as his personal liberty was concerned, would have been any different from what it was. He was not precluded from applying for bail by reason of the fact that he had not been formally charged with the felony for which he was arrested and being detained. Indeed, it does not appear that he applied for or was refused bail. Moreover, it is an admitted fact—necessarily admitted by the motion for the judgment—that the sheriff's delay in preferring a formal complaint before a magistrate against the plaintiff was due to uncertainty as to the nature of the charge which the circumstances might require should be made, whether that of murder or of assault to commit that crime, such uncertainty arising by reason of a doubt existing at the time of the plaintiff's arrest and for a long period of time thereafter as to whether the assaulted party would recover from, or succumb to, the serious wounds inflicted upon him. While this fact constituted no defense to the action, it nevertheless showed an absence of malice, and therefore constituted an element which the court was authorized to consider as in mitigation of damages.

It is true, as counsel for the plaintiff assert, that "physical inconvenience, mental suffering and humiliation of mind are all elements of general compensatory damages," and it is also true that evidence of such damages is admissible under the general statement of damage, or, perhaps it is more accurate to say, under a general statement of the tort or trespass. But, as has been made to appear, no evidence was offered in this case to show the extent of the injury following from the trespass alleged. And we may in this connection remark that, if this was a case in which it had been made to appear that the plaintiff's arrest and detention were without probable cause, then his position that upon a general statement in his complaint of such trespass he would be entitled, as a matter of law, to substantial or actual damages would doubtless be sustainable. But, as we have shown, this is not such a case.

The cases of Lick v. Owen, 47 Cal. 252, Taylor v. Hearst, 107 Cal. 272, 40 Pac. 392, and Von Schroeder v. Spreckels, 147 Cal. 186, 81 Pac. 515, and Page v. Mitchell, 13 Mich. 63, 86 Am. Dec. 75, are cited by the plaintiff in support of his position here. The three cases first mentioned were actions for libel, and the Michigan case was one for an unlawful arrest. They are not in point here for at least two reasons: (1) In actions for libel, where, as in those cases, the publication is not privileged, the law implies malice (Civ. Code, § 47, and the cases above named), and in cases of tort, where the defendant has been guilty of oppression, fraud, or malice, actual or implied, the jury may, in addition to the allowance of actual damages, impose upon the defendant exemplary damages, "for the sake of example and by way of punishing the defendants" (Civ. Code, § 3294). (2) All the cases referred to were tried before juries and verdicts returned, and two of the libel cases and the Michigan case were reversed because of instructions limiting the juries to the finding of nominal damages only. In the other libel case the order granting a new trial was affirmed.

1. In this case there is no pretense that the act of the sheriff involved malice, either express or implied, or that oppression or fraud characterized it in any degree. To the contrary, as shown, the plaintiff himself absolves the defendant sheriff from any malice or imputation thereof in the act of arresting and detaining the plaintiff by alleging that such arrest and detention were supported by probable reason for believing that he (the plaintiff) had committed the felony for which he was so arrested and detained.

2. The case here was not tried before a jury to which it was necessary to submit instructions upon the law pertinent to the facts.

[3] The trial court, in this case, in awarding judgment upon the pleadings, and assessing damages, acted in a dual judicial capacity. This proposition necessarily follows from the very nature of a motion for such a judgment; for a motion for judgment upon the pleadings is, in substance, both a motion and a demurrer. While it is, in effect, a demurrer, because it challenges the sufficiency of the complaint to state a legal wrong or that of the answer to state a legal defense, as the case may be, it, at the same time, operates as a motion for the reason that it is an application for an order for judgment. 31 Cyc. 606, and cases cited in the footnotes. It follows, therefore, as before declared, that the court in this action was required to exercise two different kinds of judicial functions: Firstly, it was called upon to determine the question, purely one of law, whether the plaintiff was entitled to any judgment upon the pleadings; secondly, having decided that the plaintiff was entitled to such a judgment, it was required to determine the question, which perhaps may be said to be one of mixed law and fact, as to the extent of the damage suffered by the plaintiff; that is, what damages, when measured in money, would satisfy the ends of the justice of the case as the same was disclosed by the facts before it. In other words, the latter function involved the determination of a question of mixed law and fact because said question, having been submitted to the court, required a determination by it of what damages in law the defendant was entitled to under the facts as disclosed by the complaint. But, in exercising that function—that is, in the determination of the quantum of damages—the court, in practical effect, acted in the place of a jury, and certainly it cannot be said that in that regard it was vested with any less discretion than a jury would have been had the case upon the facts been so tried and decided.

In this instance the court became the exclusive judge of both the law and the facts, and so was authorized to conclude and decide, as we think a jury would have been justified in concluding and deciding upon similar facts, under appropriate instructions, that, under the law, the facts justly justified the award of nothing more than nominal damages. If, to be more explicit, the case as it stands as to the facts had been submitted to the determination of a jury and a verdict for nominal damages returned, it could not well be argued that this court could say, as a matter of law, that the plaintiff was entitled to substantial damages, and that the conclusion so reached by the jury was therefore erroneous or not warranted by the facts. As we view the case, the situation here, so far as is concerned the decision of the question of damages, which is a question of fact, is precisely the same as if said question were submitted to the arbitrament of a jury, and it is no more within the competence of a reviewing court to annul a judgment rendered and entered under such circumstances as are shown here than it would be to set aside a judgment entered upon the verdict of a jury founded upon facts similar to those to which the court was confined in the matter of the assessment of damages in this case.

Our conclusion is, as before stated, that the case as it was submitted to the trial court was one in which the conclusion was forced that the omission of the sheriff to make a formal complaint against the plaintiff, as required by the Code section mentioned, involved nothing more than a mere technical trespass, from which the plaintiff could have suffered no substantial injury or actual damage.

HART v. JORDAN, Secretary of State.

(S. F. 7137.)

1. ELECTIONS (§ 126*)—PRIMARY ELECTION—CANDIDATES OF DIFFERENT PARTIES FOR SAME OFFICE.

Primary Election Law (St. 1913, p. 1389) § 5, subd. 4, providing that nothing contained in the act shall limit the right of any person to become the candidate of more than one political party for the same office on complying with the requirements of the act, but that no person shall be entitled to become a candidate for more than one office at the same election, authorizes a member of one political party, seeking a nomination for an office, to become the nominee of another party for the same office by his own initiative or through the action of five electors, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 118; Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

2. ELECTIONS (§ 21*) — PRIMARIES — CANDIDATES—CONDITIONS—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

By Const. art. 2, § 2½ (Amendment 1908), directing the Legislature to enact laws providing for direct nominations at primary elections, and to determine the tests and conditions on which electors, parties, or organizations of electors shall participate, the Legislature may prescribe tests and conditions for candidates as well as for electors, but is not bound to make membership in a party a condition of the right to seek the nomination of that party.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Elections, Cent. Dig. § 15; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

3. ELECTIONS (§ 126*)—PRIMARY ELECTIONS—CANDIDATES—PARTY AFFILIATION.

Since, by Primary Eelection Law 1913 (St. 1913, p. 1379), the selection of candidates of a party for political offices is committed to those who have declared their affiliation with that party, such persons, to wit, the members of that party, may select as their candidate one affiliated with another party or with no party.

In Bank. Petition by William H. H. Hart, for writ of mandamus against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State, to require respondent to cancel the certificate of nomination of U. S. Webb, as a candidate of the Republican party for the office of Attorney General, or, if no certificate has been issued, to omit the name of Webb as a candidate of the Republican party and to substitute petitioner's name therefor. Denied.

Louis Montgomery, of San Jose, and S. C. Denson and Chas. L. Thompson, both of San Francisco (Wm. H. H. Hart, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. The petitioner, a qualified elector, who had registered as a member of the Republican party, was a candidate for the nomination of said party for the office of Attorney General at the primary election, held on August 25, 1914, under the provisions of the Primary Election Law of 1913. Stats. 1913, p. 1379. At the same election U. S. Webb, a qualified elector of the Progressive party, having appointed verification deputies under subdivision 2a of section 5 of the act, was a candidate of said Progressive party for its nomination for the same office. Said Webb was also a candidate for the Republican nomination for the same office, having been proposed as such candidate by five qualified electors "registered as intending to affiliate with" the Republican party, pursuant to subdivision 2b of section 5 of the act. At the primary election, Webb received a plurality of the votes cast for the Progressive nomination, and also a plurality of the votes cast for the Republican nomination. The petitioner, who received the second highest number of votes for the Republican nomination, avers that the Secretary of State is about to issue, or has issued, to Webb a certificate of nomination as the Republican candidate and to certify Webb's name to the various county clerks and registrars as that of the regular nominee of the Republican party for said office of Attorney General to be voted for at the general election to be held on November 3d. The present application is for a writ of mandate requiring the respondent to cancel such certificate of nomination, if he has issued one, and to omit Webb's name as candidate of the Republican party, substituting therefor the petitioner's name, in certifying names of nominees to county clerks and registrars.

[1] The petitioner's contention is that a member of one party, seeking its nomination for an office, cannot at the same time, by his own initiative or through the action of five electors, be a candidate for the nomination of another party for the same office. That the act, by its direct terms, authorizes such candidacy for the nomination of two or more parties, is too plain for argument. Subdivision 4 of section 5 provides that:

> "Nothing in this act contained shall be construed to limit the rights of any person to become the candidate of more than one political party for the same office upon complying with the requirements of this act, but no person shall be entitled to become a candidate for more than one office at the same election."

[2] This being the clear intent of the framers of the act, we cannot see in the provision any violation of constitutional restrictions. By the amendment of 1908, adding section 2½ to article 2 of the Constitution, the Legislature is directed to enact laws providing for direct nominations at primary elections, and to determine the tests and conditions upon which electors, parties, or organizations of electors shall participate. Under this section, the Legislature may prescribe tests and conditions for candidates, as well as for electors. Soc. Party v. Uhl, 155 Cal. 776, 103 Pac. 181. But it is not bound to make membership in a party a condition of the right to seek the nomination of that party.

[3] The selection of candidates of the party is, under the law, committed to those who have declared their affiliation with it. If they (the members of that party) seek to select as their candidate one affiliated with another party, or with no party, that is their privilege. No violation of fundamental right, or of the traditional practice of parties, is committed. Before the day of direct primary laws, it was not uncommon for a convention of one party to nominate a member or a candidate of another party, and there is no constitutional reason for saying that the same thing may not be authorized to be done by the direct action of the electors of the party.

The writ is denied.

WILLIAMS v. JORDAN, Secretary of State.
(S. F. 7138.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 24, 1914.)

In Bank. Petition for writ of mandamus by Helen K. Williams against Frank C. Jordan, as Secretary of State. Writ denied.

Louis Montgomery, of San Jose, and S. C. Denson, and Chas. L. Thompson, of San Francisco (Wm. H. H. Hart, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner.

PER CURIAM. Application for writ of mandate. The facts presented by this application are in legal effect the same as those presented in Hart v. Jordan, 143 Pac. 537, this day decided. Upon the authority of that case, the petition for writ of mandate is denied.

REDONDO IMPROVEMENT CO. v. O'SHAUGHNESSY et al.

1. Limitation of Actions (§ 84*)—Suspension—Absence from State—Mortgages—Original Owner or Mortgagor.

The running of limitations in favor of a subsequent grantee of mortgaged premises is not suspended by absence from the state or by any other act of the original owner or mortgagor, but where the original mortgagor left the state after she had parted with her title, and in turn her grantee was and remained out of the state, so that from 1905 until 1911 the only two persons who were necessary and proper parties defendant, in an action to foreclose, were both out of the state, such absence suspended the running of limitations, as provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 351.

2. Mortgages (§ 461*) — Foreclosure — Different Source of Title.

Since the presence or absence of a subsequent conveyance on the record in the proper office, when an action to foreclose a mortgage on the property is commenced, is the conclusive test as to whether the holder need or need not be made a party defendant, so as to bind him by a foreclosure decree, evidence, in a suit to foreclose, that defendant held title under an alleged owner of the mortgaged premises, whose title was subsequent to the mortgage and did not appear on the record, was inadmissible, though the mortgagee had actual notice thereof.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Redondo Improvement Company against Catharyn O'Shaughnessy and others. Decree for complainant, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Lucius M. Fall, of Los Angeles, for appellants. Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Edward E. Bacon, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to foreclose a mortgage. Defendant O'Shaughnessy, mortgagor and former owner of the property, executed her note and mortgage in 1904. The debt matured three years thereafter. In 1905 she sold and conveyed the mortgaged property to Ellen O'Brien, who afterward conveyed it to Alice B. Sullivan. She in turn conveyed it to George L. Mullen, and he in turn to Ida B. Moreland, defendant and appellant. Ellen O'Brien held record title to the property only from the 25th day of July, 1905, to the 1st day of August, 1905, when her conveyance to Alice B. Sullivan was recorded. It is stipulated by the parties that the original owner and mortgagor, O'Shaughnessy, and her grantee by mesne conveyance, Alice B. Sullivan, were and remained continuously out of the state of California. Alice B. Sullivan made her conveyance to George L. Mullen by deed of quitclaim on the 2d day of March, 1911. This deed was recorded upon the 9th day of October, 1911. On that same day George L. Mullen's quitclaim deed to defendant and appellant Ida B. Moreland was recorded. This action was commenced on October 14, 1911, within a few days after the recordation of the deed from Alice B. Sullivan to George L. Mullen and his quitclaim deed to appellant Moreland. It was, however, commenced more than four years after the maturity of the note and mortgage. Judgment passed for plaintiff.

[1] Ida B. Moreland, the present holder of the record title, appeals, urging that the judgment is erroneous in that the running of the statute of limitations in favor of a subsequent grantee of mortgaged premises is not suspended by absence from the state or by any other act of the original owner or mortgagor. This principle is well established. Lord v. Morris, 18 Cal. 483; McCarthy v. White, 21 Cal. 496, 82 Am. Dec. 754; Grattan v. Wiggins, 23 Cal. 25; Lent v. Morrill, 25 Cal. 499; Barber v. Babel, 36 Cal. 11; Wood v. Goodfellow, 43 Cal. 185; California Bank v. Brooks, 126 Cal. 198;[1] Filipini v. Trobock, 134 Cal. 441, 62 Pac. 1066, 66 Pac. 587; Brandenstein v. Johnson, 140 Cal. 31, 73 Pac. 744. Respondent does not question it, but points out its inapplicability to the facts in the case at bar; the vital difference being that it is not asserted here that the running of the statute of limitations is suspended because of the act or absence of the mortgagor after she had parted with title, but because, in turn, her grantee, Alice B. Sullivan, herself was and remained out of the state of California. Consequently, during the time of such absence, the running of the statute was suspended in plaintiff's favor, and its right of foreclosure could not be barred if, as here, after the lifting of the suspension, the action was timely brought. In brief, up to 1911 the only two persons necessary and proper parties defendant in the action to foreclose were both out of the state. Their absence worked a suspension of the running of the statute of limitations against plaintiff's right of action. Code Civ. Proc. § 351. Respondent's position is well taken.

[2] Appellant contends that from a different source she has become the owner of this property, freed from the mortgage lien. This source, as set up in her answer, is the following: She asserts that in 1907 one John F. Sullivan was the owner of the mortgaged property; that in February of that year, under execution sale on a judgment secured by her against John F. Sullivan, she received a sheriff's deed to the property. It is not contended that John F. Sullivan had any record title to the property. Indeed, it is conceded that he never did have such a record title. But appellant sought to introduce evidence showing that she was in fact such owner, and that plaintiff had knowledge of her claim of interest in the land growing out of this sheriff's deed prior to the maturity of the note. This evidence was excluded by the court, and it is here argued was erroneously excluded. Respondent's position is that, as Sullivan never held any record title, the sheriff's deed of his interest to Ida B. Moreland and her recordation of that deed could not affect the rights of the mortgagee under his mortgage; appellant's contrary position being that the mortgagee would be bound by actual notice that she claimed ownership under the sheriff's deed.

Appellant, however, confuses the application of the doctrine of notice in fact with the doctrine of constructive notice by recordation. Her reliance upon the language of Filipini v. Trobock, supra, is misplaced. In that case this court was dealing with the effect of a deed made prior to the making of the mortgage but recorded thereafter. The rights of a mortgagee in such a case are defined by section 1214 of the Civil Code. Unless such a prior conveyance is first recorded, it is void as against a mortgagee "in good faith and for a valuable consideration, whose conveyance is first duly recorded." But one cannot be such a mortgagee in good faith if he has actual notice of the prior conveyance. So when it is said in Filipini v. Trobock, supra, "the deed under which the appellant claims was recorded before the maturity of the note, and it is the record of such a deed, not actual notice, which determines the right of the grantee to be made a party to the foreclosure in order to be bound by the decree," the court is there dealing only with the right of a grantee to be made a party to the action of foreclosure, and is simply declaring that this right depends upon the recordation of the instrument and not upon actual notice of its existence, as declared in section 726, Code of Civil Procedure. It is not referring to any actual notice given to a prospective mortgagee, by virtue of which actual notice he could not successfully assert that he was a mortgagee in good faith with a mortgage claim superior to that of the grantee, who had served upon him actual notice. So in Hibernia Savings & Loan Society v. Farnham, 153 Cal. 578, 96 Pac. 9, 126 Am. St. Rep. 129, the same question was involved of the right against the mortgagee of a prior grantee of the mortgaged property. And, having reference to the position of the plaintiff as an innocent incumbrancer in good faith, it is there said:

> "The opinion in this case clearly indicates the conclusion compelled by the express terms of section 1214 of the Civil Code, viz., that the statute of limitations cannot begin to run in favor of one claiming under an unrecorded conveyance as against a mortgage given subsequent to the execution and delivery of the conveyance, for a valuable consideration, which is first duly recorded, in the absence of actual notice of such conveyance to the holder of the mortgage, until such conveyance is recorded."

Where, however, as in this case, the grantee is not a prior grantee, and therefore, as to him, no question can arise of the good faith of the mortgagee in accepting his mortgage, the rights of such a subsequent grantee as against the mortgagee arise only from the recordation which our law prescribes. It never arises from mere notice. On this, the language of this court in Hager v. Astorg, 145 Cal. 548, 79 Pac. 68, 104 Am. St. Rep. 68, is conclusive:

[1] 59 Pac. 302.

> "The presence, or absence, of the subsequent conveyance upon the record in the proper office when the action is commenced is the exclusive test as to whether the holder thereof need or need not be made a party defendant, so as to bind him by the foreclosure decree."

It was not error, therefore, for the court to reject this offered evidence touching some unrecorded deed which some one saw in the hands of John F. Sullivan, nor evidence that appellant claimed some interest in the property through and by virtue of such unrecorded instrument and that plaintiff knew it. Under these circumstances, of course, against this respondent, the sheriff's deed to appellant conveyed nothing.

The judgment appealed from is therefore affirmed.

25 Cal. App. 282

NORTHERN LIGHT MINING CO. v. BLUE GOOSE MINING CO. (Civ. 1225.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 7, 1914.)

1. Mines and Minerals (§ 70*)—Mining Lease—Royalties — Action — Complaint —Demand.

A complaint alleging the execution of a mining lease, defendant's entry into possession thereunder, extraction of a certain value of gold, the amount due plaintiff under the lease, and payment of all such amount, except $2,611.68, no part of which had been paid, stated a cause of action for the recovery of such sum.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 192–197; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

2. Mines and Minerals (§ 70*)—Placer Ground—Leases—Construction.

Where a placer mining lease provided for the payment of specified royalties during the year without specifying any particular day for payment, the whole amount of the annual rent matured at the end of the year, and, if not paid, an action would lie whether the rent was payable in money or gold dust.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 192–197; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. Mines and Minerals (§ 70*)—Leases—Rent—Place of Payment.

Where a mining lease omitted to specify the place where rent or royalties were payable, payment should have been made on the premises, and the fact that defendant withheld payment for that reason was no defense to an action to recover the rent or royalties, in the absence of notice to plaintiff to designate a place for payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 192–197; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

4. Mines and Minerals (§ 70*)—Leases—Action for Breach and Royalties—Demand.

Where, in an action for breach of a mining lease and for royalties, defendant denied the breach and alleged a total defense to the cause of action for royalties, so that it appeared that a demand would have been a mere idle ceremony, the making of a demand was not a condition precedent to plaintiff's right to sue.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 192–197; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

5. Pleading (§ 349*)—Judgment on Pleadings—Admitted Facts.

Where, in an action for royalties under a mining lease, the admitted facts showed that plaintiff was entitled to judgment for a specified sum, judgment was properly rendered on the pleadings for such amount, though the answer denied that anything was due.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 1067–1069; Dec. Dig. § 349.*]

6. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Leases—Breach — Defenses — Subsequent Contract.

Where, after defendant had notified plaintiff of its intention to remove its dredger from leased premises prior to the expiration of a mining lease requiring defendant to continue the work as steadily and continuously from the date of the lease as the weather and season of each year would permit during the term, and was actually engaged in moving the dredger off the claims, plaintiff employed defendant to work out and extract the gold from certain pieces of unworked ground which had been left unworked by plaintiff in its previous operations on the claims, under a new agreement, such agreement constituted no defense to defendant's liability for breach of the original lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188–191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

7. Pleading (§ 98*)—Answer—Responsiveness.

In an action for breach of a mining lease and for royalties, an allegation of a custom among miners in the district that, unless it was specifically required by the lease that the lessee operate the leased premises during the whole term, the lessee might cease working and remove from the leased premises whenever he chose was unresponsive to the complaint and stated no defense.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pleading, Cent. Dig. §§ 200, 201; Dec. Dig. § 98.*]

8. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Mining Lease—Breach—Evidence of Custom.

Where a mining lease obligated the lessee to work as steadily and continuously from the date of the lease as the weather and season of each year would permit during the term, a custom among miners in the district that, in the absence of a contrary provision, the lessee was authorized to cease work under the lease whenever he chose was irrelevant.

9. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Leases—Breach—Damage—Evidence.

In an action for a lessee's breach of a mining lease by refusal to continue mining to the end of the term and to pay the prescribed royalties, plaintiff proved the total number of cubic yards of gold-bearing gravel that defendant could have mined between the date work was suspended and the end of the season, the average gold value of such gravel per cubic yard, and the best obtainable or market percentage of royalty for working the claims at the date of the breach or thereafter. Held, that damages figured on the basis of such evidence were not objectionable as uncertain.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188–191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

10. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Leases—Obligation of Lessee—Duty to Work Mine—"From Date of This Lease."

Where a mining lease provided that the lessee agreed to work all the gold-bearing gravel on the claims from rim to rim, wherever it was practical to work the dredger, and to do the work as continuously and steadily from the date of the lease as the weather and season would permit during the term, the lessee was bound to continue the work as steadily as permitted by the weather during the season of each year until the termination of the lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188–191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

11. Evidence (§ 21*)—Judicial Notice—Custom of Miners.

The court will not take judicial notice of a custom of miners that the lessee under a mining lease, in the absence of an express provision to the contrary, should be authorized to cease work under the lease at his election.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 25; Dec. Dig. § 21.*]

12. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Leases—Breach—Duty of Lessor.

Where defendant contracted to mine placer ground under a royalty lease for a specified term, and refused to continue the work at the royalty specified before the end of the term, the lessor was not required to work the ground itself or obtain another lessee to do so as a condition of its right to recover damages against defendant for breach of the lease.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. §§ 188–191; Dec. Dig. § 68.*]

13. Mines and Minerals (§ 56*)—Lease or License—"Lease."

Where an instrument under which defendant took possession of placer claims called itself an indenture of lease, the parties being referred to as lessor and lessee, and provided that the lessor "grants, demises, leases, and lets" unto the lesee for a term of three years, not only the right to mine, but the land itself, and that the lessee should pay "rent," and contained forfeiture and entry clauses, together with clauses against assigning or subletting, the instrument was a lease and not a mere license.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 166; Dec. Dig. § 56.*]

14. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Mining Lease—Breach—Proof of Damage.

Where, in an action for breach of a lease, plaintiff offered the best evidence attainable from which to ascertain its damages, and the difficulty of ascertaining exactly how much plaintiff was injured arose from defendant's breach of the lease, scant attention would be paid to its claim that the damage was not proved with sufficient certainty.

15. Mines and Minerals (§ 68*)—Leases—Breach—Damage.

Under a placer mining lease, defendant was bound to operate its dredger on the claims, not only during the entire period that it operated, but for 67 days additional, and plaintiff was entitled to a specified percentage of what was extracted, however much or little, and of what would have been extracted had the work continued for the entire term. After notifying plaintiff of its election to abandon operations, and before answer, defendant proceeded to move the dredger off the premises, but on the way out it discovered some rich spots on which it worked five days and extracted gold of the value of $13,545.36. Had the dredger continued to work on the ground contiguous to that on which it was working when the notice was given, it would have taken out during the five days a total of $2,500 worth. Held that, in determining plaintiff's damage for breach of the lease, defendant was not entitled to credit for the difference between the amount secured from the rich spots and $2,500, which it would otherwise have extracted, but plaintiff was entitled to royalty on the amount obtained; defendant obtaining credit only for the five days actually consumed out of the total number of working days remaining under the lease.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Northern Light Mining Company against the Blue Goose Mining Company. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fink & White, of San Francisco, for appellant. W. S. Andrews and A. H. Brandt, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The complaint was in two counts to recover damages for different breaches of a written contract providing for the lease of certain gold mining claims, in which plaintiff was the lessor and defendant the lessee. The first count was based upon defendant's failure to pay plaintiff the sum of $2,611.68, the amount due as rent and royalty under the terms of said lease, and the second count sought damages for defendant's refusal to continue dredging on the demised premises for the balance of the term.

Respondent moved for judgment on the pleadings as to the first count, and the motion was granted, and from said order the defendant has appealed. There was a trial as to the second count, and plaintiff obtained a judgment thereon for $8,375, from which also defendant has appealed.

As to the judgment on the pleadings, error is claimed for the following reasons: (1) That the first count of the complaint does not state a cause of action. (2) That the answer thereto states three complete defenses, to wit: There was no money due; there was an executed oral agreement modifying the lease; and a custom existed permitting the abandonment of leased mining ground.

The said first count, after alleging the incorporation of plaintiff and defendant and the execution of said lease, a copy of which is attached and made a part of the complaint, proceeds:

> "(4) That in and by said written agreement or lease the plaintiff granted, leased, demised, and let unto the defendant for a period of three years commencing on the 10th day of May, 1907, and expiring on the 10th day of May, 1910, certain placer mining claims [describing them].
> "(5) That in consideration of said lease the lessee, the defendant herein, covenanted and agreed with the plaintiff to enter upon said mining claims and premises above described and to work the same mine fashion with its steam dredger, known as the 'Alpha,' in a manner necessary to good and economical mining, so as to take out the greatest amount of gold and precious metals possible, with due regard to the safety, development, and preservation of said premises as workable mines; further, the defendant agreed to work all the gold bearing gravel on said claims from rim to rim wherever it was practical to float said dredger and to do said work as steadily and continuously from the date of this lease as the weather and season of each year would permit during the aforesaid term; and said defendant further agreed to pay and deliver to said lessor as royalty and rent 33⅓ per cent. of all gold and precious minerals extracted from said premises during any single year until the gross yield during any single year should have amounted to $50,000, and thereafter during said year to pay and deliver to said lessor as rent and royalty 40 per cent. of all gold and precious minerals extracted from said premises in excess of said $50,000, until the gross yield during any single year should have amounted to $200,000; and defendant further agreed to pay to the plaintiff as rent and royalty for said premises 50 per cent. of all gold and precious minerals extracted in any single year in excess of $200,000. These royalties to be so paid were to be of like assay as those retained by the lessee, and payment was to be made at such time and place as the lessor, the plaintiff herein, should direct.
> "(6) That thereafter, upon the execution and delivery of said agreement of lease, the defendant entered upon the aforesaid described premises and commenced mining thereon as aforesaid; that during the year 1909 the defendant extracted gold from said premises valued in the sum of $62,084.64; that of said sum of $62,084.64 the plaintiff was entitled under its said contract to the sum of $21,500.51; that the defendant has paid to the plaintiff the sum of $18,888.83 and no more; and that there is now due, owing, and unpaid to the plaintiff from the defendant the sum of $2,611.68."

[1] In brief, then, the complaint sets out the execution of a lease of mining property by plaintiff to defendant, the entry thereunder by the latter into possession of said premises, the extraction therefrom of a certain value of gold, the amount due plaintiff under said contract of lease, and the payment of all said amount, except the sum of $2,611.68, no part of which has been paid.

Upon a general view we would conclude that there are thus exhibited all the elements that are usually found and that the rules of pleading require in a cause of action like this. And it may be said that a deliberate consideration of the specific criticism of appellant does not disturb the impression created by a cursory reading of the complaint.

[2] No allegation of a demand for the payment of the rent was essential to the statement of a cause of action. While the lease is somewhat uncertain as to whether the rent or royalty was to be paid in gold dust or bullion alone or in money, the more reasonable construction seems to be the one obviously placed upon the lease by the parties themselves and followed by the court below. The terms used in said lease would indicate that gold dust and money were considered as equivalent, and in the answer it is alleged, substantially, that appellant paid respondent as rent under the lease the sum of $18,888.83. The construction of the lease adopted and acted upon by the parties to it should, of course, prevail, where uncertainty exists as to the precise meaning of any of its terms. The lease also specified the time within which the payment should be made. While no particular day, for obvious reasons, is designated for payment, the defendant was obligated "thereafter during said year to pay and deliver to said lessor as rent and royalty" the amount set forth. The precise time of payment and whether it should be made in more than one installment was left to the discretion of the defendant, but it is clear that the whole amount of the annual rent would be due at the end of the year, and, if not paid, then an action would lie for its recovery, and this complaint was filed after the end of the year. The same result would follow whether the payment was to be made in gold dust, bullion, or money.

[3] Neither can it be said that the designation of a place for the payment was a condition precedent to the accruement of the cause of action. This was a privilege accorded to plaintiff, but, if it failed to exercise the option, the payment should be made upon the premises. If defendant was withholding what was due on the ground that plaintiff had not designated a place for the payment, notice to that effect should of course have been given by the former to the latter. The recital of the foregoing considerations shows that no demand for the payment or delivery of the amount claimed was required before plaintiff would be authorized to institute the action. It is simply the case of an amount clearly due under the terms of the contract when the complaint is filed, and the situation is entirely different from those instances where the cause of action does not accrue until a demand for payment is made. The matter seems so simple as hardly to justify the citation of authorities, although many cases are noted by respondent in support of the action of the court below as to this point.

[4] Manifestly, also, as suggested by respondent, a demand would have been entirely futile. In its answer appellant denies that the lease bound it to work for the full term, and also denies that there is owing to respondent any sum whatever. It also sets up what was conceived to be a perfect defense to the first count of the complaint. To be consistent, then, appellant would have refused to comply with any demand for payment. But the purpose of a demand in a case like this is to afford defendant an opportunity to comply with it without the annoyance and expense of suit; but, when it appears that it would have been unavailing and a mere useless and idle ceremony, the law does not require it. Cox v. Delmas, 99 Cal. 120, 33 Pac. 836. It is clear, therefore, that, if any defect in that regard existed in the complaint, it is shown by the answer to have been entirely without prejudice.

[5] With no less certainty can it be affirmed that the court was justified as to the first count, in awarding judgment to plaintiff on the pleadings.

It was alleged that gold of the value of $62,084.64 was extracted in 1909. This was not denied in the answer. Of this it was alleged that plaintiff was entitled to $21,500.51. This is a matter of computation based upon the terms of the lease. The execution of the lease and entry thereunder are not denied. The complaint alleges that respondent has received of this sum of $21,500.51, on account of said rent, the sum of $18,888.83 and no more. This is not denied in the answer. From the admitted facts, therefore, the conclusion necessarily follows that plaintiff is entitled to judgment for the sum of $2,611.68. In view of the foregoing, it is patent that the denial in the answer "that there is now due, owing, or unpaid to plaintiff from defendant the sum of $2,611.68 or any other sum or sums whatever" involves a mere legal conclusion, arising probably from a misconstruction of the terms of the lease. The proper way to present an issue as to this material question was to set forth facts showing that plaintiff was not entitled to said sum of $21,500.51 or to allege that the full amount had been paid.

[6] Likewise there is no semblance of defense in the claim of an executed oral contract. There is a missing link between it and the written contract of lease upon which plaintiff relied. The allegation is "that after defendant had notified plaintiff of its intention to remove its dredger from said premises, and, while defendant was actually engaged in the moving of its said dredger off the said placer mining claims, plaintiff, through its agents thereunto duly authorized, employed defendant to work out and extract the gold and gold dust from certain small pieces or blocks of unworked ground, which had been left unworked by plaintiff in its theretofore mining operations upon said placer claims, and which were covered with tailings and tailing piles; and in this connection plaintiff agreed to pay and deliver to defendant, as compensation for working out said small pieces or blocks of unworked ground, 80 per cent. of the gross product of gold derived therefrom," and that defendant accepted said employment, and under this agreement took out gold of the value of $13,543.36, and delivered to plaintiff 20 per cent. thereof as agreed, but there is nothing to show that this contract was intended as a substitute for the one set out in the complaint, or, indeed, that the two were related in any manner. We must assume that they were entirely disassociated and distinct. In other words, this declared defense utterly lacks responsiveness and relevancy to the cause of action. Of course it is elementary that, if the answer sets up an affirmative defense, it must state facts which are related to the facts averred by plaintiff and which constitute a defense thereto. 31 Cyc. 157. In the absence of any allegation or circumstance showing that this oral agreement had any relation to the written contract or was intended to modify or affect it in any manner, we must regard said oral agreement as a matter utterly extraneous and inapposite.

"As a matter of pleading, appellant could not avoid a contract alleged in the petition by answering that he had made with appellee another and different contract." Tyler v. Coleman (Ky.) 97 S. W. 373.

Other valid objections to the so-called defense are urged by respondent, but we deem further inquiry as to this point unnecessary and inadvisable.

[7] The third defense is equally without merit. The claim is that it was "a custom among miners of Alaska that, unless it is specifically set forth in the lease that the lessee shall continue to operate the leased premises during the whole term for which the lease is given, a lessee is permitted and has the right to cease working under the lease, and remove from the leased premises whenever he chooses so to do." This is also entirely unresponsive to the complaint. It does not appear how this custom could or did impair the right of plaintiff to receive the rent or royalty provided for in the lease, or in what manner this custom affected the acts of the parties to said contract.

[8] Besides, the terms of the contract as to the time of operation are plain enough, and no evidence of custom would be admissible upon the subject. A contract cannot be varied by evidence of usage. Custom can be shown only when the terms of the contract are obscure or uncertain. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870; Withers v. Moore, 140 Cal. 591, 74 Pac. 159.

In dismissing this first branch of the case, it may be said that no offer was made by defendant to amend its answer, and we must assume that its defense was as fully set forth as the facts would warrant.

In considering the judgment on the second count, we note preliminarily that during the seasons of 1907 and 1908 defendant operated under the terms of the written lease, and the dredge was left at a certain point on the claim during the winter of 1908–09, and on June 4, 1909, work was again started and continued till the 12th of August following. On August 11th preceding, the "manager" and the "managing owner" sent to plaintiff a telegram to the effect that, unless the royalty were reduced to 10 per cent., operations would be suspended. The next day, without waiting for an answer, they abandoned operations and proceeded to move the dredger off the premises. On the way out they were engaged for five days in dredging a rich spot from which was realized quite a sum of money, and on September 1st they left plaintiff's property and did not thereafter return.

Plaintiffs' theory, as stated by its counsel and as appears from the record, was that the defendant was answerable to it for the damage occasioned by the deliberate breach of its affirmative obligation to work the property. It is not disputed by appellant that it did abandon the work, nor is it claimed that the ground into which the dredger was entering on August 12th was not dredgable, or that the season prevented further operations. The sole contention of defendant seems to have been that it was justified in discontinuing the work, for the reason that the remaining ground was not rich enough to enable defendant to dredge it at a profit, and that, if it continued work, the dredger would be so far south at the end of the season that the whole of the next season would be lost in moving upstream to the scene of its next operations.

The measure of damage claimed by respondent was the percentage of the amount of gold that defendant could have extracted after August 12, 1909, had it operated until the end of the season, obtained by deducting from the percentage of royalty, provided for in the agreement, the greatest obtainable or "market" percentage of royalty for working the property at the date of the breach or thereafter. The fairness of the rule is not called in question, but it is claimed by appellant that no damage should have been allowed, for the reason stated above.

[9] In support of its theory plaintiff introduced evidence to show: (1) The total number of cubic yards of gold-bearing gravel that defendant could have mined between August 12th and the end of the season; (2) the average gold value of this ground per cubic yard, and (3) the best obtainable or "market" percentage of royalty for working the claims at the date of the breach or thereafter.

The court found that on August 12, 1909, there still remained on the premises over 70,000 cubic yards of dredgable gold-bearing gravel which had not been worked; that there remained, excluding the five days that defendant used in dredging said rich spot, 67 working days during which it could have mined the premises had defendant continued operations; that the capacity of the dredger was 1,000 cubic yards per day; that the gold-bearing gravel which remained and could have been worked by defendant averaged in value 50 cents a cubic yard; that the greatest obtainable or market royalty for working the premises was on August 12th the date of the breach, and at all times thereafter, not greater than 15 per cent. of the gross amount of gold extracted. It was further found that the defendant had extracted, under the lease, during the year 1909, gold of a value greater than $50,000. By simple calculation, therefore, the conclusion was reached that plaintiff was entitled to damages in the sum of $8,375.

As to these findings of fact, it may be said generally that they are all supported by the evidence, some of which may appear in the consideration of some of the contentions of appellant.

[10] There is no doubt that by the terms of the lease defendant bound itself to work continuously, as far as the weather and the season of the year would permit. Otherwise, what do the following words mean: "To do said work as steadily and continuously as the weather and the season of the year will permit"?

While it is not expressly provided that the work shall continue until the end of the lease, this is necessarily implied in the use of the phrase "from date of this lease." It is thus to be seen that no warrant exists for the contention that appellant might discontinue the work if it proved unprofitable, or by reason of any such custom that was supposed to prevail. It could hardly be made to appear more clearly that appellant was obligated to continue dredging during the entire term of the lease, except when prevented by the weather and the season of the year.

[11] To what we have said as to custom may be added the consideration that no evidence whatever was offered at the trial in proof of such custom, and it is not a matter of which the court would take judicial notice. Section 1875, Code Civ. Proc.

As to the declared executed oral agreement, it was not pleaded to the second count of the complaint, nor was there any evidence offered in its support, and no further comment seems called for.

[12] It is contended that plaintiff could have worked the ground itself or obtained a lessee to do so at a greater profit than it would have received from defendant if it had continued working to the end of the term. The finding of the court, however, is directly opposed to this view, and it is amply supported by the evidence. Of course it is true also that plaintiff was not required to work the ground, but it had a right to rely upon the faith of defendant pledged to the observance of all the terms of the lease.

[13] What has been said is probably a sufficient answer to the claim that the instrument under which defendant took possession of the premises constituted a mere license. It may be added that the instrument is called an "indenture of lease"; the parties are named "lessor" and "lessee"; that by its terms the lessor "grants, demises, leases, and lets" unto the lessee for a term of three years, not only the right and privilege of mining but the land itself, that it provides for the payment of "rent," and contains the forfeiture and entry clauses, and those against assigning or subletting, which are usually found in leases. When the intention of the parties to the instrument has been ascertained, and there is nothing therein opposed to public policy, the covenants must be observed, although it may develop that the bargain may be unprofitable to one or both of said parties.

The point is hardly worth further consideration, and we need not refer to the many cases cited, but we add the following quotation from Walker v. Tucker, 70 Ill. 527, a similar case to the one at bar:

> "The courts must enforce contracts as the parties made them. They cannot superadd conditions or restrictions which the parties have not themselves thought fit to impose, in making their contract. There is nothing in this instrument which authorizes a suspension or abandonment of mining, because it has become unprofitable. * * * It is elementary law that, when the contract is to do a thing * * * possible in itself, the promisor will be liable for a breach thereof, notwithstanding it was beyond his power to perform it, for it was his own fault to run the risk of undertaking to perform an impossiblity, when he might have provided against it by his contract."

Respondent has also cited figures from the record to show that, had defendant continued its operations under the lease till the end of the term, it would at least have made a reasonable profit, but we deem this immaterial.

It is argued that the damages were so uncertain as to be impossible of ascertainment. Of course, reasonable probability is all that is required. To demonstrate the amount of the loss of respondent, it would be necessary to dredge all the gold-bearing ground that could have been worked in the number of days that defendant was idle but should have been employed. This was impracticable, but great care seems to have been taken in furnishing the most satisfactory evidence that was available. The capacity of the dredger, the number of working days left, and the character and quality of the unworked soil were inquired into and disclosed by the testimony of witnesses, and these elements were made the basis of the court's conclusion as to the damage suffered by respondent.

[14] But it is the doctrine of common justice, as well as of the authorities, that, since the difficulty of ascertaining exactly how much plaintiff was injured arose from defendant's breach of its contract, scant attention will be paid to its complaint that greater accuracy was not obtainable. It is said, in Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 244, 48 Pac. 64, that:

> "'Prospective profits,' as damages, present one of the most difficult subjects with which courts have to deal. It is not the law, however, that they can never be recovered. * * * But, where the prospective profits are the natural and direct consequences of the breach of the contract, they may be recovered; and he who breaks the contract cannot wholly escape on account of the difficulty which his own wrong has produced of devising a perfect measure of damages" (citing cases).

[15] Another contention of appellant, in which it seems to have considerable confidence, may be stated as follows: During the five days defendant worked on the isolated rich spots, it extracted gold of the value of $13,545.36. Had it been working on the ground contiguous to that on which it was working, on August 12th it would have taken out, on the ground value found by the court, $500 per day, or the total of $2,500. The claim is therefore that it should be given credit for the difference between $13,545.36, which it actually extracted, and $2,500, which it would have extracted if it had worked according to its contract, or with 22 days' work, which would have been required to extract the larger amount from the cheaper ground. In either event, the result would be to reduce the judgment by $2,761, which is 25 per cent. of $11,045. The court, however, held that appellant was only entitled to a credit for the five days actually consumed in working the said rich spots out of the total of 77 days remaining.

There can be no doubt of the soundness of the court's conclusion. It is not a question of the relative richness of the various spots of gold-bearing soil. Under the contract, it was the duty of defendant to operate its dredger, not only during the entire period that it was operated, but also for 67 days additional. It is equally true that respondent was entitled to the specified percentage of what was extracted, however much or little, and of what would have been extracted had the work continued for the entire term. It was the good fortune of appellant to strike a rich spot, but its operation there was affected by the same terms of the contract, as applied to the other ground. Appellant was bound to pay and deliver to respondent a certain percentage "of all gold and precious minerals extracted" during the entire season.

There is no more merit in the claim that, since no witness testified directly that the unworked ground would average 50 cents per cubic yard in value, the finding to that effect is unsupported. It is not denied that one witness testified that it would average 55 cents a cubic yard, and another that it would average 60 cents a cubic yard; and it is therefore argued that the finding should have been in accordance with one of these figures or a less one, as testified by another witness. Since a higher value would have been supported, appellant is in no position to attack the finding of a lower value. The greater includes the less.

The various positions of appellant, when carefully examined, lead necessarily, we think, to the conclusion that this appeal is quite destitute of merit, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

We concur: CHIPMAN, P. J.; HART, J.

PEOPLE v. PARRISH. (Cr. 267.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 26, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Oct. 22, 1914.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 742*) — Trial — Jury Question—Credibility of Prosecutrix.

In a prosecution for rape of a female under the age of consent, the credibility of the prosecutrix is for the jury.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1098, 1138, 1719–1721; Dec. Dig. § 742.*]

2. Criminal Law (§ 369*)—Evidence—Habits of Accused.

Where it appeared that accused had for nearly a year habitually had intercourse with prosecutrix, evidence of his habitual conduct is admissible, though it includes acts of intercourse after she had reached the age of consent.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 822–824; Dec. Dig. § 369.*]

3. Rape (§ 40*)—Defenses.

In a prosecution for rape on a female under the age of consent, it is immaterial whether accused was the first to have intercourse with the prosecutrix.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 55–59; Dec. Dig. § 40.*]

4. Criminal Law (§ 1169*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

In a prosecution for rape on a female under the age of consent, error in allowing the prosecutrix to testify that accused was the first to have intercourse with her, and that thereafter she had intercourse with others, is harmless, where the evidence of accused's guilt was conclusive.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 754, 3088, 3130, 3137–3143; Dec. Dig. § 1169.*]

5. Criminal Law (§ 1170*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

In a prosecution for rape, where it appeared that accused had, for nearly a year, habitually had intercourse with the prosecutrix many times a week, error in excluding a question to the prosecutrix whether accused maintained his marital relations was harmless, where accused's wife, to rebut the prosecutrix's claim, was allowed to testify that accused continued marital cohabitation during that time.

[Ed. Note—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3145–3153; Dec. Dig. § 1170.*]

6. Criminal Law (§ 683*)—Trial—Rebuttal.

In a prosecution for rape on a female under the age of consent, evidence that accused pulled the covers off of the prosecutrix and another girl, and that he was always fondling the prosecutrix, is not proper rebuttal, and should have been introduced in chief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 1615–1617; Dec. Dig. § 683.*]

7. Criminal Law (§ 1168*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

The improper admission of evidence on rebuttal is harmless, where similar facts were shown by testimony properly introduced in chief.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 3124, 3125, 3129–3136, 3144; Dec. Dig. § 1168.*]

8. Rape (§ 54*)—Evidence—Corroboration of Prosecutrix under Age of Consent.

In a prosecution for rape of a female under the age of consent, the prosecutrix need not be corroborated.

9. Rape (§ 44*)—Evidence.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence that accused called the prosecutrix from the room in which she and the witness were, and had intercourse with the prosecutrix in the next room without closing the door, is admissible, although the improbability of the occurrence goes to its weight.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. § 63; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

10. Criminal Law (§ 1171*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

In a prosecution for rape on a female under the age of consent, the prosecutrix was allowed to testify, over accused's objection, that two other men were being punished for having intercourse with her, but upon the answer being given, the court directed the jury to disregard it. In argument the district attorney attempted to influence the jury, claiming that accused was the principal, and that he should not escape when the others had been punished, and the court, on objection of accused, instructed the jury not to regard anything but the evidence. Held, that the conduct of the district attorney, while improper, was not prejudicial to accused.

11. Criminal Law (§ 369*)—Evidence—Other Offenses.

In a prosecution for rape, evidence of other acts of intercourse are admitted only to show the predisposition of the parties to have intercourse with one another.

12. Criminal Law (§ 1186*)—Appeal—Harmless Error.

In view of Const. art. 6, § 4½, prohibiting reversals for immaterial errors, the giving of an instruction on the purpose for which evidence of other acts of intercourse was received in a rape case, which possibly caused the jury to believe that such acts rendered it probable that accused was guilty, is not reversible error where the evidence of his guilt was strong.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

W. J. Parrish was convicted of rape, and from the conviction and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, and L. G Faulkner, of San Francisco, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Defendant was convicted of the crime of rape, having had sexual intercourse with one Gertrude Genant, a girl under the age of consent, and was sentenced to state's prison for the term of 15 years. He appeals from the judgment of conviction and from the order denying his motion for a new trial.

[1] There is no distinct claim in defendant's brief that the evidence was insufficient to justify the verdict, although it is suggested that much of it is unworthy of belief. The claim is, rather, that defendant did not have a fair trial because of certain alleged errors in the rulings of the trial court and of the alleged misconduct of the district attorney in his address to the jury. Some objections are also urged to the instructions to the jury.

The prosecutrix was 15 years old on March 4, 1912, and the sexual intercourse complained of was alleged to have occurred on or about June 20, 1912, at the county of Butte. Defendant and his wife conducted a boarding and lodging house in the city of Chico. The prosecutrix went to work for the defendant and his wife about May 28, 1912, and continued in their service until some time in August of that year, when she left, returning after a week or 10 days and remained until in January, 1913, when she went away again and was gone about three weeks, returning and remaining until some time in May, 1913, when she left finally because of some trouble she had with defendant's wife. The story of her conduct while at the Parrish House presents a case of shocking moral obliquity scarcely believable in one of her apparent intelligence. She testified that she at first roomed with another of the hired girls, one Annie Hansen, who left about three weeks after the prosecutrix went to work, and she slept alone until Olive Patterson came, she thought two or three weeks after the Hansen girl left. It was after the Hansen girl left and before the Patterson girl came that the first act of sexual intercourse with defendant is claimed to have taken place. She testified: That in the afternoon, towards evening, defendant, his wife, and some of the men boarders were assembled on the porch of the house; that some of the men, she did not know who, sent for beer, and that she drank as much as eight glasses without becoming intoxicated. "After supper he [defendant] wanted me to go to my room with him, and I wouldn't do it, and he asked me if I had ever had intercourse, and I told him no, and he told me that he would show me how, that I was old enough to learn." She was asked if anything happened to her during the month of June, and answered: "After Annie Hansen left, Parrish came in there one morning. He came in and turned on the light, and pulled back the covers, and used me just as he wanted to," which she explained to mean that he had sexual intercourse with her, and that it happened before the Patterson girl came. As stated by the district attorney, "to show the disposition of the parties on the subject," and over defendant's objection, the prosecutrix testified that this sort of intercourse was kept up between them during her stay at the Parrish House and up to the time she finally left, "maybe it would be every other day, or maybe once or twice a day, or maybe every day, maybe once a week." Without objection, she testified as follows:

> "Q. And is it not a fact that you had sexual intercourse with several other men during that time? A. Yes, sir. Q. Where? A. At the Parrish House. Q. Always? A. Yes. Q. And did these young men room at the Parrish House? A. Yes."

It appeared, in the course of her examination and cross-examination, that some six or seven men had these same relations with her, on account of which two of them are serving sentence in the state's prison. She was very searchingly cross-examined, the result being to show a depraved condition of mind, but not necessarily discrediting the incriminating features of her story. Some corroborating circumstances were shown, such as kissing and hugging of the prosecutrix by defendant, and one instance where the witness, Mrs. Marshbank, testified to having seen the parties in the act of copulation. This is said to have occurred in April, 1913, after the prosecutrix had passed her sixteenth year, and the evidence is made the subject of alleged error which will hereinafter be noticed. The defendant testified in his own behalf and flatly contradicted the prosecutrix as to his relations with her, and denied ever having carnal knowledge of her. There was testimony by defendant's wife and by several lodgers and boarders to the effect that they never "saw anything out of the way" between the defendant and the Genant girl, and Mrs. Parrish testified that she saw nothing to arouse her suspicions that anything wrong was going on between them. It was very satisfactorily shown, and much reliance is placed upon the fact by defendant's counsel, that the Patterson girl came to the Parrish House not later than two or three days after the Hansen girl left, disputing the prosecutrix, who testified that it was two or three weeks. It will be observed, however, that she testified that she did not remember exactly how long it was, but she was positive that the first act of intercourse occurred after the Hansen girl left and before the Patterson girl came, and while she was sleeping alone. It was for the jury to reconcile whatever conflict appeared in the testimony, and we find no warrant in the record for disturbing their finding upon the important fact that sexual intercourse took place between the parties as alleged in the indictment.

[2] 1. Defendant's first point is that it was error to allow the prosecution to prove, not only the act charged, but subsequent acts. It is admitted that, in People v. Castro, 133 Cal. 11, 65 Pac. 13, the contrary is held, but it is claimed that what was there said was obiter, and nonconcurred in by one of the justices. Attention is called to the objection made to the testimony of Mrs. Marshbank, who testified to having seen defendant and the prosecutrix in the act, in May, 1913, after the prosecutrix had passed the age of 16. Upon this latter fact we cannot see that the matter of her then age would make any difference in respect of showing the carnal disposition of the parties for which alone it was admissible. It was while the prosecutrix was at the Parrish House, and was but one of an unbroken series of like acts from about May 20, 1912, for nearly a year. Upon the point raised, however, the rule is as stated in People v. Castro, supra. It is well settled that evidence of similar acts of sexual intercourse, both before and after the act charged, is admissible. People v. Gregory, 8 Cal. App. 746, 97 Pac. 912; People v. Soto, 11 Cal. App. 436, 105 Pac. 420; People v. Jacobs, 16 Cal. App. 480, 117 Pac. 615; People v. Williams, 133 Cal. 168, 65 Pac. 323; People v. Mathews, 139 Cal. 530, 73 Pac. 416; People v. Koller, 142 Cal. 624, 76 Pac. 500.

[3, 4] 2. Without objection from defendant, the prosecutrix testified to similar acts during the time she was at the Parrish House with several other men rooming there. Defendant says of this that "necessarily the defense did not, and in the nature of things would not, object to such testimony" inasmuch as "it tended to show the degraded character of the prosecutrix, and later on, as will appear from her cross-examination, she unblushingly admitted a course of conduct on her part with other persons which was and is almost unparalleled." Immediately following this testimony the following question was asked of the prosecutrix: "Q. When was the first time that you performed an act of sexual intercourse with any one?" The question was objected to, but was allowed, and the witness answered that the act charged in the indictment was the first. It was strongly urged that this was very damaging testimony and gravely prejudicial, citing People v. O'Brien, 130 Cal. 3, 62 Pac. 297, that it placed the defendant in the position of having seduced the girl and having made a common prostitute of one of prior chaste character. It was immaterial whether defendant or some other person first had sexual intercourse with the prosecutrix, and the objection should have been sustained. It will be recalled that the prosecutrix testified, without objection, that she told the defendant that she had never had sexual intercourse when solicited by him, and he replied that she was old enough to learn, and that he would teach her. She was then not under oath as when she replied to the question now objected to. It was error to allow the question, but, in view of the evidence tending strongly to show defendant's guilt, we do not think the defendant was prejudiced by the answer.

[5] 3. Upon cross-examination of the prosecutrix the following question was asked by defendant, objected to by the district attorney, and the objection sustained:

> "Q. As you observed it there, what were the relations of Mr. and Mrs. Parrish—were they friendly—did they get along well, as you saw it?"

The objection was that the question was immaterial and incompetent. The purpose of the question, as is claimed, was to show the improbability of the prosecutrix's story of daily sexual intercourse with defendant while his relations with his wife were unaffected; that her story was "a sexualogical impossibility." The defendant was permitted to show, by the testimony of Mrs. Parrish, and did show very clearly what he sought to show rather vaguely by inference in the question objected to, namely, that cohabitation was uninterrupted between them. We discover no prejudicial error here. Defendant seems to have been a man of extraordinary virility if the prosecutrix is to be believed.

[6, 7] 4. Witness Millie Reese, over objection, was permitted to testify in rebuttal that on one morning when she and the prosecutrix were in bed together, the defendant came into their room "and pulled the covers down off their heads." The objection is that it was not admissible at all, but if admissible should have been offered in chief, as it was in no sense rebuttal. Another witness in rebuttal, Mrs. Roberts, was asked whether or not she saw anything familiar or any improper conduct between Mr. Parrish and Gertrude Genant. An objection was overruled, and she answered:

> "He seemed to think a lots of the girl, and he was always picking at the girl and playing with her, and I have seen him pick her up in his arms."

The testimony of these witnesses can hardly be said to be legitimate rebuttal, and such as it was should have gone in as part of the case in chief. But we cannot see that it was of much importance in view of the conduct of defendant otherwise shown.

[8, 9] 5. The principal corroborating testimony was given by Mrs. Marshbank, above referred to, and is particularly attacked as wholly unworthy of belief. She testified that one afternoon defendant came into the room then occupied by her and the prosecutrix, invited the latter to go with him into the next room, which she did, and, without closing the door behind them and in plain view of witness, he forthwith had sexual intercourse with the girl. The alleged improbability is twofold—the shamelessness of defendant and gross immodesty of the witness in standing by as a looker-on. It is not essential that the prosecutrix be corroborated, and hence this testimony may be rejected. We may remark, however, that, in view of testimony given that the Marshbank woman was discharged for having been caught in like performances with a lodger of the Parrish House, and in view of the evidence as to defendant's immoderate passion, the jury, without much stretch of the imagination, might have believed the testimony of this woman, nor is it entirely improbable that this witness saw what she said she did. At any rate, it was admissible, and, whether believable, was with the jury.

[10] 6. Among the assignments of error is the alleged misconduct of the district attorney. When the prosecutrix was being examined in chief, she was permitted, over defendant's objection, to testify that Van Noy and Reitz (two of defendant's lodgers) had committed acts of sexual intercourse with her. "Q. And they are now paying the penalty for it? A. Yes, sir." The court sustained an objection to this question and answer, and instructed the jury "not to consider it. Leave that entirely out of the case." When he was addressing the jury the district attorney, alluding to these other convictions, said:

> "Ask yourselves why the little fellow should suffer when the man who runs the house—
> "Mr. Carlin (interrupting): Note an exception to this statement. There is no evidence on it at all. We ask the court now to instruct the jury, and reprimand the district attorney for this statement.
>
> "The Court: Gentlemen of the jury, you will not consider anything that is not in the evidence. You will remember the evidence, and try the case solely, as I told you, upon the evidence and the instructions of the court and nothing else."

It is complained:

> "That the court declined to instruct the jury to disregard such statements, simply stating that they were to consider nothing but the evidence. That wasn't curing the error. It was dodging it, and you will note that the district attorney, continuing his argument, follows up practically the same line, and finally in the middle of page 200 says: 'Are you going to say that the big fellow who has the money and brings for counsel the shrewd, keen, clever, calculating Carlin, is going to get away with it? * * * $20 tears, that's all.'"

Testimony had gone before the jury without objection that the prosecutrix had cohabited with several men other than defendant. Had the question above noted stopped with naming Van Noy and Reitz, defendant could not complain, but apparently the object was to enable the district attorney to get out the fact that these men were suffering imprisonment and thus lay the groundwork for his appeal to the jury against allowing the defendant to escape because he had money to employ able counsel. But the court had sustained the objection, and the district attorney was guilty of grave impropriety in reminding the jury of a fact which the court in effect told them they must not consider, and seeking to influence them by an unworthy appeal to class prejudice. In a case of considerable doubt, such conduct might require a reversal. In the present case, however, we feel assured that it did not result in a miscarriage of justice. It is fair to assume that the admonition of the court cured the error when first committed. In repeating it later on the record fails to show objection or a call upon the court to compel a withdrawal of the improper remarks.

7. People's instruction numbered 3 is called to our attention as having been "disapproved by our appellate courts, and should not be given." It was upon the question of the credibility of witnesses. Appellant does not point out his ground of objection, nor does he cite any case where such an instruction has been disapproved. In some cases the phraseology used may have required disapproval. We find no error in the form here adopted and given to the jury.

[11, 12] 8. People's instruction numbered 6 was as follows:

> "You are further instructed, that evidence of subsequent acts of sexual intercourse between the defendant and the prosecutrix, and of improper familiarity on the part of the defendant towards and with the prosecutrix, both before and after the time charged in the information, is received and admitted in evidence solely to prove the disposition of the defendant herein toward Gertrude Genant, and as having a tendency to render it more probable that the act of sexual intercourse charged in the information [indictment] was committed by the defendant on the person of said Gertrude Genant, and is to be considered by the jury for that purpose only and for no other."

The objection urged is that this is a charge "upon pure questions of fact"; that all such acts were denied "and the court had no right to assume the facts." This instruction is a correct statement of the law governing the admissibility of the kind of evidence referred to, and, no doubt, was intended to explain the limited purpose for which it is admissible, and we think the jury must have received it in that light alone. It would have been more in keeping with the strict rule forbidding the court from assuming the existence of facts which are controverted, had it declared the rule in the abstract. The instruction, as framed, was liable to be understood by the jury, not only as indicating the purpose of the evidence of subsequent acts, but that the evidence in fact had a tendency to make probable the commission of the act charged. Conceding error, we do not think there was such prejudice as to justify a reversal of the judgment. Section 4½, art. 6, of the Constitution.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

CALIFORNIA CANNERIES CO. v. CANTON INS. OFFICE, Limited. (Civ. 1227.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 20, 1914.)

1. INSURANCE (§ 646*)—ACTIONS ON CONTRACTS—BURDEN OF PROOF.

In an action on a contract of marine insurance, where the answer raised an issue as to whether the contract covered the particular loss for which suit was brought, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to show that defendant had promised to indemnify against such loss.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1555, 1645–1668; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

2. INSURANCE (§ 124*)—CONTRACTS OF INSURANCE—WRITINGS CONSTITUTING.

A certificate issued to plaintiff by brokers certifying that there was insured with defendant $8,098 for account of plaintiff on certain cases of canned goods, loss, if any, payable to assured or order on surrender of the certificate, and that it was understood and agreed that the certificate represented and took the place of the original policy, and conveyed all the rights of the original policy holder for the purpose of collecting any loss or claim as fully as if the property was covered by a special policy, direct to the holder of the certificate, did not purport to be, and was not, a contract or part of a contract of insurance, but a mere memorandum that the brokers had effected insurance with defendant, and as it presupposed the issuance of a policy, it necessarily put plaintiff upon inquiry to ascertain the terms of the policy in order to determine what rights were secured thereby to the policy holder.

3. Insurance (§ 665*)—Insurance Agents—Authority—Sufficiency of Evidence.

In an action on an alleged contract of marine insurance, evidence held insufficient to show that brokers, who issued to plaintiff a certificate certifying that they had effected insurance with defendant, were agents of defendant, or authorized to issue such certificate for defendant.

4. Insurance (§ 651*)—Construction of Contract—Parol Evidence.

In an action on a certificate certifying that plaintiff was insured on certain cases of canned goods on board a steamer "as per policy No. 76491 (English policy conditions)," subject to all the terms and conditions of such policy, evidence was properly admitted that there was a standard form of policy used by all marine insurance companies, known as the English Cargo form policy, and as to the provisions of such policy.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1673–1675; Dec. Dig. § 651.*]

5. Insurance (§ 477*)—Marine Insurance—"Particular Average."

Under a marine insurance contract subject to the conditions of a standard form of policy containing a warranty against particular average, where a part of the goods insured were so spoiled by leakage that they were thrown away, there was no total loss or general average loss, but only a partial and "particular average" loss, which means a partial loss as distinguished from a total or general average loss.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Particular Average.]

6. Insurance (§ 477*)—Marine Insurance—"General Average."

"General average" is a contribution by the several interests engaged in a maritime venture to make good the loss of one of them for voluntary sacrifice of a part of the ship or cargo to save the residue of the property and the lives of those on board, or for extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred for the common benefit and safety of all.

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, General Average.]

7. Insurance (§ 478*)—Marine Insurance—Partial Loss—Entire or Severable Contract.

Under a marine insurance contract, containing a warranty against particular average, there could be no recovery for the total loss of a part of the goods, unless the various lots of goods were separately insured, and there was a total loss of one of such lots.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1230–1238; Dec. Dig. § 478.*]

8. Insurance (§ 646*)—Actions on Contracts—Burden of Proof.

In an action on a marine insurance contract containing a warranty against particular average, assuming that there was a separate insurance upon the various lots of goods covered thereby, the burden was on plaintiff to prove that the goods lost constituted all of one of such lots.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1555, 1645–1668; Dec. Dig. § 646.*]

9. Insurance (§ 640*)—Actions on Contracts—Answer—Admissions.

In an action on a marine insurance contract, the allegations of the answer that the steamship when she left port with the insured goods on board was in an unseaworthy condition, one or more of the plates in her hull having been weakened and damaged by a collision previously sustained, was not an admission that the collision occurred after its liability arose, so as to permit a recovery for a partial loss, notwithstanding a warranty against particular average, unless the damage was caused by collision.

10. Insurance (§ 654*)—Actions on Contracts—Evidence—Admissibility.

Under Civ. Code, § 2681, providing that in every marine insurance contract a warranty is implied that the ship is seaworthy, and section 2682, providing that a ship is seaworthy when reasonably fit to perform the services, and to encounter the ordinary perils of the voyage contemplated by the parties, in an action on a marine insurance contract, evidence that the vessel upon which the insured goods were shipped had been injured in a collision was admissible as tending to show that the vessel was unseaworthy, and that no liability attached, the implied warranty being violated.

11. Insurance (§ 651*)—Actions on Contracts—Burden of Proof.

In an action on a certificate of marine insurance on goods "as per policy No. 76491 (English policy conditions)," subject to all the terms and conditions of such policy, the certificate should be supplemented by proof of the policy itself if actually issued, or if not actually issued, of the form of policy to which the certificate referred.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by California Canneries Company against the Canton Insurance Office, Limited. From a judgment for plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Andros & Hengstler, of San Francisco, for appellant. Asher, Meyerstein & McNutt, of San Francisco, substituted for Barclay Henley, deceased, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. [1] The action is on an insurance policy to recover damages caused by injury to certain canned goods shipped from San Francisco to New York. The alleged value of the goods was $8,098, and plaintiff sought to recover the sum of $2,567.95, and obtained judgment for $2,500. As to the policy and the risks covered by it, we find in the complaint the following allegation:

"That on the 17th day of December, 1909, at said city and county of San Francisco, the said defendant in consideration of $121.47 to it then and there paid, executed to said plaintiff a policy of insurance upon said goods, whereby it promised to pay to the plaintiff, within 30 days after proof of loss and interest, all loss and damage accruing to said plaintiff by reason of the destruction or injury of the said ship or or said goods during the ensuing voyage from the port of San Francisco to the port of New York; and wherein and whereby the said defendant undertook and promised to pay to the said plaintiff whatever damage should result to the said goods, occasioned by collision with any other vessel."

As to this the answer contains the following:

"Admits that, on the 17th day of December, 1909, at San Francisco, defendant executed to plaintiff a certificate of insurance upon 2920 cases canned goods shipped on board the steamship J. L. Luckenbach on her voyage from San Francisco to New York, but denies that it then or there promised, in said certificate, or at all, to pay to plaintiff, within 30 days after proof of loss and interest, or proof of loss or interest, or at all, all loss or damage accruing to said plaintiff by reason of the destruction or injury of said ship or of the said goods during the ensuing voyage from the port of San Francisco to the port of New York, and denies that defendant therein and thereby, or therein or thereby, promised or undertook to pay to plaintiff whatever damage should result to the said goods, by any perils of the sea; but, on this behalf, defendant alleges that it then and there promised to insure plaintiff in accordance with the terms and conditions of its English cargo policy, and not otherwise."

While the terms and conditions of the English cargo policy are not set forth in the answer it is clear that an issue was presented as to whether the particular loss claimed by plaintiff to have been produced by the perils of the sea was covered by the policy which was issued. As to this, the policy being the basis and measure of defendant's liability, it was, of course, incumbent upon plaintiff to show that by its said undertaking defendant promised to indemnify against whatever damage was shown.

Recognizing this duty, the plaintiff introduced in evidence, without objection, what is denominated: "Certificate of Insurance effected by Bates & Chesebrough." From the face of this certificate we quote the following:

"This is to certify, that on the seventeenth day of December, 1909, there was insured with Canton Insurance Office, Ltd., eight thousand and ninety-eight dollars for account of California Canneries Co. on 2920 cases canned goods as per back, valued at sum insured per Str. J. L. Luckenbach, at and from San Francisco, Calif., to New York. Loss, if any, payable to assured, or order, on surrender of this certificate. It is understood and agreed that this certificate represents and takes the place of the original policy, and conveys all the rights of the original policy holder (for the purpose of collecting any loss or claim) as fully as if the property was covered by a special policy direct to the holder of this certificate, and free from any liabilities for unpaid premiums.

On the margin of said certificate appear the capital letters: "F. P. A. E. C." On the back of the certificate were the following words and figures:

Julius Servaes was called as a witness for plaintiff to explain this document, and after stating that he was in the employ of Bates & Chesebrough he testified:

"That is a certificate issued by ourselves for insurance placed with the Canton Insurance Office. We handed that to Mr. Jacobs and received—and the Canton issued a policy themselves or certificate. Q. Well, which? That is the question, Mr. Servaes. You say a policy or certificate? A. Well, it was a certificate in this case, I think. Q. Yes, certificate, and that is the certificate, is it? A. No, this is our certificate. As you say, they were issued with the Canton Insurance Office. It says here distinctly, 'It is understood and agreed that the certificate represents and takes the place of the original policy.'"

After some discussion between counsel as to whether a policy was actually issued by the insurance company, and, if so, what had become of it, defendant, through its attorney, stated that a certificate was issued by defendant and handed to plaintiff and that said certificate was as follows:

"Canton Insurance Office, Limited, of Hong Kong. Parrott & Company, Agents, San Francisco. This is to certify that California Canneries Co. are insured to the amount of $8,098, valued at $8,098 United States gold coin, for account of concerned, on 2,920 cases canned goods marked (blank) shipped on board the S. S. J. L. Luckenbach on her present voyage from San Francisco to New York as per policy No. 76491 (English policy conditions).

"This certificate is subject to all the terms and conditions of said policy; and in case of loss payment will be made only upon its surrender properly indorsed and receipted. Loss, if any, payable in San Francisco to assured or order.

"In witness whereof, the undersigned on behalf of the said Canton Insurance office, Limited, have hereunto set their hands in San Francisco this 30th day of December, 1909.

"[Signed] Parrott & Co., General Agents.
"[Signed] R. H. Menzies, Secy.
"Approved: J. J. Theobald, Manager."

The two foregoing are the only instruments received in evidence which, by any possibility, could be claimed to constitute a contract of insurance. Of course, neither constitutes a "policy" of insurance as that term is generally used and understood, but it is not uncommon for an insurance company to issue a certificate or memorandum of insurance which may answer the purpose of a more formal policy, or may operate as a temporary expedient until the policy itself can be issued.

Of the foregoing certificates it was insisted by the plaintiff that the first, designated "Exhibit A," constituted the contract of insurance upon which the action was founded. It was declared by plaintiff's counsel that it was "the only paper respecting the insurance." Defendant's counsel insisted that "counsel show his contract. He has now introduced a document showing a part of his contract, and showing that on the face of it that this is not the whole contract; and I insist before any further evidence be introduced in this case that the contract, the complete contract, shall be shown." Then the record shows the following:

> "Mr. Henley: What do you mean by the contract?
> "Mr. Hengstler: The contract that he sues on in this case, the contract of insurance.
> "Mr. Henley: Very well. We sue on this certificate.
> "Mr. Hengstler: Read that certificate. It shows on the face of it that it is incomplete.
> "Mr. Henley: No, it don't. Well, the language speaks for itself."

The second document as above set out was repudiated by plaintiff, and indeed it was claimed that it had not been admitted in evidence. The sole reliance was based upon said Exhibit A.

[2] But it seems clear that said Exhibit A does not purport to be nor is it a contract or part of a contract of insurance. Appellant's contention is that Exhibit A is a "mere memorandum made by Bates & Chesebrough, brokers for plaintiff, which informs its holders that Bates & Chesebrough have procured certain insurance upon certain goods from the Canton Insurance Office, Ltd. It does not purport to insure. It is simply a notice signed by Bates & Chesebrough, plaintiff's brokers, which certifies that they have effected insurance with a certain company. Such is the explanation of this instrument made by plaintiff's own witness, Mr. Servaes." This statement of appellant is true as far as it goes, but the certificate means a little more than that. It purports to assign or transfer to the plaintiff "all the rights of the original policy holder for the purpose of collecting any loss or claim." It thus presupposes the issuance of a policy of insurance, and necessarily puts the plaintiff upon inquiry to ascertain the terms of said policy in order to determine what rights are secured thereby to the policy holder.

It is equally clear that the policy itself or evidence of its terms should have been introduced in evidence to show the risks that were covered by the insurance and the extent of defendant's obligation. Assuming that said exhibit was admissible against defendant, it manifestly does not constitute the entire contract, and it refers to another instrument which must be considered as a part of the complete agreement.

[3] Moreover, for said exhibit to be of any force and effect against defendant, it was, of course, necessary to show that said defendant authorized the execution of said exhibit, or else that the principle of estoppel can be properly invoked. On neither ground, however, can respondent's position be maintained. There is no contention of estoppel, and the evidence is insufficient to warrant the conclusion that Bates & Chesebrough were acting as the agents of defendant. It is true that the following appears in the direct testimony of Julius Servaes:

> "Well, now, then, were Bates & Chesebrough authorized by the Canton Insurance Company to issue this paper? A. Yes. Q. And pursuant to that authority you did issue the paper countersigned by yourself? A. Yes, sir."

But his subsequent testimony shows that he was simply expressing his opinion as to the authority of Bates & Chesebrough. This appears from the following questions and answers:

> "Q. Mr. Servaes, does the Canton Insurance Company know anything of this memorandum that Bates & Chesebrough delivered? A. That I really don't know. I think I told them—of course, it has some—
> "Mr. Henley (interrupting): I want to know in plain terms about it.
> "Mr. Hengstler: Wait a minute. Let him first answer the question. A. Well, it is really rather hard to recall this. It is two years ago. I don't know whether I actually told them that we had issued the certificate or not as far as that goes.
> "Mr. Henley: Q. I want to know now in plain terms were Bates & Chesebrough authorized by the Canton Insurance Company to issue that paper? A. That I couldn't tell you."

[4, 5] The only other evidence to the point is directly opposed to the theory of respondent. Mr. Theobald, the marine manager for Parrott & Co., the Pacific Coast agents for defendant, testified that he had never seen Exhibit A "before to-day in this court," that his office had nothing to do with the issuance of it, and that Bates & Chesebrough were not authorized by the Canton Marine Insurance Office "to issue this kind of a document." He further testified that the other certificate to which we have already referred was the only one issued in this case by defendant. In fact, it seems quite apparent from the whole record that plaintiff must look to this certificate as the only basis for its cause of action. It is therefore vitally important that the terms of said certificate be understood and construed. That certificate shows that the insurance was in accordance with the "English policy conditions." What that expression means is then a proper, and, indeed, a necessary subject of inquiry.

Mr. Theobald was properly permitted to explain this technical term and he declared that:

> "All over the civilized world there is a standard form policy, which was started in England, and which is used by all marine insurance companies, which is called the English cargo form policy. The main clause in this policy, as well as I can recollect it, is warranted free from particular average unless the vessel be stranded, sunk, burned, or the damage be caused by collision with another ship or vessel. * * * And if I may be allowed to add to that, if the brokers required a different form of policy, what we call a policy of particular average design, they state on their application that they desire an English form policy, we will say, with a 5 per cent. particular average clause added. * * * Q. In other words, if a merchant desires to insure his goods against partial loss, there is a method of doing that, is there? A. By paying an additional premium at the time the risk is placed with the insurance company. And it is so stated on the application and on the certificate."

Indeed, it is not denied that the law of marine insurance has always recognized two distinct classes of insurance, one against total loss only and the other against total or partial loss, and this distinction finds expression in section 2711 of the Civil Code:

> "Where it has been agreed that an insurance upon a particular thing, or class of things, shall be free from particular average, a marine insurer is not liable for any particular average loss not depriving the insured of the possession, at the port of destination, of the whole of such thing, or class of things, even though it become entirely worthless; but he is liable for his proportion of all general average loss assessed upon the thing insured."

"Particular average means a partial loss as distinguished from a total loss or a general average loss." 26 Cyc. 670. Many cases are cited by appellant to illustrate the distinction, among them being Chadsey v. Guion, 97 N. Y. 333, wherein there was a policy on 1,650 barrels of potatoes, "warranted by the assured free from average unless general." The vessel arrived at its destination, and after 109 barrels had been unloaded, it sank with the remainder on board. It was held that the insurers were not liable because of the warranty against particular average; there being no total loss.

[6] "General average is a contribution by the several interests engaged in a maritime adventure to make good the loss of one of them for voluntary sacrifice of a part of the ship or cargo to save the residue of the property and the lives of those on board from an impending peril, or for extraordinary expenses necessarily incurred for the common benefit and safety of all the interests in the adventure." 36 Cyc. 372.

It is entirely clear that within the meaning of these terms there was here no total loss or a general average loss, but only a partial and particular average loss.

As pointed out by appellant, the goods insured are alleged in the complaint to be "2920 cases of canned fruits to the value of $8098" and the loss alleged is a particular average loss, to wit:

> "That * * * said vessel became leaky while at sea, which caused the waters of the ocean to flow into and around and upon said merchandise * * * which resulted in the determination and spoiling of said merchandise to the extent of $2,567.95, in which sum plaintiff has been damaged."

The total damage was thus alleged to have been less than one-third the value of the goods, and the evidence shows that at most 361 cases were totally lost. These, however, were thrown away after the vessel arrived at New York.

[7, 8] But, assuming that this loss was covered by the policy, it can be of no avail to plaintiff, since there is no evidence that the various lots of goods were separately insured. There is no ground, therefore, for the contention that the F. P. A. clause should be separately applied to each of said lots.

> "Where the subject-matter insured is warranted free from particular average, the assured cannot recover for a loss of part, whether the policy be valued or undervalued, unless the contract contained in the policy, be apportionable; but if the contract be apportionable the assured may recover for a total loss of any apportionable part." Chalmers and Owen Digest of Marine Insurance (2d Ed.) p. 119.

The only pretense for the contention that there was a separate insurance on the various lots of goods is based upon the said enumeration on the back of said Exhibit A; but, as already seen, that instrument does not constitute the contract of insurance between the parties. Moreover, upon the assumption that there was a separate insurance upon the various lots, there is no evidence that the said 361 cases constituted all of one of said lots; in other words, that there was a total loss of any of said lots. The burden of such proof is, of course, upon plaintiff. Merchant's Mut. Ins. Co. v. Wilson, 2 Md. 217. It is equally clear that the evidence does not take the case out of the operation of said F. P. A. clause. The only pretense to the contrary is found in the suggestion that the damage was caused by a collision.

[9] In the first count of plaintiff's complaint it was alleged:

> "That said vessel while in the Bay of San Francisco was run into and collided with the steamship Tallac; that according to the information and belief of plaintiff said collision resulted in weakening one of the plates in the hull of the said steamship J. L. Luckenbach."

While not expressly alleged, it must have been known to plaintiff that this collision took place before defendant insured said cargo. Plaintiff virtually admitted such to be the fact when it confessed the demurrer to the first count on the ground that it did not state a cause of action for the reason "that the allegations showed that the vessel J. L. Luckenbach was unseaworthy at the beginning of her voyage." The trial was had on the second count of the complaint, which contains no allegation as to said condition. The answer does allege, indeed, the collision as follows:

> "And in this behalf defendant alleges, on information and belief that said steamship J. L. Luckenbach, when she left the port of San Francisco, with plaintiff's merchandise on board, was in an unseaworthy condition, one or more of the plates in her hull having been weakened and damaged by a collision previously sustained"

—but, manifestly, this affords no warrant for the intimation that the collision occurred after defendant's liability arose. Indeed, respondent can hardly be serious in the claim since it objected to any evidence as to when the collision took place.

[10] In this connection it may be said that we see no reason why it was not proper for defendant to offer evidence that the vessel had been injured in a collision. This would be a circumstance tending to show that the vessel was unseaworthy within the contemplation of sections 2681 and 2682 of the Civil Code, and therefore that the implied warranty was violated and no liability of defendant attached.

Other important points are made by appellant, but we deem consideration of them unnecessary, further than to say that no judgment for appellant can be directed here upon this record. The findings support the judgment rendered for plaintiff, but they do not warrant nor could they support a judgment for defendant. The most important question that we have considered, of course, relates to the insufficiency of the evidence to support a material finding of the court, and that error can be corrected only on a new trial.

[11] We may suggest, in conclusion, that if on a new trial plaintiff cannot show that "Exhibit A" was authorized by defendant, and it must rely upon the certificate admittedly executed by defendant, this certificate should be supplemented by proof of the policy itself if actually issued or, if not actually issued, of the form of the policy to which said certificate refers.

We think the judgment and order should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

MASON v. SUPERIOR COURT OF LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 1569.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. May 1, 1914.)

MANDAMUS (§ 31*)—JUDICIAL PROCEEDING—TRIAL AND DETERMINATION OF CAUSE.

Where plaintiff, in an action for the annulment of a marriage, had taken all the necessary steps and was properly in court, he was entitled to a timely determination thereof, and the continuance of the trial, on the ground that he had obtained an interlocutory decree and that he wanted to marry again, was arbitrary and unwarranted, and mandamus would issue to compel the court to set the case down for trial and to give it precedence over all cases set for trial subsequent to the day on which it had been continued.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 74, 75; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

Mandamus by John B. Mason against the Superior Court of the State of California, in and for the County of Los Angeles, and Charles Monroe, Judge. Alternative writ made peremptory, with directions.

Hart & Cunningham, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. Ticknor & Carter, of Pasadena, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Upon application of petitioner, an alternative writ of mandate was heretofore issued, directed to the Honorable Charles Monroe, judge of the superior court of Los Angeles county, department 13 thereof, commanding him to proceed with the trial of a certain case, entitled, John B. Mason v. Mamie Wallick Neilly, Also Known as Mamie Wallick Mason, then pending therein, or show cause at a time and place specified why he should not so proceed.

It appears from the petition that petitioner, as plaintiff, commenced an action in said court, the purpose of which was to obtain a decree for the annulment of the marriage of himself and the defendant named in said action. Due service was had upon defendant, who made default therein, whereupon the case was set for trial in said department 13 of said superior court on March 12, 1914, at which time it was called for trial, and plaintiff by his attorneys, after paying the fees of the reporter and complying with all rules prevailing in said court, proceeded with the trial of the case, when, after certain proceedings had and testimony taken, said court did, as alleged, "arbitrarily and without any reason whatsoever, stop the said trial, refuse to hear any other or further testimony or to proceed in any other respect with the said trial, or to grant or deny a decree, or to take the matter under consideration, or to dismiss the said cause, or to nonsuit the plaintiff, or to take any step whatsoever in relation thereto, except to so refuse to further proceed," all of which the return to the court admits, with the qualification, however, that at said time the court continued the further hearing of the case to the 13th day of October, 1914; the reason assigned for so doing being, as appears from a transcript of the testimony taken in said matter, though no answer was filed, that plaintiff in said action had theretofore, on October 9, 1913, obtained an interlocutory decree of divorce from the defendant in said action. The learned judge, as appears from this transcript, was of the opinion that plaintiff was desirous of marrying again. In speaking of the decree of divorce, the judge stated:

"He (plaintiff) got what he asked for. Now, what does he want to do, marry right away?"

And when plaintiff's attorney suggested, that since it had been discovered that defendant was not capable of contracting the marriage (a fact not known to petitioner when the decree of divorce was granted), plaintiff was entitled to an annulment thereof, notwithstanding the fact that an interlocutory decree of divorce had been granted, and asked to submit authorities upon the question, the court replied:

---

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

"Well, you could submit authorities, but I am going to continue the case. I am not going to hurry this up just because a man wants to hurry it up to get married."

There was no evidence that petitioner contemplated marriage.

When properly in court and complying with the rules thereof, litigants are entitled to an orderly and timely determination of causes wherein they are interested, even though they "want to get married." While the law and public policy may place restrictions upon the contracting of marriage, it is not the province of a court so to do. According to the admitted facts, plaintiff was clearly entitled to a trial of his case and to the judgment of the court upon the facts adduced, and the action of the court in arbitrarily continuing the trial thereof was, as shown by the return, wholly without warrant.

It further appears from the return that, since the unwarranted continuance of the case and refusal to try the same, the court has set 40 to 50 cases for trial, which will occupy the time of the court until June 12th or 15th, and that this case cannot be tried earlier than June 15th without discommoding other litigants. Plaintiff should not be deprived of an early trial of this case because of the unwarranted action of the court in continuing the same, and his right and convenience entitle him to have his case restored to the place upon the trial calendar in advance of the cases so wrongfully given precedence in setting them for trial.

The alternative writ will be made peremptory, and the trial court directed to set the case down for trial at the earliest date consistent with the orderly and usual disposition of cases, save and except that this case shall be given precedence over all cases set for trial subsequent to March 12, 1914.

ANDERSON, State Superintendent of Banks, v. NAWA et al. (Civ. 1359.)

1. Appearance (§ 9*)—"General Appearance"—What Constitutes.

An appearance solely for the purpose of moving to dismiss the complaint for delay in the service of process is not a general appearance, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1014, declaring that a defendant appears when he answers, demurs, or gives the plaintiff written notice of his appearance, which subjects the defendant to the jurisdiction of the court for all purposes of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appearance, Cent. Dig. §§ 42–52; Dec. Dig. § 9.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, General Appearance.]

2. Dismissal and Nonsuit (§ 60*)—Delay in Service of Summons.

An unexplained delay of two years and ten months in the service of summons after the commencement of an action will warrant a dismissal of the action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 140–152; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

2. Dismissal and Nonsuit (§ 60*)—Delay in Service of Summons—Ground for Dismissing.

Where the state bank commissioner, who took charge of the assets of a bank for liquidation, delayed for two years and ten months in serving defendants with summons, in an action begun to recover upon their stockholder's liability, the right of defendants to demand that the action be dismissed because of the delay cannot be defeated because the bank's affairs had not been liquidated, and the amount of their liability had not been ascertained; it not being shown when the affairs of the bank, if ever, would be liquidated, that ground being a reason for delay of trial, rather than delay in the service of summons.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 140–152; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

4. Dismissal and Nonsuit (§ 60*)—Failure to Serve Summons—Excuses.

Where a bank commissioner, who had taken charge of the assets of an insolvent bank, delayed for nearly three years in serving defendant, a known stockholder, with summons in a suit on the stockholder's liability, the delay cannot be excused on the ground that the whereabouts of other stockholders could not be ascertained, for under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 414, 578, and 579, governing proceedings where there are several defendants, judgment can be rendered against part of the defendants alone, and so the action might have been proceeded with against defendant, whose whereabouts were known.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 140–152; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

5. Dismissal and Nonsuit (§ 60*)—Grounds for Dismissal—Delay in Service of Summons.

The fact that delay in the service of summons may not have prejudiced defendant is no ground for refusing to dismiss, where the delay is unreasonable.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Dismissal and Nonsuit, Cent. Dig. §§ 140–152; Dec. Dig. § 60.*]

6. States (§ 191*)—Actions by State Bank Commissioner—Nature of Action.

An action by the state bank commissioner to recover against the stockholders of an insolvent bank is for the benefit of the creditors of the bank, and not on behalf of the state in its sovereign capacity; and hence, if the commissioner unduly delay in serving stockholders with summons, the suit may be dismissed, regardless of the rule that laches and limitations does not run against the sovereign.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see States, Cent. Dig. §§ 179–184; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Alden Anderson against Y. Nawa and others and the Swayne & Hoyt Company. From judgments dismissing the action as to the individual defendant and as to all other defendants, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Cutler, of San Francisco, A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, and H. W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant. J. J. Lermen, C. L. Tilden, and W. F. Postel, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. Pursuant to the provisions of the Bank Act (Stats. 1909, § 136, p. 115), this action was instituted by the plaintiff, as state bank commissioner, against the defendants, as stockholders of a banking corporation in liquidation, known as Kimmon Ginko (Golden Gate Bank). Upon motion of the defendant Swayne & Hoyt Company, the action was dismissed upon the ground of unreasonable delay in the service of summons. Judgment was thereupon entered in favor of said defendant. Subsequently the court of its own motion dismissed the action as to all of the defendants on the ground that summons had not been served and returned within three years from the commencement of the action, and thereupon rendered and entered judgment in favor of all of the defendants, including Swayne & Hoyt. The plaintiff has appealed from both judgments. Both appeals purport to have been exclusively taken and perfected under the new or alternative method provided by sections 941A, 941B, and 941C of the Code of Civil Procedure. It is conceded by the plaintiff that both appeals were so taken and perfected, and that the record before us would not support an appeal from either judgment under the old method of appeal. It is further conceded by the plaintiff that, in so far as the appeal from the second judgment is concerned, the essential requirements of the new or alternative method of appeal were not complied with, and that as a consequence we have not before us, under either method of appeal, a duly authenticated record of the proceedings had in the lower court upon the rendition and entry of the second judgment. This being so, it is finally conceded (as indeed it must be) that we have no jurisdiction to hear and determine the second appeal, and that the same must be dismissed.

[1] With reference to the appeal from the first judgment, the record shows that the action was commenced by the filing of the plaintiff's complaint on January 5, 1910, and that summons was issued upon the same date, but not served upon the defendant Swayne & Hoyt until the 16th day of October, 1912. The motion to dismiss was filed November 7, 1912, and granted January 13, 1913. The defendant did not otherwise or for any other purpose appear in the action. The notice of motion to dismiss expressly declared that the defendant appeared in the action solely and specifically for the purpose of the motion; but, even if the notice had been silent in this behalf, the mere making and presentation of the motion was not a general appearance of the defendant in the action which would subject him to the jurisdiction of the court for all of the purposes of the action. Code Civ. Proc. § 1014; Steinbach v. Leese, 27 Cal. 295; Powers v. Braly, 75 Cal. 237, 17 Pac. 197; Olcese v. Justice's Court, 156 Cal. 82, 103 Pac. 317; Vrooman v. Li Po Tai, 113 Cal. 302, 45 Pac. 470; Witter v. Phelps, 163 Cal. 655, 126 Pac. 593.

[2, 3] The motion to dismiss was supported by the affidavit of R. H. Savage, which, after reciting the institution of the action and the failure of the plaintiff for two years and ten months thereafter to serve the defendant Swayne & Hoyt with summons in the action, alleged certain facts and circumstances, which tended to show that the summons could have been served upon the defendant without the slightest difficulty, had the plaintiff so desired, at any and all times after the institution of the action. The averments of the affidavit offered upon behalf of the defendant, and received in evidence in support of the motion to dismiss, were not controverted by the counter affidavit of the plaintiff; and therefore it was an admitted fact upon the hearing of the motion that the plaintiff, if he so desired, could, at all times after the institution of the action, have readily, and without difficulty of any kind, served the defendant with summons in the action.

The power of the court to dismiss upon a showing of undue delay in prosecuting the action is not disputed; and it is conceded that the unexplained and inexcusable failure to serve the summons within two years and ten months from the date of its issuance prima facie constituted good and sufficient ground of dismissal. It is insisted, however, that the showing made by the plaintiff justified and excused the delay in the service of the summons; and that therefore the court below abused its discretion in dismissing the action. This contention is rested primarily upon the assumption that the uncontradicted affidavit made upon behalf of the plaintiff in opposition to the motion to dismiss affirmatively established, not only the fact that the delay in the service of summons was unavoidable, but that such delay helped rather than harmed the defendant.

In this connection the affidavit offered and received in evidence upon behalf of the plaintiff recited in substance that the business and assets of the Kimmon Ginko (Golden Gate Bank) were taken possession of by the plaintiff for the purpose of liquidation prior to the institution of the action; that the outstanding credits due the bank were largely unsecured, and due almost wholly from Japanese clients, and consisted of more than 1,000 separate accounts; that the complicated condition of the affairs of the bank at the time of its suspension rendered necessary a thorough investigation, in order to ascertain what amount, if any, would be required from the stockholders to supply the deficiency existing between the liabilities and the assets of the bank; that, pending such investigation, the action was instituted for the purpose of preventing the statute of limitations from running against the claims of the creditors of the bank and in favor of the defendants as stockholders thereof; that the action could not be fairly and justly pressed against the defendants as stockholders without first ascertaining how much would be realized from the assets of the bank; that the defendant was in no way injured by the delay in serving the summons, because every defense available at the time the action was instituted was just as available after the summons had been served; that the defendant was benefited by the delay in serving the summons in the particular that the plaintiff was thereby enabled to definitely ascertain the exact amount of the defendant's liability; that, because of the large number of stockholders, it required much time to locate many of them; and that, until all of them could be found and served with summons, it was impracticable to press the prosecution of the action.

We are not convinced that the court below would have been justified in finding from the showing of the plaintiff that the delay in the service of the summons inured to the benefit of the defendant. The affidavit made in behalf of the plaintiff in opposition to the motion discloses that the business of the bank was taken over by the plaintiff on July 1, 1909, and that an investigation of its affairs was at once commenced and was still under way at the time of the making of the motion to dismiss. It will thus be seen that for more than three years prior to the motion to dismiss the plaintiff was engaged in investigating the affairs of the bank; and the affidavit in opposition to the motion contains no averment that such investigation had been completed, or that it would ever be completed. Such investigation, perchance, might have resulted in benefit to the defendant; but the defendant was not required to indefinitely postpone its motion to dismiss, nor could it be denied the advantage of the motion merely because the complicated condition of the bank's affairs prolonged the investigation of the plaintiff; and, in the absence of an affirmative showing that such investigation had developed a definite result favorable to the defendant, we are at a loss to comprehend how it was benefited by the delay.

But even if it be conceded that the allegations of the plaintiff's affidavit show that the investigation instituted by the plaintiff would ultimately have resulted in collecting and conserving the assets of the bank, and that thereby the defendant's liability as a stockholder would be correspondingly reduced, this in effect would be asking to excuse the delay in the service of summons upon the ground that the plaintiff was occupied during the two years and ten months immediately following the institution of the action in endeavoring to procure evidence which would definitely fix the amount of the defendant's liability. The necessity for such evidence doubtless would have been favorably considered by the lower court and the defendant as a ground for the postponement of the trial of the action after issue joined; but it could not operate to excuse an unreasonable delay in the service of summons. Caldwell v. The Regents, etc., 23 Cal. App. 29, 136 Pac. 731.

[4] The affidavit interposed upon behalf of the plaintiff, in so far as it related to the claim that the delay in the service of process was unavoidable because of the multiplicity of defendants, was manifestly deficient in not affirmatively and unequivocally alleging that the plaintiff had in good faith endeavored to serve the several defendants with process. The allegation that "it had taken a great deal of time to ascertain the whereabouts of many of them" is very indefinite and uncertain, and is far from being an allegation that the plaintiff had made any effort to serve any of the several defendants after they had been located. Moreover, whatever difficulty the plaintiff may have encountered in locating any one or more of the defendants was not in and of itself a sufficient excuse for delaying service of process upon a defendant whose whereabouts was at all times known to the plaintiff. We know of no good reason why it was impracticable to press the prosecution of the action "until all of the defendants had been found who could be served with summons." The liability of the defendant as a stockholder of the defunct bank was primary and independent, and in no sense and to no extent dependent or contingent upon the liability of the remaining defendants, and the court below, in its discretion, might have rendered a several judgment against the defendant without regard to the liability of the remaining defendants, and regardless of whether or not any or all of the remaining defendants had been served with process. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 414, 578, 579.

[5] The fact that the delay in the service of summons did not operate to deprive the defendant of any defense which he may have had to the action will not suffice to excuse such delay. It cannot be assumed that the defendant did not have a valid defense merely because the action was only to enforce a stockholder's liability. For aught that appears in the showing made by the plaintiff, the delay in the service of summons may have impaired the preparation and presentation of whatever defense the defendant may have had to the action. But, aside from these considerations, the dismissal of an action because of unreasonable delay in the service of the summons may be made "without regard to the merits or demerits of the cause of action. The motion is granted as to a meritorious cause of action, as well as to one without merit, because in either case there has been a failure upon the part of the plaintiff to use the diligence which the law requires to make an end of litigation." Bell v. Solomons, 162 Cal. 105, 121 Pac. 377.

[6] In addition to the showing made upon the motion, it is insisted that the action was instituted by the plaintiff upon behalf of the state in its sovereign capacity, and that, inasmuch as laches, as a matter of law, cannot ordinarily be imputed to the state, the motion to dismiss should have been denied for that reason alone. We are not prepared to say that the general rule in this behalf would operate to excuse an unreasonable delay in the service of summons, in an action instituted by the state in its sovereign capacity, for the purpose of asserting a public right or protecting a public interest; but we are satisfied that the present action does not involve in the slightest degree any such capacity, right, or interest. It will be noted that the present action was not instituted in the name of the state; and doubtless this is so because the statute under which the action was instituted neither directs nor contemplates the interposition of the state in its sovereign capacity. The power conferred by the bank act on the state banking commissioner to enforce by suit the liability of stockholders in an insolvent bank involves but an incidental duty of his office, which, when occasion arises, he must perform solely for the benefit of the creditors of the bank. Obviously, in the performance of such duty, he must be acting for the benefit of private parties. From the very nature of the action it is apparent that the state has no interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, in the sense that it has anything to gain or lose in the determination of the action. This being so, it must be held that the plaintiff in bringing the action was not invested with the sovereignty of the state. Stern v. Board, etc., 50 Wash. 100, 96 Pac. 693; State v. Halter, 149 Ind. 292, 47 N. E. 665, 49 N. E. 7; People v. Jefferds, 126 Cal. 296, 58 Pac. 704. It follows that the plaintiff is not immune from the operation and effect of the rule generally applied to ordinary litigants, which requires due diligence in the prosecution of an action.

The conclusion which we have arrived at upon the merits of the action, upon which the first judgment is based, makes it unnecessary for us to determine the question as to whether or not the court below had jurisdiction to render the second judgment after an appeal from the first judgment had been taken.

For the reasons stated, the first judgment is affirmed, and the appeal from the second judgment is dismissed.

(District Court of Appeal, First District, California. July 21, 1914.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Alden Anderson, Superintendent of Banks, against Y. Nawa and others and J. J. Lermen. From a judgment dismissing the complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

F. A. Cutler, of San Francisco, A. A. De Ligne, of Sacramento, and H. W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant. J. J. Lermen, C. L. Tilden, and W. F. Postel, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, P. J. The parties to the above-entitled cause having stipulated that the appeals from the two judgments rendered in the said action in favor of the respondent J. J. Lermen present questions identical to those presented in the appeals in the case No. 1359 (Alden Anderson v. Y. Nawa et al., 143 Pac. 555, opinion filed July 17, 1914), and the said parties having further stipulated that the facts in both cases upon which the judgments of dismissal are respectively based are in all respects substantially the same, and having further stipulated that all briefs and arguments filed or made on the appeal from the judgment in favor of respondent Swayne & Hoyt, a corporation (being case No. 1359, supra), may be considered as made and filed in the appeals from the judgments in favor of said respondent J. SMITH v. MURPHY. (L. A. 3343.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 29, 1914.)

1. CONTINUANCE (§ 14*)—REFUSAL—AMENDMENT OF COMPLAINT.

The refusal of a continuance to enable defendant after amendment to procure evidence that when he signed the contract sued on he was so sick that he did not know what he was doing was not error, since such evidence would come from defendant himself, and no extension of time was necessary for its procurement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Continuance, Cent. Dig. §§ 25, 99–112; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. JURY (§ 13*)—RIGHT TO JURY TRIAL—FORECLOSURE OF MECHANIC'S LIEN.

In an action to foreclose a lien for extra work and material, an amendment to the complaint, stating that after completion of the work defendant had agreed to pay a specified sum therefor, instead of that he had agreed to pay the balance due, did not entitle the defendant to a jury trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Jury, Cent. Dig. §§ 35–83; Dec. Dig. § 13.*]

3. EVIDENCE (§ 448*)—PAROL—WRITTEN CONTRACT.

Parol evidence was inadmissible to show what was said by the contracting parties at the time of signing the specifications of a building contract, where the specifications did not leave the intentions of the parties in doubt.

Milton K. Young and W. D. Finch, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. G. C. De Garmo, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This action was brought to foreclose a mechanic's lien asserted to be due for extra labor and material used in the construction of defendant's residence. The whole of the original contract price had been paid. The contract provided that any additions or extras not mentioned in the contract should be added to the contract price. Defendant filed an answer and cross-complaint. After trial judgment passed for plaintiff, and from that judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, defendant appeals.

[1, 2] Plaintiff's original complaint, in setting forth the items of extra work and material and the values thereof, declared that no prices for these items had been agreed upon, but that after completion of the building the defendant agreed to pay the balance due on account of this extra work and material. Shortly after the trial of the action began plaintiff sought and obtained leave of court to amend this averment by alleging that after the work was completed the defendant had agreed to pay a named and specified sum therefor. Appellant first complains of the injury inflicted upon him by the court in allowing this amendment, and in so doing denying a continuance of the action and a trial by jury. An inspection of the record shows that plaintiff's attorney was willing to accord any reasonable time to defendant to gather his evidence to meet the changed form of the issue, but it appears from the statement of defendant's attorney that all that he expected to show was that the defendant, at the time he signed the statement agreeing to pay the specified amount, was in such a condition of ill health as not to know what he was doing. It required no extension of time to produce this evidence, since naturally it would be the evidence of Mr. Murphy himself. And, it may be added that plaintiff's attorney agreed in open court that if later in the case a continuance should become necessary for this purpose, he would readily assent to it. The amendment did not entitle the defendant to a trial by jury.

Appellant argues that as to certain items the findings are not supported by the evidence. We need not particularize upon these matters, since it would carry this opinion through an entirely useless detailed consideration of numerous small items of labor and material and the value thereof. It is sufficient to say that the findings are supported in some instances and in others there are no specifications of insufficiency so as to justify our consideration of them.

[3] Certain questions propounded by defendant's attorneys were objected to and the objections sustained. Thus, the following is asked of defendant Murphy:

"Q. What was said by either yourself or Mr. Smith at the time of the signing of the specifications in reference to a hot water system for heating the building?"

To this and similar questions objections were properly sustained. The specifications themselves, whatever they may have been (and they are not before this court) embodied and expressed the contract between the parties. Antecedent conversations were entirely irrelevant saving in case of doubt over the construction of those specifications to show what the parties actually intended, but no such situation is here presented.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

SCHOTT v. SCHOTT. (L. A. 3328.)

1. DEEDS (§ 211*)—VALIDITY—FRAUD—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In consolidated actions by a son against his mother for partition and to recover rents and profits, wherein defendant claimed that the price was paid by her alone, and that title to the property was taken in the names of plaintiff and defendant, as joint tenants with the right of survivorship, in consideration of plaintiff's agreement to reside with and care for her during the balance of her life, evidence held insufficient to show that the property admittedly given by plaintiff in exchange for his interest in the land had been previously procured from defendant through fraud.

2. DEEDS (§ 19*)—FAILURE OF CONSIDERATION—REMEDY.

That a son breaches his contract to care for and provide for his mother during her life does not, in the absence of fraud, entitle the mother to set aside a deed giving the son an interest in land in consideration of such contract; the mother's remedy in such case being an action for damages.

Department 1. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by Victor L. Schott against Ada L. Schott. From judgment for defendant, and denial of new trial, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Porter, Morgan & Parrot, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, J. Two actions were commenced by the plaintiff against the defendant. One was an action instituted in the superior court for the partition of three parcels of land situated in the city of Los Angeles; the plaintiff claiming that he and the defendant were the owners thereof in joint tenancy. The other action was one for the recovery of certain rents and profits for one of said parcels, instituted in the justices' court, and transferred to the superior court for the reason that the defendant claimed that title to the real property was involved therein. By consent the actions were consolidated and tried together in the superior court. Judgment went for the defendant, and we have here an appeal by plaintiff from such judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

All the property involved stands on the records in plaintiff and defendant, as joint tenants with the right of survivorship; the same having been acquired by three deeds from third parties, one bearing date April 30, 1907, another bearing date October 23, 1908, and the third bearing date November 18, 1908. In the first of these deeds the grantees were described as "Ada L. Schott and Victor L. Schott, * * * or the survivor of them," in the second as "Ada L. Schott and Victor L. Schott (her son) as joint tenants with the right of survivorship and not as tenants in common," and in the third deed "Ada L. Schott and Victor L. Schott, her son, as joint tenants with the right of survivorship." By her amended cross-complaint the defendant alleged substantially that she bought all of said property; "that at the time of the making of said conveyance the plaintiff and the defendant were residing together; that the consideration for the transfer to the plaintiff of plaintiff's alleged interest in said property was that the plaintiff would continue thereafter to reside with the defendant during the balance of her life and care for, protect, comfort, and maintain her; that the plaintiff agreed to care for, protect, comfort, and maintain the defendant during the balance of her life and in consideration of such promise and for no other reason whatsoever, at all, defendant was induced to have the conveyances of the property heretofore described made to the plaintiff and the defendant in joint tenancy; that the said conveyances to the plaintiff of his alleged interest in said property were made wholly upon the aforesaid representations and for no other reason whatsoever, at all, and the plaintiff has failed and still fails to care for, protect, comfort, and maintain the defendant during her old age; that the defendant verily believes that the plaintiff made the aforesaid representations for the sole purpose of inducing this defendant to have the aforesaid property conveyed to plaintiff and defendant in joint tenancy, and that the plaintiff never had any intention to fulfill the same; that for the reasons heretofore set forth the defendant has received no consideration from the plaintiff or from any one for the conveyance of said property, to the plaintiff in joint tenancy with this defendant."

The court found in accordance with these allegations of the cross-complaint, further finding that the plaintiff never did fulfill the promises made to defendant, but that he deserted the defendant soon after acquiring an interest in the said property.

[1] The evidence in support of the finding that defendant purchased entirely with her own money the various parcels of real property is very unsatisfactory, but we will assume in favor of the finding of the trial court that there was sufficient evidence to legally support such finding as to the land conveyed to the parties by the second and third deeds hereinbefore referred to. As to the land described in the first deed, which is the only improved real estate here involved, namely, lot 10 as the same is shown on a certain map entitled "Strong & Dickinson's Main Street and Moneta Avenue Tract," the evidence is uncontradicted that a portion of the consideration was certain real property of which plaintiff had the legal title. It is true that defendant testified that she paid for such real property so standing in the name of plaintiff, and gave the property to him; "the consideration being that he should live with me, * * * on his promise to live with me." Plaintiff testified positively that such property so standing in his name was purchased with his own money. Assuming the testimony of the defendant above referred to to be true, it furnishes no warrant for a conclusion that such property was not the absolute property of plaintiff. Her testimony was that she gave the property to plaintiff on this promise, and there was neither any finding nor any evidence to sustain a finding that this promise was fraudulently made, or that it was not fully complied with from the time of the acquirement of the property to the time of its disposition in part exchange for the land described in the first deed. There was no foundation in the evidence for any conclusion of actual fraud as to this conveyance to plaintiff, and there was neither in the pleadings nor evidence any vestige of a foundation for a conclusion of constructive fraud. There was no allegation whatever in the pleadings showing any relationship of any kind between the parties, and, so far as anything intimating fraud was concerned, defendant's cross-complaint proceeded entirely on the theory of the actual fraud involved in the making of a promise without any intention of performing it. The evidence, therefore, is insufficient to sustain the conclusion of the trial court that the property described in the first deed was purchased by defendant with her own money.

The property described in the first deed is the only property as to which the evidence may fairly be held to be legally sufficient to support the conclusion of the trial court that the conveyances in joint tenancy were made in consideration of any promise or undertaking on the part of plaintiff to live with and care for defendant. We say "legally" sufficient, for the evidence in support of such a conclusion as to even this property is exceedingly unsatisfactory. But there was no evidence to support such a conclusion as to the property described in the second and third deeds. So far as this appeal is concerned, this disposes of the case as to the latter property, and requires a reversal.

[2] As to the property described in the first deed, there is nothing whatever in the evidence to sustain the conclusion of the trial court that the promise found to have been made by plaintiff was made without any intention of performing it. There is nothing in the facts shown to warrant any such inference. As a matter of fact, plaintiff did live with defendant for over two years after the time the promise was alleged to have been made, and it is not intimated that he did not during the whole of this time faithfully do all it was claimed he promised to do. The evidence was not sufficient to support a conclusion that there was any actual fraud.

As to the property described in the first deed, defendant's remedy at most, in view of the pleadings and evidence, there being no actual fraud, was an action for damages. As was said in Lawrence v. Gayetty, 78 Cal. 132, 20 Pac. 385, 12 Am. St. Rep. 29, of a case somewhat similar in principle:

> "The plaintiff saw proper to accept the verbal promise of the defendants to do certain things without any agreement or understanding that the failure to do the acts as promised should be a condition, or in any way affect the validity of the deed, or entitle him to a reconveyance."

Under such circumstances, in the absence of fraud, actual or constructive, defendant would have no right to rescind, or to have the deed set aside. See Hartman v. Reed, 50 Cal. 485; Lawrence v. Gayetty, supra; Albert v. Albert, 12 Cal. App. 268, 107 Pac. 156.

It is manifest from what we have said that a reversal must be had, and it appears to be unnecessary to consider other points made.

The judgment and order denying a new trial are reversed.

1. Judgment (§ 713*) — Conclusiveness — Matters Concluded—Issues Which Might Have Been Raised.

A former judgment between the parties to an action is conclusive, in all subsequent actions involving the same question, as to all matters belonging to the subject of the controversy, and properly within the scope of the issues which might have been raised and determined; the presumption being that such issues were presented and decided.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1063, 1066, 1099, 1234–1237, 1239, 1241, 1247; Dec. Dig. § 713.*]

2. Judgment (§ 713*) — Conclusiveness — Matters Concluded—Presumption.

The presumption that matters which might have been litigated and decided in a former suit were actually decided is rebuttable, and, if it appears that the issue was withdrawn from consideration at the trial by consent of the parties, it is not concluded by the former judgment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Judgment, Cent. Dig. §§ 1063, 1066, 1099, 1234–1237, 1239, 1241, 1247; Dec. Dig. § 713.*]

3. Judgment (§ 729*) — Conclusiveness — Matters Concluded — Issue Withdrawn by Consent.

In an action for personal injuries, where the defense was a release, which the plaintiff contended was procured by misrepresentation, and where the plaintiff tendered an instruction that the jury, if they found for him, should credit the amount paid for the release upon the award of damages, which was refused, and one was given, by consent of both parties, that the jury should find the full amount of plaintiff's damages without giving any credit for the amount paid for the release, the issue of defendant's right to credit for the release was by consent withdrawn from the former case, and was not concluded by the judgment therein.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Suit by the Southern Pacific Company against Edward G. Edmunds. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 18 Cal. App. 532, 123 Pac. 811.

J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles (Allen W. Ashburn, Jr., of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. E. B. Drake, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Plaintiff having declined to amend its complaint after a demurrer to it was sustained, judgment was entered against it, from which it appeals.

The complaint alleged: That on December 19, 1909, defendant herein, while riding in a mail coach in a train operated by plaintiff, was, through an accident occurring from its negligence, seriously injured, to his damage in the sum of $5,000. That on January 11, 1910, plaintiff and defendant agreed to settle and compromise the claim of defendant for said injuries for the sum of $1,250, which plaintiff then paid him, and the latter thereupon executed and delivered to plaintiff a full release of all claims on account of said injuries. That thereafter, and on February 21, 1910, defendant commenced an action against plaintiff to recover $30,000 damages on account of said accident, claiming that said settlement had been procured through false representations made by plaintiff to defendant. That plaintiff answered in said action, and, among other defenses, set up, as a bar to any recovery by defendant, the making of said settlement and the execution of said release. That thereafter said cause was tried before a jury, and on the trial defendant introduced evidence tending to prove that the making of said settlement and the execution of said release were procured by misrepresentations on the part of plaintiff. That, before the submission of said cause to the jury, defendant herein requested the court to instruct the jury as follows:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "You are instructed * * * then you will disregard said release or said settlement (referring to the $1,250 theretofore paid), except, if you find for the plaintiff damages as defined in the instructions herein, you will credit the sum by the amount of money admitted to have been received in such settlement."

That said instruction was rejected by the court, and thereupon, with the consent of both parties, the court instructed the jury that:

> "In case you find for the plaintiff, you are instructed that you shall find and insert in your general verdict the full amount of his damages without crediting defendant for the $1,250 which it has paid, and without making any allowance therefor"

—and gave no instruction as to the amount of damages to be allowed, or as to any deduction on account of the previous payment to defendant of the sum of $1,250. That the jury returned a verdict for defendant herein, assessing his damages at $5,000, and judgment in his favor was entered accordingly, which on appeal by plaintiff, was affirmed by the district court of appeal. That thereafter plaintiff tendered to defendant the sum of $4,360.72, being the amount of said judgment and interest, less the sum of $1,250 and interest thereon, and demanded that defendant accept said amount and satisfy said judgment, which he refused to do. That thereupon plaintiff paid the defendant $4,360.72 under a stipulation between the parties that such payment should not constitute a waiver by defendant of his right to recover the full amount of said judgment, nor of the right of plaintiff to have a deduction of $1,250, with interest from the amount of said judgment; it being agreed that plaintiff should commence an action at once to determine the claims of the respective parties, and that execution on the judgment should be stayed until the question should be determined. That defendant has never tendered or refunded said $1,250 to plaintiff, nor has plaintiff received any credit in any way for the payment of said amount.

The relief asked was that it be decreed that plaintiff is entitled to a credit for said $1,250 and interest on said judgment; that it has made full payment thereof to defendant; and that defendant be required to enter a satisfaction of said judgment. The trial court sustained a demurrer to the complaint on the ground that the matter of credit set up in the present action was res adjudicata by the judgment in the damage suit.

[1] The rule undoubtedly is that a former judgment between the parties to an action is conclusive in all subsequent actions involving the same question, not only as to the matters actually decided in the former controversy, but as to all matters belonging to the subject of the controversy and properly within the scope of the issues which also might have been raised and determined; the presumption being that all such issues were presented and decided. Bingham v. Kearney, 136 Cal. 175, 68 Pac. 597; Rucker v. Langford, 138 Cal. 611, 71 Pac. 1123.

[2] As to matters, however, which might have been litigated and decided in a former suit as within the scope of the issues, but which were not actually or expressly in issue and adjudicated, only a presumption is indulged in that they were decided. This presumption is, however, a disputable one, and may be overcome by showing that, although a particular matter was involved in the former action, it was by consent of the parties withdrawn from consideration at the trial and did not at all enter into or constitute any part of the verdict of the jury or final determination of that action. If this is the situation here, defendant certainly cannot invoke the doctrine of res adjudicata against the assertion by plaintiff in this action of a right to the credit claimed. He cannot assert the conclusiveness of the former judgment on that matter, if he consented with plaintiff that it might be withdrawn from consideration by the jury as an issue in the former action, and it was in fact withdrawn.

[3] While it is doubtless true that this credit for the amount paid as a release was technically within the issues raised in the damage suit, it was never an issue over which there was any controversy between the parties in that action; there never was any question made on the part of the defendant but that plaintiff was entitled to a credit for that amount in any assessment of damages which the jury might make against it. The real issue in the case (because the defendant did not deny that the injuries to defendant were caused by its negligence) was as to the release—its validity. And, however that question of validity might be determined by the jury, the plaintiff here was entitled to the benefit of the $1,250 it had paid defendant, because, if the release was valid, such payment was in satisfaction of the claim of defendant for damages, and, if it was invalid, the plaintiff was undoubtedly entitled to it as a credit against any verdict or judgment which might be found against it. As we have said, the right of plaintiff to the credit was not questioned by defendant in the damage suit. He knew that, as a matter of law, plaintiff was entitled to it in some way, and conceded that it might be given to plaintiff by the jury in the damage suit, when estimating his damages if their verdict was favorable to him, because he asked the court to so instruct the jury to credit plaintiff with that amount in any verdict it might find. This, however, the court refused to do. It does not appear that the defendant objected to the giving of this instruction; it is rather a reasonable assumption to make that it did not. The refusal of the court to so instruct at the request of defendant was followed by the giving of the consent instruction heretofore quoted, in which the jury was told that, in any verdict for damages, they might find they were not to credit defendant with the $1,250 it had paid, and without making any allowance therefor. Had this consent instruction not been given, and had plaintiff itself failed to ask an instruction to the jury to credit it with this $1,250 payment in estimating any damages against it, there might be room for the application of the doctrine of res adjudicata as defendant invokes it. But the giving of this consent instruction obviated any necessity on the part of plaintiff of asking for a credit instruction or complaining of the action of the court in refusing the credit instruction asked by defendant because the consent instruction withdrew that issue entirely from the case. As the defendant was conceding that plaintiff was entitled to the credit and had asked the court to so instruct the jury, and there was no dispute but that, as a matter of law, the latter was entitled to it, the apparent purpose of the consent instruction immediately following the refusal of the court to give the credit instruction was to withdraw the matter of the right of plaintiff to such credit from present consideration by the jury, leaving its application on any judgment which might be obtained against plaintiff for consideration when it should be called on to satisfy it. Plaintiff, by consenting to the instruction given, was probably entirely willing and prepared to have the jury try out the question of the validity or invalidity of the release, unembarrassed by any question of credit payment, reserving that matter for consideration at some future time, and defendant, as he freely conceded its right to this credit, was agreeable that this might be done. In any event, the consent instruction withdrew the matter from the case, and, being so withdrawn, it was not a matter which was concluded by the judgment in the former action.

The judgment is reversed.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Action by Louis N. Sanders against Gordon L. Dutcher. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Conkling & Brown, of El Centro, for appellant. Trask, Norton & Brown, of Los Angeles, Frank E. Dunlap, of Stockton, and Dan V. Noland, of El Centro, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The complaint avers that the plaintiff is the owner of a tract of land in Imperial county; that he was unlawfully ejected therefrom by the defendant; that defendant has no right, title, interest, or estate in the land, but that he asserts some title or interest therein which is without foundation; and that since he took possession he has remained in possession to the damage of plaintiff. He prays for possession of the property, that the defendant's claim be declared invalid, and for the recovery of damages. To this complaint the defendant answered, setting out the nature of his claim and praying for the affirmative relief that he be declared to be the equitable owner of the land and to have conveyed to him the legal title thereto acquired by plaintiff from the United States. In effect, the defense was a cross-complaint for the affirmative relief.

Thereupon the plaintiff moved for a judgment upon the pleadings. This motion was granted by the court, and judgment entered accordingly that the plaintiff recover possession, that the defendant had no right, title, or interest in the property, and for $300 damages. From this judgment the defendant appeals.

Prior to the inception of the claims of either of the parties the land in question was public land of the United States. It appears from the pleadings that one Orpha C. Johnson made a desert land entry upon said land for the purpose of acquiring the same from the United States under the desert land law of 1891; that thereafter the defendant was in possession thereof by assignment from Orpha C. Johnson; that thereupon, upon the application of the plaintiff, the land office canceled the entry of the defendant as assignee of Orpha C. Johnson, and accepted the application of Sanders as a claimant under the homestead law; that thereafter he commuted his homestead entry to a desert land entry, made his final proof thereunder, and made the necessary payments, and received his final certificate. These proceedings were the subject of an appeal to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, who affirmed the decision of the register and receiver of the land office at Los Angeles, and the plaintiff became thereupon entitled under the land laws to receive a patent from the United States. The question presented by the record is whether or not the facts alleged in the answer would entitle the defendant to have the plaintiff declared trustee of the land for the benefit of the defendant, so that whatever title the plaintiff should receive would in equity belong to the defendant and should be conveyed to him.

These facts are stated as follows: On February 9, 1903, the lands were unoccupied public lands of the United States open to desert land entry. On that day Orpha C. Johnson made such entry of this land. Thereafter, prior to July 13, 1905, she complied with all the laws of the United States with reference to said entry, made the reclamation thereof required by law, and made final proof of such reclamation and final payment therefor, and received from the register and receiver of the land office a receipt showing such final payment. Thereafter, and prior to December 17, 1907, she sold, assigned, and transferred all her right, title, and interest in the land to defendant, Gordon L. Dutcher, who entered into possession under the conveyance, and has since expended large sums of money upon the land in the reclamation and improvement thereof. On January 7, 1908, Louis N. Sanders began a contest against the Johnson entry, alleging that Johnson had not reclaimed nor irrigated or improved the land, or any part thereof, at the time she made final proof, and that before she made such final proof she had entered into a contract with one M. V. Dutcher to sell the land to Dutcher or his assigns, receiving from said Dutcher the sum of $75 therefor, and that the final proof of Orpha C. Johnson was, for these reasons, fraudulent. This contest came on for hearing at the land office; both parties being present in person and by counsel. Evidence was submitted by both parties, and the register found that the final proof of Johnson was fraudulently made by virtue of the fact that she had not personally made the reclamation of the land, and because the final proof was made after and under the contract with M. V. Dutcher above referred to. The register therefore canceled the entry of Orpha C. Johnson, whereupon the appeal was taken, the contest confirmed, and the plaintiff was declared to be entitled to the land as a homestead. Thereafter Sanders made his homestead entry, the same was accepted by the land office in pursuance of the aforesaid decision and afterwards, on November 13, 1911, Sanders, having commuted his homestead and made his proofs, received his final certificate as a desert land entry and secured an apparent title to the land; that these proceedings were taken by Sanders in pursuance of a conspiracy with one F. E. Jordan, by which Sanders agreed to do as above stated, and Jordan agreed to pay the expenses he would be put to, and was thereafter to receive a deed from Sanders for the land, and in consideration of which he agreed to pay Sanders $2,500.

In explanation and avoidance of this decision of the land department and the certificate issued to Sanders, the following facts were stated: At the hearing before the register no evidence was offered tending to prove that Orpha C. Johnson had not reclaimed or irrigated the land, but, on the contrary, it was admitted that she had done so. The proof on this point was that she had not done so personally, but had procured these things to be done by others at her own charge and expense. The only evidence offered to show that the final proof was fraudulently made under the contract above referred to between Johnson and M. V. Dutcher consisted of declarations made by Dutcher to third persons tending to prove the allegations of the contest to the effect that, prior to final proof under the Johnson entry, Orpha C. Johnson had agreed to sell the land to Dutcher, as before stated. The register and receiver believed the law to be that a reclamation not made by the claimant personally, although made at her instance, was invalid, and that therefore Orpha C. Johnson had not reclaimed or irrigated the land within the meaning of the desert land law. The said register and receiver also concluded, as matter of law, that the final proof made after and under the contract by Orpha C. Johnson to sell her right to M. V. Dutcher was invalid, because said contract was contrary to the policy of the law, and that for these reasons the claim and entry of Orpha C. Johnson and her assignee were invalid and should be canceled, and upon that ground the same was canceled by them. The commissioner of the land office, in affirming the decision of the register and receiver, acted under the same misapprehension as to the law governing the case. It is alleged that these proceedings were carried on by Sanders and Jordan for the fraudulent purpose of depriving Orpha C. Johnson and her assignees of the land and of acquiring the same for Jordan.

Upon these allegations it is claimed that in equity Sanders stands as the trustee for the defendant of the land, and that a court of equity will compel him to make the proper conveyances of the land to the defendant.

[1] It is a well-established proposition, and it is not disputed by the appellant, that the decisions of the officers of the land department on questions of fact, upon evidence tending to prove the same, are conclusive upon third persons, at least in the absence of fraud or imposition practiced upon them. But it is also settled that, where these officers err in matter of law, in such a way as to deprive a person who has a valid claim under the land laws of the United States of the rights vested in him, their decisions may be reviewed in a proper proceeding, and that a court of equity, in such a proceeding, will give appropriate relief to the injured party against the party who obtains title by the erroneous decision. Thus, it is said:

> "If they err in the construction of the law applicable to any case, or a fraud is practiced upon them, or they themselves are chargeable with fraudulent practices, their rulings may be reviewed and annulled by the courts when a controversy arises between private parties founded upon their decisions; but, for mere errors of judgment upon the weight of evidence in a contested case before them, the only remedy is by appeal from one officer to another of the department. * * * It may also be, and probably is, true that the courts may furnish, in proper cases, relief to a party where new evidence is discovered, which, if possessed and presented at the time, would have changed the action of the land officers; but, except in such cases, the ruling of the department on disputed questions of fact, made in a contested case must be taken, when that ruling is collaterally assailed, as conclusive." Shepley v. Cowan, 91 U. S. 340, 23 L. Ed. 424.

And again, in Marquez v. Frisbie, 101 U. S. 476, 25 L. Ed. 800, the court says:

> "In this class of cases, as in all others, there exists in the courts of equity the jurisdiction to correct mistakes, to relieve against frauds and impositions, and in cases where it is clear that these officers have, by a mistake of the law, given to one man the land which, on the undisputed facts, belonged to another, to give appropriate relief."

This is quoted from the decision in Moore v. Robbins, 96 U. S. 535, 24 L. Ed. 848. The court says further:

> "If it can be made entirely plain to a court of equity that on facts about which there is no dispute or no reasonable doubt those officers have, by a mistake of the law, deprived a man of his right, it will give relief."

[2] The conclusion of the land department that a desert land entry perfected after and in pursuance of an agreement between the entryman and another to sell the land to such other person after the title is obtained from the United States is invalid under the desert land law was a clear mistake of law. There is no principle of common law which forbids such a contract nor any which declares the title received thereunder invalid. Such proceedings are against the policy of the law only in cases where such policy is declared by the law. If this entry of Orpha C. Johnson had been made under the pre-emption law formerly existing, or under the homestead law, in each of which there is a declaration in effect forbidding such assignment, their conclusion would have been correct. But the desert land law is wholly different in this respect. It not only does not forbid the assignment of such contracts after entry made under its provisions; it expressly recognizes that such assignments may be made. The necessity for extensive works of reclamation of land taken up under the desert land law, in order to make such land of any value, evidently was deemed sufficient to make it expedient to authorize transfers of such land pending proceedings to obtain a title. Section 5 of the law declares:

> "That no land shall be patented to any person under this act unless he or his assignors shall have expended in the necessary irrigation, reclamation, and cultivation thereof, by means of main canals and branch ditches, and in permanent improvements upon the land, and in the purchase of water rights for the irrigation of the same, at least three dollars per acre of whole tract reclaimed and patented" in the manner described in the section.

Section 7 provides that at any time after the filing of the declaration, and within four years, upon proof of the expenditure of such money and of citizenship and payment of one dollar per acre for the land—

> "a patent shall issue therefor to the applicant or his assigns; but no person or association of persons shall hold by assignment or otherwise prior to the issue of patent, more than three hundred and twenty acres of such arid or desert land."

Thus it will be seen, the assignment from Johnson to M. V. Dutcher was not contrary to law, but was a valid transfer, and did not in any way justify a cancellation of the entry.

[3] It is not necessary to cite authorities to show that the land department erred as to the law in its conclusion that the entry of Orpha C. Johnson was invalid because she hired others to do the reclamation work required, and had not accomplished it by her own personal labor. The proposition is self-evident. There was no question of fact to be determined by the land department. The only facts alleged in the contest of Sanders were those above stated. They were not sufficient in law to invalidate the entry attacked by him. It is therefore entirely plain under the facts stated that the officers of the land department by mistake of law deprived the assignee of Orpha C. Johnson of the right he possessed under the law to complete his entry and obtain title to the land from the United States. The motion for judgment on the pleadings admits all facts averred in the answer. It appears therefrom that the defendant, Gordon L. Dutcher, has succeeded to all the rights of Orpha C. Johnson and M. V. Dutcher under said desert land entry. It further appears that this was done by the fraudulent contrivance of the plaintiff and said Jordan.

[4] Under these circumstances, and upon the authorities above referred to, it is clear that the defendant is entitled to the relief prayed for in the answer; that is, to a decree declaring the plaintiff a trustee for him and directing that any title obtained by the plaintiff should be conveyed to the defendant. The court below therefore erred in granting the motion for a judgment on the pleadings.

The judgment is reversed.

ELLSWORTH v. PALMTAG. (L. A. 3353.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1914.)

1. Quieting Title (§ 44*)—Evidence—Sufficiency—Mistake in Description.

In an action to quiet title and to require defendant to execute a deed to plaintiff in lieu of a deed which he had wrongfully procured from a depository and destroyed, evidence held insufficient to show that a mistake was made in the description of land in the deed destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 89–92; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

2. Quieting Title (§ 44*)—Material Issues—Adequacy of Price Paid.

Where, in an action to quiet title and to require defendant to execute a deed in lieu of one wrongfully procured by him from a depository and destroyed, it appeared that plaintiff and defendant had purchased the land as tenants in common, and that the destroyed deed was executed pursuant to an agreement to partition the land, the adequacy of the consideration paid by plaintiff for his interest was immaterial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 89–92; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

3. Witnesses (§ 275*)—Examination—Exclusion of Question.

In an action involving the title to land, a question propounded to plaintiff on cross-examination inquiring whether he had cultivated "a portion of the 40 acres" was properly excluded, even had it been permissible for defendant to have shown, on the issue of mistaken description in the deed that plaintiff was cultivating a part of the 40 acres outside of the 10 acres claimed by him.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 924, 926, 967–975; Dec. Dig. § 275.*]

4. Witnesses (§ 269*)—Cross-Examination.

Where plaintiff had not testified in chief concerning a well or a contract for sinking it, it was improper to inquire of him on cross-examination as to who dug the well, and whether he was not present when the place for the well to be dug was designated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Witnesses, Cent. Dig. §§ 949–954; Dec. Dig. § 269.*]

5. Evidence (§ 471*)—Opinions of Witness—Examination—Exclusion of Question.

In an action wherein the interpretation of a contract was in controversy, questions relating to the contract and so framed that the witness' answers would reflect defendant's interpretation of it rather than its terms were properly excluded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. §§ 2149–2185; Dec. Dig. § 471.*]

6. Quieting Title (§ 44*) — Issues — Evidence.

Where, in an action to quiet title and require defendant to execute a deed in lieu of one wrongfully destroyed, it appeared that all the parties had agreed for a well to be located at a certain point on the land, evidence as to who proposed the location of the well was immaterial on the issue of mistake in the description in the deed destroyed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Quieting Title, Cent. Dig. §§ 89–92; Dec. Dig. § 44.*]

7. Witnesses (§ 286*) — Redirect Examination.

A matter concerning which there had been no cross-examination was not a proper subject for redirect examination.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Frank F. Oster, Judge.

Action by John C. Ellsworth against G. Palmtag. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

R. E. Bledsoe and Willis & Guthrie, all of San Bernardino, for appellant. Halsey W. Allen, of Redlands, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment against him. The complaint alleged: That on May 25, 1909, plaintiff and defendant were the owners as tenants in common, each entitled to an undivided half interest, of the following described real property in San Bernardino county:

> "The south one-half (S. ½) of the southwest quarter (S. W. ¼) of the northeast quarter (N. E. ¼) of section numbered five (5), township one (1) south, range three (3) west, San Bernardino Base and Meridian."

That on the above date plaintiff and defendant agreed to partition this land, and in the execution of said arrangement plaintiff was to convey his undivided half interest in the land to Palmtag and the latter was to convey to Ellsworth the south one-half of the said tract. That deeds were executed by the respective parties accordingly and were delivered to J. A. Scott of San Bernardino with the agreement between Ellsworth and Palmtag that Scott should place the deeds with the Redlands National Bank there to be held until defendant should demand the deed of plaintiff's interest to him. And that upon delivery of the last-mentioned deed, then the deed of Palmtag to Ellsworth should be delivered to the latter. It is further alleged that Scott deposited the deeds with the Redlands National Bank; that the bank thereafter delivered both deeds to Palmtag, who immediately placed of record the one in which he was mentioned as grantee and then conveyed the north half of the property to one Hanson; and that he refuses to deliver the other deed to Ellsworth, his grantee thereunder. The prayer is for a decree declaring that Palmtag has no estate or interest in the south half of the described tract; that Ellsworth's title is valid; that Palmtag be enjoined and debarred from asserting title to said premises adverse to Ellsworth; that Palmtag be required to deliver to Ellsworth the deed to the south half of the described land, or, if that be impossible, to execute a new deed in lieu thereof, or, if he refuse to do either, that a commissioner perform that function for him. Damages are also prayed for.

[1] The court found in substantial accordance with the demands of plaintiff, decreeing that the property should be deeded to Ellsworth, and awarding $75 as damages and the costs of suit amounting to $110.60. Without reviewing the evidence, it is sufficient to say that all of the findings are abundantly sustained by it. Defendant did not deny the execution of the deeds as pleaded, but testified that by a mistake the description of the property in the instrument referred to the south half of the land which he and Ellsworth apparently held by tenancy in common instead of the south half of another tract of twenty acres which Palmtag had bought from Wendleborn and Leipsic, being the north half of the southwest quarter of the northeast quarter of section 5, township 1 south, range 3 west, S. B. M. The court found that this was not true and that there had been no mistake. Defendant swore that Ellsworth had paid nothing for the half interest which stood in his name prior to May 25, 1909, but that he himself had bought it from one Hill, but had taken the title through three different grantees of whom plaintiff was the last, because his (Palmtag's) wife was adverse to signing deeds. There was evidence in opposition to this, which the court evidently believed, that Palmtag wanted to prevent one Rouse from acquiring the half interest in the property and planned to buy it for $200; that he sent the money and had the deed executed to Boyd, who afterwards conveyed to Derchelborer, who then conveyed to plaintiff who had paid Palmtag $230, an amount equal to that which Palmtag had sent to Hill plus $30 expended for taxes; and that the reason for the use of the name of Boyd as grantee in the deed from Hill was Palmtag's unwillingness to let Rouse know of his connection with the matter.

In support of his theory that a mistake had been made, Palmtag proved that a well had been sunk on the south part of the tract under an agreement between himself, Ellsworth and Hanson that he was to have half of the flow and Ellsworth and Hanson each one-quarter of the water. It was proven that they had not yet paid for one-half of the construction of the well and pumping plant, and the court so found; but the mere fact that the land now owned by Ellsworth contains this well and equipment, in which both parties to this action may have an interest if the terms of their contract be fulfilled, does not show that Palmtag must have been mistaken in consenting to let his former tenant in common take that land. His deed did not convey title to the pumping plant nor abrogate the contract for sharing the water.

[2] Counsel for appellant insist that there was a gross inadequacy of the price paid for the land by Ellsworth. In the first place, this is not an action for specific performance of a contract of sale and purchase, and the adequacy of the consideration is not involved; and in the second place there was evidence, not contradicted by Palmtag, that the price paid to Hill was $30 less than that paid by Ellsworth for the same interest.

[3] Certain rulings of the court made during the examination of witnesses are specified as erroneous. We have examined these assignments and find them without merit. On the cross-examination of Ellsworth counsel asked if he had been present when the site for the well was selected. Objections to questions along this line having been sustained, the following question was then propounded: "Weren't you cultivating a portion of that tract of land out there—a portion of the 40 acres?" A general objection to this question was sustained. Appellant insists that he was entitled to show that Ellsworth was cultivating a part of the 40 acres outside of the 10 acres now claimed by him; but, even if that were true, the question as propounded did not have any tendency to develop that fact. The ruling was correct.

[4] The court also sustained the objections, on the grounds of immateriality and that they were not proper cross-examination, of the following questions propounded to plaintiff on cross-examination:

> "Who dug that well and put that plant up there?" "You say you were on the ground at the time the place was designated where the well should be sunk?" "You were a party to a written contract with Palmtag and Hanson to sink that well on the premises out there?"

Clearly these questions were not within the scope of proper cross-examination. Plaintiff had not testified in chief about the well or the contract for sinking it. These matters were all included in Palmtag's defense, and, if admissible at all, were not properly brought into the case under the guise of cross-examination.

[5-7] Objections by respondent's counsel to certain questions propounded by defendant's counsel to defendant on redirect examination were sustained. All of these questions related to supposed agreements for the division of water or to the selection of the place for the well. The questions relating to the contract were framed so that answers would reflect defendant's interpretation of the agreement, rather than the terms thereof, and therefore the objections were properly sustained. It made no difference who chose the place for the well, and therefore the objections to the questions upon that subject should have been sustained. The matter was not a proper one for redirect examination. There had been no cross-examination with reference to the selection of the location for the well. The court found that Palmtag, Hanson, and Ellsworth agreed upon the place at which boring for water should be conducted which was to be on the southerly 10-acre tract near the east end thereof, and near the line between the property deeded to Hanson and that claimed by Ellsworth. Since all of the parties agreed upon that place, it matters not who proposed the location. Appellant insists that he could have proved that Ellsworth selected the place for the well, without his (Palmtag's) knowledge, and never made any claim to the south 10 acres until after the well was partly constructed. But even if that were true, it would not prove that Ellsworth claimed no interest in the 10 acres in question. The well had to be on property belonging to some one of the parties to the agreement, and, since Ellsworth was to get only one-fourth of the water, the placing of the well on his property might have been or might not have been an advantage to him. The questions were neither proper redirect examination nor were they addressed to relevant matters.

No other alleged errors require comment. The judgment is affirmed.

CRAW v. CRAIG et al. (L. A. 3365.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1011*)—Findings of Fact—Conflicting Evidence.

A finding on conflicting evidence, as to the amount due on an offset, could not be disturbed on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3983–3989; Dec. Dig. § 1011.*]

2. Mortgages (§ 581*)—Foreclosure—Attorney's Fee—Discretion as to Amount.

An allowance of $150 as attorney's fees for foreclosure of a mortgage securing a note for $1,500 and interest was not an abuse of the discretion vested in the trial court, where the mortgage stipulated for a reasonable attorney's fee, though the pleadings were exceedingly simple and the trial required less than an hour.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mortgages, Cent. Dig. §§ 211½, 1669–1679; Dec. Dig. § 581.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; F. E. Densmore, Judge.

Action by Mrs. A. C. Craw against Hattie M. Craig and others. From denial of new trial, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John L. Campbell, of San Bernardino, and John W. Craig, of Corona, for appellants. W. S. Clayson, of Corona, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendants appeal from the order of the superior court denying their motion for a new trial.

The action was one to foreclose a mortgage. Defendants answered, not denying their liability for the payment of the note for $1,500 and interest, secured by the mortgage, but they pleaded an offset for $350 due for a certain crop of oranges which the defendants, the Craigs, had permitted the plaintiff's agent to sell, and for which plaintiff had promised to pay them the reasonable value. The court found that the defendants, the Craigs, owed the plaintiff the principal sum of $1,500 on their note, together with $200 accrued interest and $150 attorney's fee. Against this a set-off of $150 for the orange crop was awarded the defendants. Judgment was for $1,550, together with attorney's fees of $150, with costs of suit, and a decree of foreclosure and sale was entered as prayed.

There was evidence to support the finding of the value of the orange crop as $150. Both Joseph Riley, son and agent of plaintiff, and R. W. Evans testified that the Sparr Fruit Company, of which the latter was the manager, bought the crop of oranges, growing on the mortgaged land, for $150, and Evans stated under oath that he considered the price paid the reasonable value of the fruit at that time. As opposed to this testimony was that of defendant John W. Craig, who placed the value of the oranges sold at a sum much larger than $150.

[1, 2] Of course we cannot disturb a finding based upon such a conflict of testimony, and indeed appellant does not contend that the court erred seriously in failing to accept Mr. Craig's estimate of the value of the fruit, but it is earnestly contended that the court abused the discretion with which it is clothed, when so large a sum as $150 was allowed as attorney's fees. We are reminded that the pleadings were exceedingly simple, and that the actual trial of the cause required less than one hour of time. Counsel for appellants is of the opinion that the sum allowed by the court for such service was grossly exorbitant. We do not feel called upon, however, to reverse the order of the lower court because of the amount of this fee. In the mortgage agreement appellants promised to pay a reasonable attorney's fee in the event of a suit to foreclose. The amount of such a fee is peculiarly within the discretion of the trial court. We see no circumstances of oppression in the allowance of the sum which the court held to be a proper charge for the work performed. Under the rule announced in such cases as Patten v. Pepper Hotel Co., 153 Cal. 472, 96 Pac. 296, we do not feel justified in interfering with the action of the lower court.

The order from which appellants prosecute their appeal is affirmed.

1. Descent and Distribution (§ 35*)—Source of Title—Whole and Half Blood.

Civ. 2. Costs (§ 260*)—On Appeal—Penalty for Frivolous Appeal.

Where, in a suit involving a deed of gift from a husband to his wife, a judgment adjudging that title to the land was vested in the two children of the wife individually as her heirs, and that neither had any right, title, or interest in the land otherwise, was affirmed, and the appellate court also held that the wife had acquired title by prescription, even though the deed was not effective, an appeal subsequently taken by one of the children from a decree distributing the property equally to the wife's two children on the ground that appellant's half-sister, not being of the blood of the husband, was not entitled to inherit, was frivolous, and the decree would be affirmed, with a penalty of $50.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Anna N. McKenna, deceased. From a decree distributing the property equally between J. Irving McKenna and Addie Norah Thompson, J. Irving McKenna appeals. Affirmed.

Catherine A. McKenna, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Joseph Scott, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an appeal from a decree of distribution by which the property of the deceased, Anna N. McKenna, was distributed in equal shares to her children, J. Irving McKenna and Addie Norah Thompson.

Respondent makes the initial objection that the appeal is by J. Irving McKenna in his capacity of administrator, and that it may not be considered, because in such a case the administrator, as such, has no appeal from a decree of distribution. The notice of appeal is, to say the most that can be said of it, somewhat ambiguous. It announces that "the administrator, J. Irving McKenna, hereby appeals," etc., while the final paragraph states that "the said J. Irving McKenna does hereby appeal * * * by the procedure allowed by section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure." It might well be argued that the specification of the procedure to be followed by the "said J. Irving McKenna," who had been previously described as an administrator taking the appeal, would not amount to a declaration that he appealed also in his personal, and not in his representative, capacity, but we will assume, for the purposes of this opinion, without so deciding, that he is here on appeal personally and as an heir, because the lower court decided the question of distribution correctly.

In 1869 John McKenna owned the real property here in question. Thereafter he married Anna N. Butler (the decedent Anna N. McKenna of this proceeding). She had one daughter at that time, who is the respondent here. Subsequently J. Irving McKenna was born to Anna N. and John McKenna. On May 23, 1891, John McKenna died intestate, leaving his widow and his son, J. Irving McKenna, as his heirs. More than six months before his death John McKenna had executed a deed of gift to his wife, conveying the property to her. The facts are fully set forth in Thompson v. McKenna, 22 Cal. App. 130, 133 Pac. 512. Indeed, that case is conclusive of this matter. The same property was there involved, and the District Court of Appeal affirmed a judgment that title was vested in J. Irving McKenna and his half-sister, Addie Norah Thompson, individually, as heirs of Norah Anna McKenna, deceased, subject to administration in her estate, and that neither had any right, title, or interest in the land otherwise. The appellate court approved the finding of the lower court that Norah Anna McKenna's title to the property was founded also upon open, notorious, and exclusive possession thereof for more than 20 years. A motion for rehearing was denied by this court.

[1] In the face of the above judgment the appellant here contends that the estate should not be distributed in accordance with section 1386, subd. 1, of the Civil Code, but that section 1394, Civil Code, applied to the facts of this case, would exclude Mrs. Thompson from participating in the distribution of the land which had once been the separate property of her stepfather. That section is as follows:

"Kindred of the half blood inherit equally with those of the whole blood in the same degree, unless the inheritance come to the intestate by descent, devise or gift of some one of his ancestors, in which case all those who are not of the blood of such ancestors must be excluded from such inheritance."

We cannot see how the section quoted above can possibly have any sort of application to the facts of the proceeding at bar. While the appellant and respondent are, as to each other, kindred of the half blood, their mother was, as to both of them, of the whole blood. Some effort has been expended by counsel for appellant to convince us that, in contemplation of law, John McKenna was the "ancestor" of his wife, and that, inasmuch as the respondent here was not of his blood, she may not take any of the property which was his separate estate when he married. But even that interpretation would not make Mrs. Thompson of the half blood of her mother and bring her under the provisions of section 1394. As was said by this court in the opinion In re Pearsons, 110 Cal. 526, 42 Pac. 961:

> "Our Code has no allusion to 'the blood of the first purchaser,' and makes no attempt at any distinction founded upon the sources from which the estate of a decedent may have been derived—except in the single instance of kindred of the 'half blood.'"

[2] But eliminating all question of appellant's asserted right by inheritance to property which had once been the separate estate of his father, he knew when he took his appeal that the court of last resort had finally sustained a solemn adjudication that his mother, long after his father's death, had acquired title to the property by prescription, even if the deed had not been effective. The very question presented upon this appeal —namely, the unqualified title to this real property in his mother's estate—had been finally determined. In spite of that knowledge, he took this frivolous appeal.

Let the judgment be affirmed, with a penalty of $50 to be paid by appellant to respondent.

BROWN v. NATIONAL ELECTRIC WORKS. (L. A. 3210.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 20*)—CONTRACT FOR EMPLOYMENT—DURATION—REASONABLE TIME.

Where a contract to employ plaintiff on his purchase of stock in defendant corporation fixed no time during which the employment was to continue, a reasonable time was implied, and the discharge of plaintiff without good cause after three months' employment amounted to a breach of the contract.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Eltinge T. Brown against the National Electric Works. Judgment for the defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Flint, Gray & Barber, of Los Angeles, and Rupert B. Turnbull, of Pasadena, for appellant. Geo. W. Dryer and W. T. McNeely, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal on the judgment roll, by the plaintiff, from a judgment in favor of the defendant. The action was to recover the sum of $5,000, paid by plaintiff to the defendant in consideration of certain shares of its capital stock and of the agreement by the defendant to employ the plaintiff. The plaintiff claims that the contract was broken and that because of the breach he rescinded the same. The decision of the case depends upon the facts stated in the findings. In January, 1911, plaintiff and defendant made an agreement whereby the defendant agreed to sell to plaintiff 5,000 shares of its capital stock and to employ the plaintiff in its business at a salary of $125 per month, in consideration whereof the plaintiff agreed to purchase the said stock and to enter upon said employment and to pay the defendant the sum of $5,000, the same being the par value of the stock. In pursuance of this agreement the plaintiff purchased the stock, paid the $5,000 therefor, and entered upon the employment of the defendant at the salary of $125 a month. He was retained in the service of the defendant for a little over three months, and was then discharged without cause. Thereupon the plaintiff gave notice to the defendant that he rescinded the agreement and returned the certificate of stock, at the same time demanding repayment of the said sum of $5,000, but the defendant refused to pay the same, and refused to consider the contract rescinded. No fraud is alleged in the making of this agreement or in the breach thereof, and there is no finding of fraud. Upon these facts the trial court concluded that the plaintiff was not entitled to rescind the contract and that his only remedy was an action for damages for breach of the contract of employment. Upon this theory judgment was given for the defendant.

[1] Although the contract did not fix any period of time during which the defendant was to keep the plaintiff in its service it is well established that under such circumstances there is an implied agreement to continue the employment for a reasonable time, and that the contract is broken if the employé is discharged without good cause. Pierce v. Tennessee, etc., Co., 173 U. S. 1, 19 Sup. Ct. 335, 43 L. Ed. 591; Harrington v. Kansas City, etc., Co., 60 Mo. App. 223; Davidson v. Laughlin, 138 Cal. 320, 71 Pac. 345, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 579; Brown v. Crown, etc., Co., 150 Cal. 385, 89 Pac. 86.

[2] The agreement to employ the defendant was a material part of the consideration for which he paid the $5,000. When this part of the agreement was broken the plaintiff became entitled to rescind the contract and demand a return of the money paid. Section 1689 of the Civil Code provides that a party to a contract may rescind the same:

> "2. If, through the fault of the party as to whom he rescinds, the consideration for his obligation fails, in whole or in part.
> "3. If such consideration becomes entirely void from any cause.
> "4. If such consideration, before it is rendered to him, fails in a material respect, from any cause."

The discharge of the plaintiff, without cause, by the defendant, before the reasonable time had elapsed which the contract contemplated, and in the absence of any circumstances showing good reason for the discontinuance of the employment, was a breach of the contract, and it amounted to a failure of the consideration thereof in a substantial part. This brings the case within the provisions of subdivision 2 above quoted. Plaintiff had a clear right to rescind, he availed himself of that right by giving the required notice and returning the consideration, and thereupon he became entitled to recover the money he paid upon the contract. The court erred in holding that the plaintiff's sole remedy was an action for damages.

The judgment is reversed.

BAKER v. BAKER. (L. A. 3351.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1914. Rehearing Denied Oct. 30, 1914.)

1. Divorce (§ 31*)—Nonsupport—Evidence.

A divorce on the ground of nonsupport was properly refused, where the evidence showed that plaintiff had an annual income from her property which was amply sufficient to support her; that her husband's resources and earning capacity were not great; and that she not only had failed to ask him for assistance, but had not expected him to contribute to her support during their separation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

2. Divorce (§ 147*)—Desertion—Offer to Return—Good Faith—Sufficiency of Evidence—Submission to Jury.

Evidence, in a divorce action, held to authorize submitting to the jury whether defendant acted in sufficient good faith in offering to return, to bring himself within Civ. Code, § 102, providing that where one spouse, after deserting the other, offers in good faith to fulfill the marriage contract and solicit condonation, the desertion is cured.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 489–492, 493; Dec. Dig. § 147.*]

3. Divorce (§ 184*)—Review—Harmless Error—Immaterial Findings.

Where, in an action for divorce on the ground of nonsupport, the court found that plaintiff's income from her own property precluded her from relying on such ground, findings regarding defendant's resources and earning capacity, if erroneous because not authorized by the evidence, were harmless.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Divorce, Cent. Dig. §§ 570–573; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

4. Appeal and Error (§ 1078*)—Presentation for Review—Failure to Urge Objection.

Objections to the rulings on evidence will not be considered on appeal, where no argument relative thereto is presented.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Ventura County; Robert M. Clarke, Judge.

Action for divorce by Emma G. Baker against Milton M. Baker. From judgment for defendant and denial of new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

E. B. Coil, of Los Angeles, for appellant. M. J. Rogers, of Ventura, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued for a divorce from her husband upon the grounds of willful desertion and willful neglect, alleging, as causes for divorce upon the latter ground failure to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life, defendant having the ability so to do, and omission to do so by reason of idleness, profligacy, and dissipation. The cause was duly tried upon issues joined, and the court denied the divorce. The findings in substance were that plaintiff possessed property in her own right, having a value of more than $40,000; that the income therefrom was more than sufficient to provide her and her children with the common necessaries of life; that she had received from said property a return of more than $3,000 per year net of all expenses; that certain crops planted by defendant and assigned to plaintiff by an agreement between the parties had yielded plaintiff more than $2,500; that defendant was not guilty of failure to provide plaintiff with the common necessaries of life by reason of idleness, profligacy, and dissipation; that he had never been idle, profligate, or dissipated; that defendant had not failed to provide plaintiff and her children with the common necessaries of life as alleged in the complaint; and that (to quote from the findings themselves):

"Said defendant did on or about the 9th day of August, 1909, voluntarily separate himself from said plaintiff with the intent to desert said plaintiff; that said separation was not against the will of said plaintiff or without her consent; that thereafter, to wit, during the month of August, 1909, said defendant returned to said plaintiff and offered in good faith to fulfill the marriage contract and solicited condonation; that said plaintiff did then and there refuse, and at all times since has continued to refuse, such offer and condonation; that said separation was at all times since the month of August, 1909, with the consent of plaintiff and against the will of defendant; that defendant has at all times since the month of August, 1909, been ready and willing to live with said plaintiff in the relation of husband and wife, all of which said plaintiff has well known; that said plaintiff has at all times since the month of August, 1909, refused to live with this defendant, and refused to permit this defendant to return to or reside with said plaintiff."

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

There were also findings that defendant was possessed of property worth no more than $500; that he was dependent upon his own labor for support; that he was not physically strong; and that he had been under the care of a physician part of the time between August, 1909, and the date of trial, but that he was ready to devote his work and earnings to his wife and children if she would resume marital relations with him. A decree, in consonance with these findings, was entered. From the judgment and from an order denying her motion for a new trial, plaintiff appeals.

There is no attack upon that part of the judgment based upon the finding that defendant was not idle or dissolute, so that may be eliminated from consideration.

[1] Appellant's principal contention is that the evidence does not support the finding with reference to the income derived by plaintiff from her sepaarte property; yet it is conceded that Mrs. Baker owns real and personal property of the value of more than $40,000. Her counsel contend that the rule announced in such cases as Washburn v. Washburn, 9 Cal. 476, and Rycraft v. Rycraft, 42 Cal. 445, is harsh and cruel and should be declared no longer of any force or effect. Both of those cases depended upon the rule that, where the earnings of the wife, being community property, are sufficient for her support, she may not secure a divorce upon the ground of failure on her husband's part to provide her with the common necessaries of life, where the evidence merely shows that he has ability to earn wages, but that he has never interfered with her earnings or other income. This case is more strongly in favor of defendant than either of the two just cited, because here it was shown that the plaintiff was wealthy in her own right, while the earning capacity of the husband was not great, and that she had not asked for assistance from him, during their separation, although he had told her that he was willing to aid her or the children. Without reviewing the testimony in detail, it is sufficient to say that it amply supports the finding with reference to the yearly income from the property of plaintiff. During the time that her property thus yields her an ample return, she has no cause of action for nonsupport. Every natural inference to be drawn from the facts shown in evidence supports the conclusion that plaintiff did not expect the defendant to contribute to her support during their separation. Johnston v. Johnston, 17 Cal. App. 245, 119 Pac. 403. The court's power to refuse a divorce upon the ground of nonsupport, where the complaining spouse has an income from separate property, is somewhat analogous to the authority to relieve a party to an action for divorce from the payment of alimony where it is not necessary, because of her wealth, for the divorced wife's maintenance. The propriety of such relief, upon proper showing, has been declared. Soule v. Soule, 4 Cal. App. 98, 87 Pac. 205.

[2] It is undisputed that defendant went away from home in August, 1909, after a quarrel with his wife over the conduct of her son by a former marriage. From all accounts of the misunderstanding, Mr. Baker was in the wrong, and his conduct in departing was childish. Appellant's counsel contends that the finding of the court to the effect that he repented of his hasty action and sought in good faith to become reconciled to his wife is without support in the evidence. While there are some conflicts in the testimony, there is ample basis for the finding which is attacked. It is in evidence without contradiction that, very shortly after he left his wife, Mr. Baker sought and obtained an interview with her at the office of his attorney. Her legal adviser was there also. According to defendant's testimony, after some talk of a possible reconciliation in the presence of the lawyers, those gentlemen went from the room, leaving the husband and wife to "talk it over alone." Defendant, according to his testimony, then went to her, told her he was sorry for the past, and asked her, for the sake of themselves and the children, to become reconciled to him. Her answer was, "Give me a bill of sale of everything, and then I will talk with you." He met this condition and then went to her home, and again asked for a reconciliation, but it was refused. Plaintiff denied that on the visit to her home her husband asked her to resume marital relations, but she did not deny that, at the office of his attorney, he repeatedly asked for a reconciliation, merely saying to questions upon that subject that she could not say he asked for pardon and a re-establishment of the former relations "in good faith." About two months after his interview with Mrs. Baker at her home, Mr. Baker sent her a birthday gift, which she refused to accept. It was for the trial court, having the opportunity to observe the witnesses, to determine from such evidence what had been done by the defendant, and whether or not he had acted in good faith, thus bringing himself within the provisions of section 102 of the Civil Code. We cannot disturb a finding based upon such evidence. Peretti v. Peretti, 165 Cal. 717, 134 Pac. 322.

[3] It is insisted that the sixth and last finding is without support. This finding was that the allegations in two certain paragraphs of the answer were true. In one of the said paragraphs it was alleged that defendant's property did not exceed $500 in value; that he depended on his personal exertions as a laborer for his support; that he was not a strong man; and that he had suffered from incapacitating illness during a part of the period of separation from his wife. In view of the findings regarding the plaintiff's means of self-maintenance, it is unnecessary to examine the testimony to see if it supports all of these allegations. It was shown that defendant was possessed of limited means, and that he had been working for wages. It was immaterial whether he had been ill part of the time or not. Failure to find on immaterial matters is not a cause for reversal of a judgment. Zihn v. Zihn, 153 Cal. 410, 95 Pac. 868. There was evidence to support that part of the finding based upon the allegation that defendant was willing to give his best endeavors to support his wife and children if she would return to him.

[4] Objections were made to certain rulings with reference to the rejection and admission of testimony, but, as we are favored with no argument upon them, we will not consider them. Gray v. Walker, 157 Cal. 386, 108 Pac. 278; Pigeon v. Fuller, 156 Cal. 702, 105 Pac. 976.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

HARPOLD v. SLOCUM et al. (L. A. 3703.)

(Supreme Court of California. Sept. 30, 1914.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 607*) — Record — Preparation—Undertaking for Costs.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, providing that in lieu of preparing and settling a bill of exceptions an appellant may file with the clerk a notice requesting that a transcript of the testimony, etc., be made up and prepared, and section 953b, providing that at the time such notice is filed with the clerk the appellant shall file an undertaking to pay the costs of preparing such transcript, the clerk was justified in disregarding a request to have such a transcript prepared where no undertaking was filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2665–2672; Dec. Dig. § 607.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 612*) — Record — Form—Necessity of Printing.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, relative to the preparation of a transcript of the testimony, etc., by the stenographic reporter in lieu of a bill of exceptions upon request of appellant, and section 953c, providing that where the appellant elects to avail himself of the preceding sections it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to transmit the record so prepared, and that such record shall be filed with the clerk of the court, to which the appeal is taken, and no transcript thereof need be printed, the appellant cannot elect to avail himself of section 953a to avoid printing the record, where he does not want a bill of exceptions nor anything in lieu of one, and there is a technical judgment roll which he may print in the ordinary manner; and hence, on an appeal upon the judgment roll alone, he cannot avoid printing the record as required by the rules of the Supreme Court, by giving the clerk notice to have the judgment roll prepared as a typewritten record by the stenographic reporter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2694–2701; Dec. Dig. § 612.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 627*) — Record — Correction.

Where, after giving notice to the clerk to have a transcript prepared pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, which the clerk disregarded because of the failure to file an undertaking, appellant proceeded under the old method of preparing transcripts by proposing a statement of the case on motion for a new trial, and after its denial procured a typewritten copy of the papers constituting the judgment roll and of such statement and of the order denying the motion, and procured the judge to certify to the correctness of the statement, and of the order, thereupon filing a typewritten transcript consisting of a single copy as though the transcript were prepared under section 953a, but it appeared that he acted in good faith and without unreasonable delay in filing what he apparently believed to be a sufficient transcript, he would be allowed to thereafter file printed copies of the transcript as required by the rules of court instead of dismissing the appeal, as the language of section 953a et seq. is obscure and frequently misunderstood, and the form of transcripts, except as there prescribed, being wholly within the control of the court, great liberality to avoid dismissals of appeals that may be meritorious should be indulged.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Action by C. Harpold against Thomas A. Slocum and another. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appealed to the District Court of Appeal for the Second District, from which the cause was transferred to the Supreme Court. On motion to dismiss appeal. Motion denied.

B. P. Welch and J. R. Jaffray, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. Thos. O. Toland and Cedric E. Johnson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This case is within the appellate jurisdiction of the District Court of Appeal. Appeals were regularly taken to the District Court of Appeal of the Second District by the defendants from the judgment and from an order refusing a new trial. Thereafter a document was filed in that court purporting to be a transcript on appeal and which the appellants claim is sufficient in that respect. Upon motion of the respondent the district court dismissed the appeal, holding that the document so filed did not constitute a transcript on appeal, and that no sufficient transcript had been filed within the time prescribed by the rules of this court. Upon petition this decision was set aside and the cause was transferred to the Supreme Court for further consideration.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The appellants filed a typewritten transcript consisting of a single copy and without serving a copy thereof upon the respondent. They claim the right to proceed in this manner under the provisions of sections 953a, 953b, and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure. The facts concerning the matter and pertaining to this question are as follows: The judgment was rendered on March 3, 1913, and entered on March 5, 1913. Within ten days after the entry of judgment the defendants filed a notice with the clerk requesting the preparation of a transcript as provided in section 953a, but they did not file any undertaking to pay the costs thereof as provided in section 953b. The clerk paid no further attention to this notice and did not require the stenographic reporter to make a transcript of the record in accordance with the provisions of section 953a. Thereupon the defendants proceeded under the old method of preparing transcripts, by proposing a statement of the case on motion for a new trial. This statement was duly settled by the judge of the court below, and thereupon a motion for new trial was made and submitted to that court, and the same was denied. Upon the denial of this motion the defendants again filed with the clerk a request for the preparation of a transcript after the manner provided in 953a, but again failed to file any undertaking to pay the costs of such transcript, and again the clerk refused to require the reporter to make the same. Thereafter the defendants procured from the reporter a typewritten copy of the papers constituting the judgment roll under the provisions of section 670 of the Code of Civil Procedure and also of the above-mentioned statement of the case on motion for new trial and a copy of the order denying the said motion and of their notice of appeal. They also procured the judge of the superior court to certify to the correctness of the copy of the statement on motion for new trial and of the order denying said motion. These copies are those which they have filed as the transcript on appeal.

[1, 2] It will be observed that there was no effectual attempt to proceed under the provisions of section 953a. The clerk appears to have disregarded the request to have the transcript prepared, and, in view of the failure of the defendants to file any undertaking to pay the costs thereof, we cannot say that he was not justified in so doing. No stenographic report of the trial or of the papers mentioned in the notice to the clerk was ever made or presented to the judge for his approval, or settled by him as that section requires. In determining the scope of these three sections they must be considered together. Section 953c declares that, where "the appellant elects to avail himself of the provisions of the three (two?) preceding sections," the record prepared according to those provisions shall be filed in the appellate court, and that in these cases, that is, where the appellant has so elected, "no transcript thereof need be printed," meaning thereby no transcript of such record. Section 953a makes elaborate provisions for the preparation of a reporter's transcript in lieu of a bill of exceptions, as a part of the judgment roll, and for supplementing it with such other papers as may be necessary to present the points on appeal in cases for which there is no technical judgment roll. This comprises its entire object, purpose, and scope. This being so, the appellant cannot "elect to avail himself of" the section for other purposes, as to avoid printing under the rules; he cannot use it where he does not want a bill of exceptions, nor anything in lieu of one, and there is a technical judgment roll which he may print in the ordinary manner. In such a case the section serves no purpose and has no application. Inasmuch as the provision that the transcript need not be printed applies only where the applicant has availed himself of section 953a, and the latter section relates and applies only to cases where a reporter's transcript is prepared and settled, it follows that in cases where there is no substitute for the bill or reporter's transcript prepared, under that section, there is no statutory exemption from the necessity of printing the transcript, and the rules of the Supreme Court on the subject must prevail. The appellant did not follow section 953a, and therefore he must print the transcript and serve and file copies thereof in the manner provided by those rules.

It appears to be the theory of the appellant that these sections permit the filing of a typewritten record on appeal in all cases, including appeals from the judgment upon the judgment roll alone, meaning by that term the papers constituting the judgment roll as specified in section 670, Code of Civil Procedure. The foregoing analysis of the sections shows that this is not the case and that they have no application to such appeals. The appellant cannot avoid the rule requiring the record upon an appeal from the judgment roll alone to be printed, by giving the clerk a notice, purporting to be within the terms of section 953a, to have the judgment roll prepared as a typewritten record by the stenographic reporter. Section 953a does not apply to such a case. The case of Knoch v. Haizlip, 163 Cal. 20, 124 Pac. 997, is not contrary to this view. That case was not an appeal upon the judgment roll alone. It was the ordinary case of an appeal from the judgment and from an order denying a new trial presented upon a single transcript or record and requiring a review of the proceedings on the trial. The remark in the opinion that these sections may permit the use of a typewritten judgment roll has no necessary application to an appeal upon the judgment roll alone. The question here considered was not there involved.

[3] It does not follow, however, that the appeal must be dismissed. The provisions of the sections mentioned have been the subject of much doubt; the language is obscure and has been frequently misunderstood. Until their meaning becomes well settled by decisions of the court, the better policy is to indulge in great liberality to avoid dismissals of appeals that may be meritorious. The form of transcripts, except as there prescribed, is wholly within the control of this court and is fixed by its rules. Where they have not been strictly followed, the court may, and often does, upon a sufficient showing, relieve a party from his default and allow a proper transcript to be filed. Good faith appears and there was no unreasonable delay in filing the document which was apparently believed to be a sufficient transcript. We think a sufficient excuse for the failure appears and that the ends of justice will be subserved by allowing the appellants to file printed copies of the transcript as provided by the rules of this court.

The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied, and the appellants are allowed 40 days from this time within which to serve and file printed copies of the transcript on appeal as provided in rules 2 and 7 of this court (119 Pac. ix, xi).

Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, provides that notice shall be filed with the clerk, stating the party's desire or intention to appeal from a judgment or their appeal therefrom, and requesting a transcript within 10 days after notice of the entry of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from. Held, that the filing of a notice of appeal from a judgment or order is conclusive evidence that the appellant knew of the judgment or order and its contents at the time of filing the notice, and hence the time for giving the notice to the clerk begins to run at that time.

2. Appeal and Error (§ 607*)—Record—Transcript — Preparation — Notice to Clerk—Time.

Written notice of the entry of a judgment or order appealed from is not necessary to start running the time for filing the notice to the clerk of an intention to appeal and a request for a transcript provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a.

Failure of an appellant to give notice to the clerk of his intention to appeal and request for a transcript within the time fixed by Code Civ. Proc. § 953a, deprives the appellant of the right to proceed with the preparation of his transcript in the manner prescribed by such section.

In Bank. Petition for mandamus by M. F. Fiske and others against P. F. Gosbey, Judge of the Superior Court of Santa Clara county. Application denied.

Henry French, of San Jose, for petitioners.
C. C. Coolidge, of San Jose, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. This is an application on the part of petitioners for a writ of mandate requiring the respondent to settle, allow, and properly certify a transcript on appeal attempted to be prepared under the provisions of section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, for use on an appeal from a judgment of dismissal of an action brought by one Lorenzo Fellers v. Monterey Coal Co. et al., given and made by the clerk of said superior court of Santa Clara county on the 22d day of August, 1910, in compliance with the directions of the plaintiff therein.

The appeal was taken by these petitioners on the 21st day of February, 1911; they on that date filing with the clerk of the superior court a notice of said appeal.

No notice was filed with said clerk by petitioners stating their desire or intention to appeal from said judgment or their appeal therefrom, and requesting that a transcript be made and prepared, as required by the express provisions of 953a, until the 28th day of March, 1911. Said section in terms requires that such notice must be filed within ten days after notice of the entry of judgment, order, or decree appealed from.

The transcript which the judge was requested to settle and certify contains many matters which would have no place in a judgment roll, including affidavits, notices of motion, an order of substitution of attorneys, etc. As is shown by the petition for a writ of mandate herein, what respondents seek to have reviewed on their appeal are certain matters that would not be shown by any judgment roll; their real complaint being against certain orders of the court made prior to the judgment of dismissal, namely, an order refusing to substitute M. F. Fiske as a party plaintiff in the action in place of Lorenzo Fellers, and an order allowing a substitution of another attorney by the plaintiff Fellers in place of Henry French, the original attorney of record for the plaintiff.

[1] As we have said, section 953a requires that the notice to the clerk referred to therein must be filed within ten days after notice of entry of the judgment, order, or decree appealed from. It was held in Estate of Keating, 158 Cal. at page 113, 110 Pac. at page 111, that the filing of a notice of appeal from a judgment or order is, of course, conclusive evidence that the appellant knew of said judgment or order, and its contents, at the time of the filing of said notice, and that this fixed the beginning of the time to give said notice to the clerk, in the absence of anything to show that he had notice thereof theretofore.

[2] It is explicitly declared that a written notice of the entry of the judgment or order is not necessary to start running the time for filing said notice to the clerk, when the appellant has actual knowledge thereof.

[3] It was further held in that case, by failing to give such notice within the time fixed by law, the appellant loses his right to proceed with the preparation of his transcript on appeal in the manner provided by section 953a.

[4] It was also held that "relief from the failure to give notice to the clerk, under section 953a, if it can be given at all, must be sought in the lower court."

We are of the opinion that, regardless of all other points made against the granting of a writ of mandate in this case, the ruling in Estate of Keating, supra, necessarily precludes the granting of the relief sought.

The application for a writ of mandate is denied.

In re WEIR'S ESTATE.

WEIR v. SEILER.

(L. A. 3644.)

1. Executors and Administrators (§ 245*)—Claims—Contest—Elements of Claim—Value—Issues.

An allegation of objections to a claim against a decedent's estate, that the claim was not a proper or legal claim against the estate, in the absence of a demurrer or any other objection, was sufficient to put in issue the value of the various elements of the claim filed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 867–869; Dec. Dig. § 245.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 930*)—General and Special Verdicts—Evidence.

Where general and special verdicts are in harmony on the amount awarded, and no motion was made to strike out the special findings as unsupported by the evidence, the appellate court must assume that they were supported by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3755–3761; Dec. Dig. § 930.*]

3. Executors and Administrators (§ 254*)—Disputed Claims—General and Special Verdicts—Consistency.

Claimant demanded $1,305.68 against decedent's estate made up of three items, $600 for board and lodging for two years, $480 for nursing, sewing, and mending for the same period, and $225.68 for goods, money, material, and labor furnished. The jury found a general verdict in claimant's favor for $765.68 and by a special verdict found that the board and lodging was worth $12.50 a month and the nursing and mending $10 a month, and goods, materials, etc., furnished $117.95, and work and labor $107.73. Held, that the general and special verdicts were not inconsistent, and that the court erred in granting claimant's motion for judgment for the full amount claimed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. § 906; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

4. Executors and Administrators (§ 256*)—Disputed Claims—Review.

Where, on a motion for judgment on a special verdict for the full amount of a claim against decedent's estate for board and lodging furnished decedent, etc., it was stipulated that the matters to be considered on the motion were the claim, the contest thereto, the general verdict, and the special verdict, an objection on appeal that there was no evidence introduced by contestant to show the value of the services rendered and the board and lodging furnished could not be considered.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Executors and Administrators, Cent. Dig. §§ 850–856, 860–863, 910–919; Dec. Dig. § 256.*]

5. Appeal and Error (§ 719*)—Review—Assignments of Error—Costs.

In the absence of an assignment of error with reference to the taxation of costs, an objection that the bill of costs was not served and filed within five days after verdict as required by Code Civ. Proc. § 1033, could not be reviewed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; E. P. Unangst, Judge.

Claim by John Seiler against the estate of John Weir, deceased. From a judgment in favor of claimant, contestant Peter Weir appeals. Modified and affirmed.

Lamy & Putnam, of San Luis Obispo, for appellant. Alex Webster, of Paso Robles, and A. E. Campbell, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. John Seiler filed a claim for $1,305.68 against the estate of John Weir, deceased. The items were $600, board and lodging for two years; $480 for nursing, sewing, and mending for a like period; and $225.68 for goods, money, material, and labor furnished. The claim was allowed by the administrator of John Weir's estate and approved by the judge of the probate court. Peter Weir, a brother of the decedent, filed a contest which was tried according to the provisions of section 1636, Code of Civil Procedure. The questions of fact were presented to a jury and general and special verdicts were returned. The general verdict was in favor of the claimant, John Seiler, for $765.68. By the special verdict the jury answered "Yes" to four questions by which the jurors were required to determine whether or not the claimant had furnished the sort of service, material, etc., demanded by him. To questions regarding the value of the things for which payment was demanded the jury found that the board and lodging for two years was worth $12.50 per month; nursing and mending $10 per month; goods, materials, money, and merchandise, $117.95; work and labor, $107.73. The aggregate of these items is $765.68, the amount of the general verdict. The court received and filed the verdicts and caused them to be entered upon the minutes of the court; but it appearing to the court that the special verdict was inconsistent with the general verdict, and that upon the special verdict John Seiler was entitled to judgment for the full amount demanded, such a judgment was entered for $1,305.68, together with costs and disbursements to the amount of $133.30. The judgment was entered some days after the trial and reception of the verdicts and after motion of the claimant's counsel for such a judgment, which, by stipulation, was heard "only upon the record consisting of said Seiler's claim, the contest thereto, the general verdict, and the special verdict." This appeal is from the order granting said motion and from the judgment.

It is apparent that the inconsistency between the general and special verdict, asserted by the claimant's counsel and found by the court, is not one of arithmetic. Both respondent and the court evidently held the opinion that the value of the items of Seiler's claim was not in issue, but that their validity was, and that the finding that the estate owed the claimant for the services, materials, etc., for which payment was sought left the court no alternative except the entry of judgment for the amount demanded.

The only grounds of contest urged by Peter Weir were the following:

"(1) That said claim was erroneously and inadvertently allowed by said administrator and by the judge of this court.

"(2) That said claim is not a proper or legal claim against the said estate, or against decedent.

"(3) That if said alleged board and lodging, nursing, labor, and materials were, or either of them was furnished at all, the same were paid and discharged by decedent during his lifetime."

The amount, if any, due to the claimant from the estate, could not be in issue under the first or the third grounds of contest; but appellant insists that the second ground did make issuable the value of the services, advances, goods, etc., for which Seiler demanded payment. Doubtless that was the theory of both litigants and of the court at the trial. There was no demurrer to the contest. The questions framed for and answered by the jury involved the very matter which the court afterwards held not to be in issue. The form of the questions and the answers in the special verdict may be perfectly illustrated by quotation of the first two which were as follows:

"(1) Did John Seiler furnish board and lodging to John Weir for the two years ending February 13, 1912? A. Yes.

"(2) If your answer to the above question is 'yes,' then state what the value of said board and lodging was. A. $12.50 per month."

[1-3] It would be most unjust to deprive contestant of the fruits of his victory after a trial in which the value of the items of Seiler's account had been treated as issuable by every one concerned. While the allegation that the claim was not a "proper or legal claim against the said estate" is not a model of pleading, we hold that in the absence of demurrer or any other objection it was sufficient to put in issue the value of the various elements of the claim filed by Seiler. There was no motion to strike out the findings of value as not being supported by the evidence. The general and special verdicts are in harmony on the amount awarded. Therefore we must assume that they were supported by the evidence. There was no inconsistency between the verdicts, and the court erred in granting the motion on that ground. Irrgang v. Ott, 9 Cal. App. 441, 99 Pac. 528; Obersteller v. Commercial Assurance Co., 96 Cal. 647, 31 Pac. 587.

[4] In respondent's brief occurs the statement that "no evidence was introduced by contestant Weir" as to the values of the services rendered and board and lodging furnished. This is denied by appellant. Both statements must be ignored by this court in view of the stipulation of the parties to the contest regarding the matters to be considered on the motion. These were "Seiler's claim, the contest thereto, the general verdict, and the special verdict."

[5] The record shows that the bill of costs was not served and filed within five days after the verdict as required by section 1033, Code of Civil Procedure; but, as there is no assignment of error in the taxation of costs presented by the record before us, we may not review that matter.

The judgment should be modified by striking out the paragraph thereof in which the court expresses the view that the special findings are inconsistent with the general verdict and by awarding $765.68 on respondent's claim instead of $1,305.68. In other respects the judgment should stand affirmed, and it is so ordered.

We concur: LORIGAN, J.; HENSHAW, J.

KAISER v. HANCOCK, Judge. (Civ. 1288.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Aug. 26, 1914.)

1. Mandamus (§ 160*)—Alternative Writ—Notice—Proof.

Under court rule 26 (119 Pac. xiv), providing that, when application is made for an alternative writ, an order staying the proceedings of any court or officer will not be made unless due notice shall have been given to all parties interested in the proceedings, an applicant for a stay of proceedings must furnish evidence that such notice has been given.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 326–335; Dec. Dig. § 160.*]

2. Mandamus (§ 57*)—Acts of Judge—Discretion.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1176, providing that an appeal by defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment unless the trial judge so directs, mandamus will not issue to compel the trial judge to grant a stay of such judgment, since that is a matter of discretion.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mandamus, Cent. Dig. §§ 68, 114–120; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 479*)—Stay—Discretion of Trial Court—Abuse.

Where every issue raised by defendant's pleadings in an action to recover real property was found against him, and no special circumstances of hardship to the defendant were shown, the trial court will not be held to have abused its discretion in refusing a stay pending his appeal, since an abuse of discretion will not be presumed, but must be made clearly to appear.

Application by C. F. Kaiser against John Hancock, Judge of the Superior Court of the County of Calaveras, for a writ of mandate. Writ denied.

A. H. Carpenter, Walter T. Lynch, and Ben Berry, all of Stockton, for petitioner. Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for respondent.

CHIPMAN, P. J. Petitioner seeks the writ of mandate directing respondent to make an order staying execution on a judgment against petitioner in a certain action wherein petitioner is defendant and Henry T. Higginbotham, as administrator of the estate of Mary G. Davis, deceased, is plaintiff.

It appears from the petition that the property involved is known as the Valley Springs Hotel and its equipment, situated in the town of Valley Springs, Calaveras county, belonging to the estate of said Mary G. Davis, deceased; that in the said action of said administrator against said Kaiser it was alleged that defendant therein was, on and prior to April 10, 1914, in possession of said property as tenant at will of said administrator; that, on said April 10, 1914, plaintiff, said administrator, terminated said tenancy by giving written notice to said defendant to remove from said premises and deliver said property to plaintiff within the period of 30 days specified in said notice, said notice having been duly served as prescribed in section 1162 of the Code of Civil Procedure; that all right of tenancy or claim of occupancy was thereby terminated on May 10, 1914; that said defendant did not, within said 30 days, or at any other time, surrender said property or any part thereof to plaintiff, but remained in possession thereof at the expiration of said 30 days and ever since said time; that, on May 11, 1910, plaintiff caused notice to be served upon defendant to deliver up possession of said property to him, said administrator, within 3 days from the service of said notice; that more than 30 days have expired since service of said first notice terminating said tenancy, and that more than 3 days have elapsed since said last referred to notice was served; that defendant has refused to deliver said property, or any part thereof, and unlawfully retains possession thereof; that, while defendant was in possession of said property as such tenant at will, the amount of rent paid by defendant for the use of said property was $50 per month, agreeably to the understanding between plaintiff and defendant, and by reason of the foregoing facts plaintiff has sustained damages in the value of said rent from May 10, 1914, to the commencement of this action; that plaintiff prayed judgment for the restitution and possession of the premises and for the amount of rental and such sum as may accrue from the filing of the complaint to date of judgment, and that said rental may be trebled, and that it be declared that said tenancy has ceased and that writ of possession forthwith issue. It further appears by the petition that, on June 11, 1914, defendant served and filed his answer and cross-complaint in said cause, and, issue being joined, said cause came on for trial before a jury, on July 12, 1914, and the jury returned a verdict in favor of plaintiff; that, on July 20, 1914, judgment for plaintiff was duly made and entered, and that, on July 29, 1914, defendant duly appealed to the District Court of Appeal from said judgment, under the alternative method; that, on July 30, 1914, defendant "moved John Hancock, as such judge of said superior court for an order staying execution upon said judgment pending the final determination of said appeal and at the same time offered a sufficient stay bond therefor," but the said judge refused to make such order. The petition was filed in this court August 13, 1914.

In the return respondent "admits that application was made to him on the 30th day of July, 1914, to fix the amount of a stay bond on appeal, and to order proceedings upon said judgment stayed during appeal, and denies that it was his plain or other duty to make such order, or that since, or at any time, has been his duty to make such order"; alleges that said action is one in unlawful detainer, and is prosecuted under the provisions of chapter 4, part 3, title 3, of the Code of Civil Procedure, designated as summary proceedings for obtaining possession of real property; that section 1176 of said Code provides, "An appeal taken by the defendant shall not stay proceedings upon the judgment unless the judge or justice before whom the same was rendered so directs," and that the judge before whom said judgment was rendered refused to direct that proceedings upon said judgment be stayed, and has never at any time directed that such proceedings be stayed, "and that respondent acted legally and rightfully in refusing to stay proceedings upon said judgment." It further appears by the return, and is not denied: That no copy of notice of appeal has been served upon plaintiff in said action; that no notice of intention to move for a new trial has ever been served or filed, "and no proceedings whatever have been taken by or on behalf of petitioner for a new trial of said action," or for the settlement of a bill of exceptions in said action, or towards proposing a bill of exceptions or statement of any kind, and petitioner has taken no steps toward having the testimony taken at the trial of said action written up; that petitioner states in his petition that said appeal has been taken under the alternative method, but respondent says that petitioner has never filed with the clerk a notice stating that he desires or intends to appeal, or has appealed, and requesting that a transcript of the testimony offered or taken in the same, the rulings, instructions, acts, or statements of the court, and objections and exceptions of counsel, be made up or prepared, or any notice containing any of said statements; that "he has not filed or given the notice required by section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, or taken any proceedings in said court under the provisions of said section; that he has filed no other notice in said matter, other than the so-called notice of appeal which is hereto attached and marked Exhibit L"; that no stipulation has ever been entered into, and no order of any kind made, extending the time for proposing, filing, or settling a bill of exceptions or statement, or giving or filing said notice required by section 953a of the said Code, and "respondent alleges that the time for taking any such proceedings has long since elapsed; and that, if said [appeal] has any virtue, it is only as an appeal from the judgment on the judgment roll, and respondent avers that there is no reasonable or probable cause for said appeal." The return then sets out copies of all the papers constituting the judgment roll in said action, certified by the clerk of the court, and also the certificate of the clerk "relating to the manner in which said appeal was attempted to be taken and of other facts in this answer." Respondent avers that "he rightfully and justly exercised the authority reposed in him by the statute in refusing to order proceedings on said judgment stayed during appeal," and he suggests that, if it was within his discretion, it was an appropriate exercise of that discretion to refuse to grant such writ. "Respondent further avers that he had no notice of any kind of the application or petition herein until served with the alternative writ herein."

[1] Before going into the merits of the application we wish to call attention to paragraph 4, rule 26 (119 Pac. xiv):

> "When an application is made for an alternative writ, an order staying the proceedings of any court or officer, until the return of the writ, will not be made unless due notice of the application for the writ shall have been given to all the parties interested in the proceedings."

Respondent, in his return, states that he had no notice of the application for the alternative writ. Attention of petitioner's attorney, Mr. Lynch, was called to this rule when the alternative writ was applied for, and, while there was no evidence of any notice having been given the judge or the attorneys in the pending action, we were assured that verbal notice was in fact given of an intention to apply for the writ and that the parties expressed willingness that it should be made. We have no reason to doubt the good faith of Mr. Lynch in the matter. The incident furnishes occasion for calling attention to the rule and for our saying that in the future it will be strictly adhered to. Parties applying for alternative writs, in which an order is requested staying the proceedings of any court or officer until the return of the writ, must furnish evidence that notice has been given to all parties interested that such application will be made, in order that such parties may have an opportunity to oppose the issuing of the alternative writ to be applied for. The wisdom and justice of the rule are obvious, for often the lack of merit in the application may be disclosed at the hearing of the application, and injury which might ensue by the issuing of a restraining order be thus averted.

[2] Section 1176 of the Code of Civil Procedure has been under review in several cases before the Supreme Court, among them the following: McDonald v. Hanlon, 71 Cal. 535, 12 Pac. 515; Gross v. Kelleher, 73 Cal. 639, 15 Pac. 362; Cluness v. Bowen, 135 Cal. 660, 67 Pac. 1048; Bateman v. Superior Court, 139 Cal. 140, 72 Pac. 922; Sarthou v. Reese, 151 Cal. 96, 90 Pac. 187; and also in Plummer v. Agoure, 20 Cal. App. 319, 128 Pac. 1014. Some of these cases were applications for supersedeas. But supersedeas is merely an ancillary process designated to supersede the enforcement of the judgment of the court below, and the writ of mandate here sought is to accomplish the same result. It was held, in Plummer v. Agoure, supra:

> "While the action of the trial judge in refusing to direct a stay of proceedings is subject to review on appeal, and such order will be reversed for an abuse of discretion in making the ruling, it cannot be reviewed upon an application for a writ of supersedeas."

A petition for rehearing of that case was denied by the Supreme Court.

In Sarthou v. Reese, supra, the action was unlawful detainer. Defendant, in addition to denials of the matters alleged in the complaint, filed a cross-bill claiming affirmative relief, as did the defendant in the action here. The decision in the case cited and in the case here was against the defendant upon all the issues, including those in the cross-complaint, and judgment was entered for immediate restitution on the demised premises. In the case cited, defendant appealed from the judgment, as defendant has here, and the judge of the superior court before whom the action was tried refused to fix the amount of an undertaking to stay proceedings pending appeal. In the case cited, defendant petitioned the Supreme Court for a supersedeas. Said the court, by Chief Justice Beatty:

> "There can be no stay of proceedings upon an appeal from a judgment of restitution in an action of unlawful detainer unless the trial judge so directs"—citing section 1176, C. C. P.; Cluness v. Bowen, 135 Cal. 660, 67 Pac. 1048.

In Cluness v. Bowen, the court said:

> "In the absence of such direction" from the trial judge, "this court has no power to order a supersedeas" in such a case as this.

[3] If, however, as petitioner contends, the discretion given the trial judge may be controlled by mandate when abused, we fail to discover anything in the record before us showing an abuse of such discretion. It was conceded at the argument that the appeal now pending is on the judgment roll, the constituent papers of which are made part of the return. Every issue presented by defendant's answer and cross-complaint has been resolved against him, and the facts set out in plaintiff's complaint found to be true by the general verdict of the jury, crystallized in the judgment of the court. There were no special circumstances of hardship to defendant shown to the trial judge calling for the exercise of his discretion in defendant's favor, so far as we know, when a stay of execution was applied for, and none is presented here. Abuse of discretion by a judge will not be presumed; it must be made clearly to appear before his discretion will be interfered with. Viewed, then, either as a power exclusively given the trial judge, or as a power merely within his discretion, we fail to discover error in the order complained of.

The writ is denied, and the restraining order heretofore issued is dissolved.

CROW v. CROW. (Sac. 2105.)

1. Appeal and Error (§ 1009*)—Review—Findings.

Findings on conflicting evidence in equity cases will not be disturbed on appeal unless the testimony on which they are based is so inherently improbable as to constitute no evidence at all.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3970–3978; Dec. Dig. § 1009.*]

2. New Trial (§ 128*) — Specifications of Error—Sufficiency.

While the ancient strictness governing the sufficiency of specifications of error on motion for new trial has relaxed, the specifications, where the sufficiency of the evidence to support the findings is attacked, must show in what particular the evidence is deficient, so that the error may be cured on subsequent trial.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see New Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 257–262; Dec. Dig. § 128.*]

3. Appeal and Error (§ 302*)—Specifications of Error—Sufficiency.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 659, subd. 3, providing that a party moving for a new trial must specify the particular errors relied upon, neither the trial court nor the appellate tribunal can review the sufficiency of evidence to support findings of fact where the specifications were merely general and did not show wherein the evidence was insufficient.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Suit by Emma Jane Crow by Virginia Patchett, her guardian, against B. F. Crow. From a judgment for defendant and an order denying new trial, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. K. Johnson, of San Francisco, for appellant. Maddux & Maddux, of San Francisco, and Henry C. McPike, of Oakland, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This is an action to set aside a deed made by Emma J. Crow to her grandnephew B. F. Crow to 1157 acres of farm land in Stanislaus county of the admitted value of $50,000. The deed was executed on the 21st day of December, 1910. The grantor was a childless widow over 77 years of age. The grantee had been the business manager of her properties and had farmed for her on shares this particular piece of land. Close relations of trust and confidence existed between them. The complaint charged the procurement of the deed by defendant through his own fraud in which he was aided and abetted by his wife and his attorney. It is also charged that the deed was executed under a mistake of the grantor as to its true meaning and effect. Four months after the execution of the deed Emma Jane Crow was declared an incompetent, and Miss Virginia Patchett, a niece of the incompetent, with whom she had been temporarily residing, was named as her guardian. This action is prosecuted in the name of the incompetent by that guardian.

At the conclusion of the trial the court found: That Emma J. Crow executed the deed for the love and affection which she bore defendant, who was her nephew both by blood and by marriage; that the defendant had resided with Emma J. Crow and her husband from the time he was of the age of two years and was regarded by them with deep affection; that at the time of the making, execution, and delivery of the deed Emma J. Crow was desirous of conveying the land to the defendant for his better support, maintenance, protection, and livelihood, and at the time of this gift was possessed of other real and personal property of the value of upwards of $50,000; that all of her property was income-bearing, producing an income more than sufficient for her support. The findings then proceed to negative all of the allegations of fraud and deceit on the part of the defendant and ignorance and lack of understanding and misunderstanding on the part of the plaintiff, and upon these latter propositions affirmatively finds that at the time of the execution of the deed plaintiff was competent to execute it and fully appreciated and understood the nature, quality, and character of the act of conveying the real property to the defendant, and that it was her intention then and there to transfer it to the defendant, and that she had for a long time previously intended so to do.

[1] Some of the court's determinations of fact were reached under a conflict in the evidence. But throughout appellant argues the case upon equitable principles called into exercise where the facts found are the precise opposite of those here declared. Thus, to illustrate, Mrs. Crow testifies that she meant to execute a paper which would give the defendant the land upon her death but not during her lifetime. Had the court found in accordance with this testimony, the rules applied by chancellors in avoidance of acts of aged grantors would have applicability; but the finding of the court is squarely against the plaintiff's testimony in this regard. It is in effect that plaintiff understandingly and advisedly meant to do precisely what she did do. We are unable to do as appellant seemingly would have us do, treat the case as one without findings of fact. In effect, this court, under appellant's argument, is asked to sit as a chancellor and make its own findings upon the evidence favorable to her contention, when, of course, the equitable principles which she invokes would at once be applicable. Thus, if fraud were committed, it would be ground for avoidance, and we are, in effect, asked, as against the finding of the court, to declare that such fraud was committed. We are likewise asked to find a lack of understanding and a consequent mistake, upon which facts being proved, an avoidance of the act of the grantor might naturally follow.

Because of the findings adverse to appellant's contention, the well-settled equitable principles announced in such cases as Richards v. Donner, 72 Cal. 211, 13 Pac. 584, Soberanes v. Soberanes, 97 Cal. 140, 31 Pac. 910, and De Arellanes v. Arellanes, 151 Cal. 443, 90 Pac. 1059, cannot avail appellant. In Richards v. Donner the deed was set aside by the trial court and this court upheld the decree. In Soberanes v. Soberanes, where, as here, the plaintiff appeared by her guardian ad litem, the trial court refused to set aside the deed, and its judgment was affirmed. In De Arellanes v. Arellanes the aged and illiterate mother sought to set aside a deed made to her son. The court's findings were against the plaintiff, and the judgment which followed those findings was here upheld, and in the course of the opinion this court felt compelled, as here it is compelled, to advert to the mistaken attitude of the appellant in regard to the evidence. This court said:

> "It should not, however, be necessary to here state that the amount of credit to be given to the positive testimony of any witness is solely a question for the trial tribunal, except, perhaps, where the testimony, in the light of the undisputed facts, is inherently so improbable and impossible of belief as to, in effect, constitute no evidence at all. See Fowden v. Pacific Coast S. S. Co., 149 Cal. 151 [86 Pac. 178]. It certainly cannot be said that defendant's testimony was of such a nature as to be placed in the category last mentioned."

Upon the second appeal in Soberanes v. Soberanes, 106 Cal. 1, 39 Pac. 39, 527, the judgment of the trial court refusing to grant a new trial in favor of the plaintiff was affirmed. The language of the chief justice in his concurring opinion to the effect that if the incompetent plaintiff "had commenced the action herself, or had consented to it, or had in any way manifested a desire to set aside her conveyance, her prayer, I think, must have been granted upon the ground that the gift was of her whole estate without any reservation or power of revocation; that it was made upon the understanding that she should be supported and cared for by her donee, and that no provision or condition for her support was contained in the grant, or in any written agreement; and for the further reason that her donee occupied towards her a relation of special trust and confidence; and that she had no independent advice," is not to be construed as holding that such a result would follow if the findings of the trial court were adverse to the statement of facts therein contained. In short, as has often heretofore been pointed out, this court cannot make findings, and must accept those made by the trial court if supported by evidence. Estate of Moore, 162 Cal. 324, 122 Pac. 844. The utmost that appellant can contend against these findings is that the trial court's determination was arrived at under a conflict of evidence.

[2, 3] But there is not in the record as to most of the material findings any proper specification of objection thereto or any proper specification of error or insufficiency at all. Thus, to illustrate, the court by its findings negatived the allegations of the complaint of specific acts charged as having been done by defendant in consummation of the fraud. Thus, the court found:

> "It is not true, as stated in plaintiff's second amended complaint, that the defendant called upon the plaintiff at her place of residence on or about the 21st day of December, etc."

The specification is:

> "There is no evidence to justify the decision and finding of the court, or to prove or tending to prove, that the defendant called upon the plaintiff at her place of residence on or about the 21st day of December, etc."

Again, the complaint charged that plaintiff "signed said deed without reading it or having it read to her." The court found these and all similar allegations to be untrue in the precise words of the allegations. The specification of error is:

> "There is no evidence to justify the decision and finding of the court, or to prove or tending to prove, that plaintiff signed said deed without reading the same or having it read to her, etc."

Again the complaint charged:

> "That had plaintiff known that she was signing a deed conveying away her property when she signed the instrument she would not have signed said deed of gift."

The finding of the court is that it is not true:

> "That had plaintiff known she was signing a deed, conveying away her property she would not have signed the same."

The specification is:

> "That there is no evidence to justify the decision of the court, or to prove or tending to prove, that had the plaintiff known she was signing a deed conveying away said property at the time she signed said instrument, she would not have signed the said instrument."

The ancient strictness of the rule governing the sufficiency of specifications has by later decisions been properly much abated. Bell v. Staacke, 141 Cal. 186, 74 Pac. 774. But nevertheless the specifications in any case must be sufficient to convey fair and correct knowledge both to the adverse party and to the trial court of the precise findings excepted to as not being sustained by the evidence, and this for the very manifest purpose that the adverse party may know what evidence by way of amendments to embody in the statement or bill and that the trial court's attention may be properly directed to these designated matters. Neither the trial court nor this court can consider the question of the sufficiency of the findings when such specifications are not made in substantial terms, for the law itself declares that unless so made they shall be disregarded on the hearing of the motion, and consequently must also be disregarded here. Code Civ. Proc. 659, subd. 3. For this additional reason, therefore, and because of this lack of adequate specification, the findings sought to be assailed are not here subject to review.

The judgment and order appealed from are therefore affirmed.

We concur: MELVIN, J.; LORIGAN, J.

WOOD v. KREPPS et al. (L. A. 3361.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1914.)

1. Chattel Mortgages (§ 64*)—Validity—Memorandum of Transaction.

While St. 1909, p. 970, § 5, requires personal property brokers to give to borrowers a notice of the contents of notes and chattel mortgages taken to secure loans, and imposes a penalty for failure, the failure of a broker to give such memorandum does not invalidate a chattel mortgage and note taken to secure the loan.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Chattel Mortgages, Dec. Dig. § 64.*]

2. Pawnbrokers (§ 4*)—Chattel Mortgages—Validity—Ordinances.

Under a municipal ordinance requiring pawnbrokers to secure a license and persons lending money upon personal property to pay a license fee, the fact that a party carried on a pawnbroking business, without the required license will not invalidate chattel mortgages taken by him for security for loans made in the business of lending money upon personal property; the two businesses being wholly distinct.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Pawnbrokers, Cent. Dig. § 3; Dec. Dig. § 4.*]

3. Licenses (§ 6*)—Lending of Money upon Personal Property.

The lending of money upon chattel mortgages, and the carrying on of an habitual loan business on such security, is not contrary to public policy, and is not subject to regulation, as in the case of pawnbrokers.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 5, 6, 19; Dec. Dig. § 6.*]

4. Pawnbrokers (§ 4*) — Failure to Pay License Tax—Effect.

Where the object of an ordinance requiring a license is to prevent improper persons from engaging in a business, the imposition of a penalty amounts to a prohibition, and a contract made by an unlicensed person is void, yet where a city imposed a license tax upon those engaged in lending money for chattel mortgages, which business was not subjected to any regulation, contracts made by one who had not procured the required license are not void; the obvious purpose of the ordinance being to raise revenue.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by Luther B. Wood against J. E. Krepps and another. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Grant Jackson and Theodore Martin, both of Los Angeles, for appellants. John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. This action was brought to foreclose a chattel mortgage given as security for the payment of a promissory note for $1,000 principal, with interest at 4 per cent. per month, executed by defendants in favor of the plaintiff. The note and mortgage were executed March 7, 1910, and the mortgage was recorded the day following its execution.

The answer of the defendants set up that at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage the plaintiff was engaged in the city of Los Angeles in carrying on the business of pawnbroking and the business of loaning money for himself and others on personal security and on personal property other than carrying on the business of banking, and, as special defenses against the right of plaintiff to recover, alleged: First, that plaintiff did not at the time of the execution of the note and mortgage—March 7, 1910—nor until October, 1911, give to the defendants the memoranda or notice provided for by section 5 of an act of the Legislature defining personal property brokers and regulating their charges and business (Stats. 1909, p. 969); and, second, that plaintiff had not, at the time of the execution of said note and mortgage, procured a license, as required by an ordinance of the city of Los Angeles to authorize him to carry on the business of pawnbroking, or the business of loaning money for himself and others upon personal security and upon personal property in which he was engaged. Plaintiff moved to strike out from the answer these special defenses referred to, on the ground that they were immaterial and redundant. The court granted the motion and entered a decree of foreclosure in favor of the plaintiff. Defendants appeal from this decree, insisting that the court erred in striking out the defenses set up in their answer. This is the only point made.

[1] The theory of the defendants in alleging that plaintiff had failed to give them the memorandum or notice of the contents of the note and mortgage and other matters provided for by section 5 of the said act of 1909, at the time the note and mortgage were executed, is that such failure precluded any recovery by plaintiff. But this theory is erroneous. While the section relied on provides that when a loan such as here is made a memorandum or notice of the contents of the note and mortgage and other matters shall be given the mortgagors, it is not made by the statute essential to the validity of the transaction that this shall be done. It is a statutory duty, imposed upon the personal property broker, to be performed by him when the loan is made, but after the instrument taken as security is executed. It is a matter which does not at all enter into the contract between the parties, but is collateral to it. The statute itself provides that as a penalty for failure to give the memorandum or notice the broker shall be subjected to a fine not exceeding the specified amount. This is the only penalty which the statute imposes. No further penalty is declared, and the contract itself is not in any manner affected by the failure to comply with this provision of the section.

[2-4] Now as to the ordinance pleaded in the answer. This ordinance, alleged to have been in force on and prior to the making of the note and mortgage, was a general license ordinance of the city of Los Angeles, which declared that it shall be unlawful for any person to commence or carry on any trade, profession, or occupation set forth in the ordinance without having first procured a license to do so; declared that the amount of such license imposed on any occupation mentioned in the ordinance shall be deemed a debt to the city, to be collected by civil action; provided that "every person, firm or corporation engaged in doing or carrying on the business of pawnbroking or the business of loaning money for himself or any other person upon personal security, upon evidences of indebtedness, assignments of salary, salary warrants or demands, or any personal property other than those carrying on the business of banking" shall pay a license of $50 per annum; and further provided that a violation of any of the provisions of the ordinance shall constitute a misdemeanor punishable by fine or imprisonment, or both.

The theory of the appellants upon this branch of the defense pleaded is that, the note and mortgage having been executed at a time when respondent was engaged in the business of a personal property broker as distinguished from that of a pawnbroker without having procured the license required by the ordinance to do so, the note and mortgage given to him were executed in violation of the law, and are void.

It is to be observed in considering this claim of appellants that while they allege in their special defenses that respondent was engaged in the business of pawnbroking and also in the business of loaning money upon personal property as a personal property broker (and the section of the ordinance just quoted fixing a license tax mentions them both), still they are there treated as separate and distinct businesses, and the transaction here involved pertains solely to the business of loaning money on personal property—the personal property brokerage business. In their answer, though not heretofore referred to, appellants set up, in connection with their pleading based on the ordinance, various regulations prescribed by it for the conduct of the business of pawnbroking and the failure of the respondent to conform to them, as well as a failure to have procured a license for carrying on the business of a personal property broker, and cite cases—notably that of Levison v. Boaz, 150 Cal 185, 88 Pac. 825, 12 L. R. A. (N. S.) 575, 11 Ann. Cas. 661—where it is held that the business of pawnbroking is subject to police regulations for the benefit of the public; that it may be suppressed or licensed as a municipality sees fit; that when licensed it may be required to be conducted under rules, regulations, and restrictions; and that if conducted without a license or without conforming to the regulations imposed, contracts of pledge made in the transaction of such business are rendered void. But here we are not concerned with the business of pawnbroking or the validity of contracts made in disregard of regulations imposed by ordinance for the valid conduct of such business because the contract involved here has no relation to that business. It is one alleged to have been entered into with plaintiff while conducting the business of a personal property broker—loaning money on chattel mortgage—without a license, a legitimate business which neither called for nor was subjected to any regulation under the ordinance.

But considered even with respect to such latter business appellants insist that as the note and mortgage were executed to plaintiff while he was engaged in such business and as part of it in violation of the ordinance which forbade, under penalty, that particular business from being carried on without a license, the note and mortgage are therefore void. The position of counsel for appellants is that where a penalty is fixed in an ordinance for doing business without a license, it amounts to a prohibition against doing such business, and a contract executed in violation of such prohibition cannot be enforced. There are some authorities which sustain this position to the extreme extent which appellants claim, but it is not of general application. Whether the imposition of a penalty under a statute or ordinance is intended to be prohibitory or not is to be determined from a consideration of its nature and terms, and in determining this, certain rules have been established which are generally recognized. The general doctrine now well settled by the authorities is that when the object of the statute or ordinance in requiring a license for the privilege of carrying on a certain business is to prevent improper persons from engaging in that particular business, or is for the purpose of regulating it for the protection of the public or in the interest of public morals, health, or police, the imposition of the penalty amounts to a prohibition against doing the business without a license, and a contract made by an unlicensed person in violation of the statute or ordinance is void. This was the rule applied in Levison v. Boaz to the pawnbroking contract there involved, and that case fairly illustrates its application. On the other hand, it is equally well settled, though it must be admitted that there are some few authorities to the contrary, that when the object of the statute or ordinance in imposing a license to conduct a harmless and legitimate business is solely for the purpose of yielding a public revenue, and not for the purpose of protection, contracts made in the course of such business are valid, notwithstanding a penalty is imposed for a failure to obtain a license to conduct it. This was the purpose—municipal revenue solely—which the municipality had in view by requiring a license for carrying on the business of loaning money on personal property or the personal property brokerage business in which plaintiff was engaged, and out of which the note and mortgage here involved arose. There is no law in this state making the business of loaning money on personal property illegal. It is a legitimate branch of commercial business which the state has only regulated to the extent of fixing the maximum rate of interest. The business itself, however, is not affected. It is neither malum in se nor malum prohibitum. The ordinance does not pretend to prescribe or prohibit the business. Any one may carry it on, the only condition attached to doing so being that the person engaging in it must obtain a license. The only penalty imposed is that if he does not do so, he will not only be subject to a civil action at the instance of the city, but likewise to a penalty in a criminal proceeding for doing business without having obtained it. The carrying on of the business itself is not prohibited; it is only the carrying on of it without a license. The prohibition runs against the person engaged in it without a license, not against the business itself. The ordinance does not declare that a contract, made by any one in the conduct of the various businesses for which licenses are provided to be procured under the ordinances, shall, if a license is not obtained, be invalid; nor is there any provision therein indicating in the slightest that this failure was intended to affect in any degree the right of contract. The primary purpose of the ordinance is to secure revenue by the imposition of license taxes on the several occupations mentioned in it, and not to suppress or to prohibit their being carried on, and while a penalty is, as usual, imposed for failure to obtain the license, this, in the absence of any declaration of a further penalty, is the only one to which the party conducting the business without a license was intended to be subjected. The question of license is essentially one between the city and the person engaging in business within the limits of the municipality. It is not a matter in which third parties are interested. Whatever penalties are imposed upon business delinquencies are in aid of enforcing the rights of the city, and are not intended to operate further so as to defeat contracts between those engaged in business without a license and third parties, or to afford the latter an opportunity of repudiating their indebtedness or acquiring property without paying for it.

The rule just declared is supported by the weight of authority. Vermont Loan & Trust Co. v. Hoffman et al., 5 Idaho, 376, 49 Pac. 314, 37 L. R. A. 509, 95 Am. St. Rep. 186; Walker v. Baldwin & Frick et al., 103 Md. 352, 63 Atl. 362; Buckman v. Bergholz, 37 N. J. Law, 347; Toocker v. Duckworth, 107 Mo. App. 231, 80 S. W. 963; Sunflower Lumber Co. v. Turner Supply Co., 158 Ala. 191, 48 South. 510, 132 Am. St. Rep. 20; Mandelbaum v. Gregovich, 17 Nev. 87, 28 Pac. 121, 45 Am. Rep. 433; Larned v. Andrews, 106 Mass. 435, 8 Am. Rep. 346; Lindsey v. Rutherford, 56 Ky. (17 B. Mon.) 245; Fairly v. Wappoo Mills, 44 S. C. 227, 22 S. E. 108, 29 L. R. A. 215; Harris v. Runnels, 53 U. S. (12 How.) 79, 13 L. Ed. 901; Niemeyer et al. v. Wright, 75 Va. 239, 40 Am. Rep. 720; Aiken v. Blaisdell, 41 Vt. 655; Elliott on Contracts, vol. 1, § 267; Sutherland, Stat. Con. § 336.

We quote from only one of these authorities, which, however, discusses at some length the doctrine applicable in cases such as this. In Vermont Loan & Trust Co. v. Hoffman et al., cited, the action was brought to recover on certain promissory notes and to foreclose a mortgage representing a loan made by plaintiff to defendants. A statute of Idaho required a license to be procured before engaging in the business of loaning money, and declared it a misdemeanor to transact such business without having procured it. The defendants set up as a defense to the action that the loan to them was made by plaintiff while engaged in the business of loaning money without having procured such license, and that hence the transaction was in violation of the law of the state and void. In affirming the action of the trial court in sustaining a demurrer to this defense, the Supreme Court of that state said:

"From a careful study of all the authorities we think that the better class of authorities and the better reasoning leads to the conclusion that, where the prohibition is implied from a penalty imposed, as in the case at bar, the prohibition being for the protection of the public revenue, and no declaration in the statute making the prohibited act void, the doing of such act is not illegal. There is nothing in our statutes which makes it unlawful to loan money at interest. There is nothing in our statutes which says that it is unlawful to follow the business of loaning money at interest. Such business is not malum in se, nor is it malum prohibitum. Any one may conduct the business, but, under our statutes, if he does so, he must obtain the license, and if he carries on such business without paying the license tax and obtaining the license, he is guilty of a misdemeanor. The offense consists, not in doing the business, for that is not prohibited, but in failing to pay the license tax. The statute was passed, not to protect the public, not to protect the borrower, nor to prevent the loaning of money at interest, but for the purpose of raising the revenue to be derived from the license taxes to be collected from those persons who should engage in the business of loaning money at interest. * * * Take the case at bar. The respondent loaned $2,800 to the appellants. The respondent was doing the business of loaning money at interest, in violation of law, without the license. This was a fraud upon the public revenue, but was no injury to the appellants. For such failure the Legislature has said to respondent: 'You are guilty of a misdemeanor. The assessor and collector may direct suit against you, and recover the license tax imposed by statute, together with $20 damages.' The Legislature has not further said that: 'You shall not recover back any money which you may loan at interest before paying such license tax.' It is the duty of the court to construe all of our statutes which relate to the subject in question in pari materia, and ascertain what the intention of the Legislature was as to the validity of the contract in question. A careful consideration of the said statutes, of the subject-matter and object to be obtained, convinces us that it was not the intention of the Legislature that a violation of section 6983, supra, should be attended with any penalty other than those prescribed by the statutes. If the act of loaning money at interest was injurious to morals or good society or prohibited by law, we could not come to this conclusion. The Legislature may, within the limits of the Constitution, prescribe traffic regulations, and may impose upon a business a tax, and require persons intending to engage in such business to obtain, before doing so, a license; and we think the Legislature might go one step further and say that whoever should engage in any business upon which a license tax is imposed without first paying such license tax should not only be fined and imprisoned, one or both, but that such person should not recover upon any contract made by him while engaged in such business without a license. But the Legislature has not done so, nor has it shown any intention to attend such forfeiture upon a person violating the statute. Having specified the penalty for a violation of the statute, and further provided for the collection of the license tax with damages, we are authorized to and do conclude that the Legislature did not intend that any further punishment should be inflicted. This conclusion is strengthened by the well-known principle that forfeitures are not favored in law; nor does this court favor the idea of giving one's goods to another without compensation. We think that the respondent clearly has the right to recover back the money which it loaned to the appellants."

The other authorities cited declare the same doctrine.

The judgment appealed from is affirmed.

WILLMON v. KOYER. (L. A. 3338.)

1. LIMITATION OF ACTIONS (§ 49*)—RIGHT TO CONTRIBUTION.

Where plaintiff, at the time of paying taxes and assessments on land and attorney's fees in defending an action affecting it, was repudiating the existence of any cotenancy between him and defendant, and asserting an absolute right to, and assuming exclusive possession of, the property, and through a litigation of years excluded defendant from her rights, limitations ran from the time of making such payments against his right to contribution from defendant, since the statute operates between tenants in common as to causes of action existing between them and growing out of the relation to the same extent as upon causes of action between parties not within that relation, and begins to run, both as to the right of possession and the right to an accounting, when there is a repudiation of the relation.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Limitation of Actions, Cent. Dig. §§ 266–272; Dec. Dig. § 49.*]

2. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 30*) — RIGHT TO CONTRIBUTION—DENIAL OF COTENANCY.

That a tenant in common, at the time of paying taxes and assessments on the land and attorney's fees in defending an action affecting it, was asserting exclusive title in himself, did not defeat his right to contribution from another cotenant, since the payment of the taxes discharged the lien, and, though intended for the benefit of the tenant making the payment, inured to the benefit of the other tenants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96, 98, 99; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

3. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 30*)—RIGHT TO CONTRIBUTION — PAYMENT FOR BENEFIT OF COTENANT.

When one tenant in common has paid a debt or obligation for the benefit of the joint property, or has discharged a lien or assessment imposed upon it as a common burden, he is entitled to contribution from his cotenant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96, 98, 99; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

4. TENANCY IN COMMON (§ 30*)—RIGHT TO CONTRIBUTION—INTEREST.

A tenant in common, who at the time of making payments for taxes, etc., was asserting exclusive title in himself, was not entitled to interest upon the share of such payments recoverable from his cotenant, where no demand was made until an action, in which contribution was sought, was brought shortly after the determination of his cotenant's rights, since ordinarily a tenant making payments is only entitled to interest after a demand for contribution, and such tenant could neither consistently have made a demand nor accepted payment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Tenancy in Common, Cent. Dig. §§ 95, 96, 98, 99; Dec. Dig. § 30.*]

5. PARTITION (§ 87*)—ALLOWANCES FOR EXPENDITURES—LIENS.

In an action for the partition of land, an accounting, judgment in plaintiff's favor for one-half the amount paid by him for the common benefit of the joint property, and to fix a lien on defendant's portion of the property to secure the payment thereof, a judgment charging defendant's portion with a lien for the payment of the amount found due plaintiff was appropriate under the pleadings, and in fact is always appropriate in a partition suit.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Curtis D. Wilbur, Judge.

Action by J. C. Willmon against A. S. Koyer. From a decree in favor of plaintiff, and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Robert Young, of Los Angeles, for appellant. S. J. Parsons, T. O. Toland, L. W. Andrews, and C. E. Johnson, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Defendant appeals from a decree in partition of a lot owned by the parties as tenants in common, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

Plaintiff, in addition to asking for a partition of the property, prayed for an accounting between himself and defendant, and a judgment in his favor for one-half of certain moneys claimed to have been paid by him for the common benefit of the joint property, and that a lien be fixed on the portion of the property set apart to defendant to secure its payment. The court decreed a partition, finding that plaintiff had made the expenditures claimed to the extent of $1,045.60 and that defendant was liable for one-half thereof, $522.80, gave judgment in favor of plaintiff therefor, and established the lien as prayed for. The only question presented on the appeal from the order denying defendant a new trial is relative to the validity of this allowance, and on the appeal from the judgment the validity of the lien to secure its payment.

[1] The expenditures claimed to have been made by plaintiff consisted entirely of the payment of taxes, a street assessment, and attorney's fees in defending an action brought by a third party affecting the common property, all paid at different dates between December 19, 1902, and October 26, 1909. There were no rents or profits from the cotenancy property. There is no dispute as to the correctness of the amounts paid out by plaintiff nor the fact of their payment. The claim of defendant is that by reason of certain facts set up in his answer, and found in his favor by the court, no allowance in the nature of contribution by defendant for one-half of these expenditures should have been awarded at all, and, in any event, the right of plaintiff to the greater part of them, if it ever existed, was barred by the statute of limitations (subdivision 1, § 339, Code Civ. Proc.), which defendant had appropriately pleaded. These facts relied on by the defendant are, that after plaintiff and defendant, in May, 1902, had entered into an agreement between them to purchase the lot involved in the partition for their joint benefit, plaintiff violated the agreement, took title to the whole property in his own name, asserted ownership to the entire lot in himself, and repudiated all claim of the defendant to any interest therein; that in August, 1903, defendant brought an action to establish his title as joint owner with plaintiff in said property, which plaintiff resisted, claiming that he was the sole owner thereof and that defendant had no interest therein; that such litigation continued until January 10, 1910, when a judgment establishing the title of defendant to one-half of said lot as tenant in common with plaintiff was entered; and that in establishing his title to said property he was compelled to expend in counsel fees and costs a large sum of money. This action in partition and for an accounting was commenced by plaintiff March 30, 1910, a few months after the final judgment in favor of defendant just referred to was entered. Under these facts as found the position of defendant is that the court should have further found that all the items of expenditure made by the plaintiff up to two years prior to the bringing by him of this action in partition, as far as it involved an accounting between the parties, were barred by the statute of limitations which defendant pleaded, but on which the court found against him.

We are satisfied that this contention of appellant based on the statute of limitations is well taken. That statute operates between tenants in common as to causes of action existing between them and growing out of the cotenancy relation, to the same extent that it operates upon causes of action between parties not within that relation. While there is some difference in the authorities as to when it begins to run as to actions arising from the cotenancy, there is a uniform agreement in them that, when there is a repudiation of the relation of cotenancy, from that date the statute begins to run, both as to the right of possession and the right to an accounting. Here the plaintiff, from the time that it was claimed by defendant that such cotenancy existed, denied any such relation, took the conveyance of the property in his own name, asserted absolute right to and assumed exclusive possession of the cotenancy property, and through a litigation of years excluded the defendant from her rights as a cotenant with him and repudiated the existence of any such cotenancy. Under such circumstances the parties became adversaries, and as to any right or cause of action growing out of the cotenancy relationship, which might be asserted by either against the other, the statute of limitations immediately began to run. As an incident to cotenancy relationship, either cotenant has a right to demand of the other an accounting as to rents and profits of the cotenancy, which, of course, involves the right of one cotenant to have refunded to him by the other his proportion of any expenditures made for the benefit of the common property. The right to this accounting as to rents and profits inures to either cotenant as soon as the other has collected them, and the right to demand a proportionate share and maintain an action therefor on refusal to pay it then arises. So, also, as to the right of contribution. The right of the cotenant making the payment in excess of his proportion to recover payment from the other cotenant his share thereof arises at the date when any such expenditure is made.

Here the plaintiff had repudiated the existence of any cotenancy before any expenditures for which he claims contribution had been made, and was still repudiating it when all of them were made. This ouster of the defendant as a cotenant set the statute of limitations in motion for all purposes, not only as to the title and right of possession of the common property, but equally as to the right to demand an accounting for rents and profits, or contribution, as incidents to its existence. If the defendant, after notice of such repudiation, and more than two years after the receipt of rents and profits of the cotenancy property by plaintiff, if such had been received, or more than two years after defendant himself had made expenditures for the common benefit, had brought an action against plaintiff for an accounting or contribution, there can be no question but what plaintiff could have successfully pleaded the statute of limitations. It had been set in motion by him through his repudiation of any cotenancy between them, and effectually barred any right which might have accrued to defendant more than two years before an action brought by him. Now, as the defendant would be barred from asserting any rights against the plaintiff growing out of the cotenancy by the running of the statute as to all claims accruing more than two years before action brought by him, the benefit of the statute must be equally available to the defendant as to claims asserted against him by plaintiff accruing more than two years prior to the commencement of this action. The statute of limitations, having commenced to run by the repudiation of the existence of the cotenancy by plaintiff, affected the right of either party to the action equally. Under this view the trial court in this action should have found that the right of plaintiff to recover contribution from defendant for his proportion of items of expenditures stated in the account, and which were made more than two years prior to the bringing of this action, was barred by the statute of limitations invoked by defendant. As it is unquestioned that the amount of expenditures made by plaintiff during this period and allowed against defendant amounted to $371, the court should have disallowed them, and erred in not doing so.

[2, 3] The rest of the payments made by plaintiff and allowed by the court were made within two years of the bringing of this action by plaintiff and are not affected by the statute. As to these, however, defendant contends that plaintiff should not be allowed them, because they were made by him in his own behalf while repudiating any interest of defendant as a cotenant in the property and asserting exclusive title in himself. While undoubtedly this was the attitude of plaintiff towards defendant, we do not think that this affords sufficient cause for denying him contribution. The rule is that when one tenant in common has paid a debt or obligation for the benefit of the joint property, or has discharged a lien or assessment imposed upon it as a common burden, he is entitled as a matter of right to have his cotenant, who has received the benefit of it, refund to him his proportionate share of the amount paid. As a matter of fact this property was joint property when these taxes and other charges against it were paid by plaintiff. In proportion to their interests all tenants in common are in duty bound to pay taxes, which in this state are a lien upon real property and their nonpayment subjects the land to sale in satisfaction of them. Either of the cotenants may pay the taxes assessed against the whole estate, and such payment discharges the lien imposed upon the common interest, and no matter whether one tenant paying it intended the payment to be for his own benefit or not, such payment in fact and in law essentially inures to the benefit of the other cotenants. It discharges the lien against the common estate for the common benefit, independent of any intention of the cotenant paying it, and as all other cotenants are entitled to the benefit of such payment, it is only right that they should refund to the one making it their proportion of the amount he has paid. Starks v. Kirchgraber, 134 Mo. App. 211, 113 S. W. 1149. This rule equally applies to expenditures other than taxes made for the common benefit.

[4] The court allowed the plaintiff interest on all the expenditures from the date of payment of each by plaintiff. As we hold that part of these expenditures are barred by the statute of limitations, the question of interest only applies to those which we conclude were properly allowed. But as to those we are satisfied no interest should have been allowed. As a general rule in cotenancy accounting, a tenant making payments is only entitled to interest after a demand on his cotenant for contribution. Here, of course, if the defendant had offered payment, plaintiff would have refused it, because the acceptance would have been in derogation of his claim of nonexistence of the cotenancy. On the other hand, he could not consistently have made demand while repudiating the cotenancy, and in fact he made no demand until this action was brought. Under these circumstances plaintiff was not entitled to interest prior to the entry of judgment determining the liability of defendant for contribution.

[5] On the claim that the court should not have charged the portion of the property assigned to defendant on partition with the lien for the payment of the amount found to be due plaintiff from defendant: There is no merit in this claim. It was an appropriate judgment to enter under the pleadings. In fact, it is always appropriate to do so in partition as the only effectual way to secure a cotenant making advances and obtaining judgment therefor.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

In re SIMMONS' ESTATE. (S. F. 6629.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1914. Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1914.)

1. Wills (§ 400*)—Contest—Judgment of Dismissal — Interlocutory Orders — Review.

An order denying contestant's motion to be relieved of her default in failing to issue citation within a year after probate of the will and codicil sought to be attacked was necessarily involved in a subsequent order dismissing the contest, and was therefore reviewable on appeal from the order of dismissal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 869–873; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

2. Wills (§ 400*)—Contest—Review—Jurisdiction—Discretion.

Where the trial court dismissed a will contest because it believed it had no jurisdiction on any showing to relieve contestant from failure to have citation issued within a year after probate of the will and codicil, contestant's application for such relief must be regarded on appeal as having been denied solely because of lack of jurisdiction to relieve her default, and not as a matter of discretion.

3. Wills (§ 400*)—Contest—Review—Prejudice.

Where a will contest was dismissed on the sole ground that the trial court erroneously believed it had no jurisdiction to relieve contestant from a default in failing to issue citation within the time prescribed, it could not be affirmed on appeal because contestant's particular motion for relief could not properly have been granted, because there was no showing of excusable neglect or sufficient affidavit of merits.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 869–873; Dec. Dig. § 400.*]

4. Wills (§ 355*)—Contest—Default — Relief—Affidavit of Merits.

Where an affidavit of merits, in support of a motion to relieve contestant from her default in failing to issue citation in a will contest within the time prescribed, alleged that contestant had stated all the facts in connection with the contest to her attorney, and had been advised by him, and believed that she had a good and meritorious case, it was sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 811–819; Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

5. Wills (§ 355*)—"Contest."

The word "contest," as used in an affidavit of merits that the affiant had stated all the facts in connection with the said contest to her attorney, meant not merely the ground of attack presented by contestant, but the entire dispute involved in the attack on testator's will, and the defense thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 811–819; Dec. Dig. § 355.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Contest.]

6. Wills (§ 355*)—Contest—Citation—Issuance—Default—Relief.

Since Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1327, 1328, providing procedure for will contests, require that citation shall be issued within a year, but contain no prohibition against further prosecution of the proceeding, and do not require dismissal for failure to comply with such requirement, the court in which such contest is pending may relieve contestant of his default in failing to issue citation within the time prescribed, under section 473, authorizing such relief where a default is due to excusable neglect, etc.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. §§ 811–819; Dec. Dig. § 355.*]

7. Wills (§ 401*)—Contest—Appeal — Reversal — Subsequent Proceedings in Trial Court.

Where a will contest was dismissed solely on the erroneous ground that the trial court had no jurisdiction to relieve contestant of her default in failing to issue citation within a year, and the order was reversed on appeal, the court on remand was at liberty to pass on the motion for such relief as if presented for the first time.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Thos. F. Graham, Judge.

Judicial settlement of the estate of Phillip Simmons, deceased. Permelia L. West having filed a contest of the will and codicil, the same was dismissed because of failure to serve citation within a year after probate of the will and codicil, and her motion to be relieved of her default was denied, from which she appeals. Reversed.

H. P. Andrews, of Red Bluff, and Pemberton & Pemberton, of San Francisco, for appellant. Joseph C. Meyerstein and Asher, Meyerstein & McNutt, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. On the 5th day of February, 1912, two papers were admitted to probate as the last will of Phillip Simmons, deceased, and a codicil thereto. On the 3d day of October, 1912, Nellie L. Wertner, claiming to be an heir at law of the decedent, filed a contest and petition for revocation of probate. No application for the issuance of a citation was made, and no citation was ever issued.

On February 18, 1913, Permelia L. West, one of the residuary legatees named in the will, served upon the contestant a notice that she would move for a dismissal of the contest and petition for revocation on the ground that no citation had been issued within one year after the probate of the will and codicil. The contestant served notice of a counter motion for an order relieving her from her neglect and default in failing to have citation issued within one year, and directing citation to be issued. The ground of the motion was, as stated in the notice, the excusable neglect of the contestant and her attorney. The notice was accompanied by affidavits.

The motion to dismiss and the motion for relief and the issuance of a citation came on for hearing together, and the court made its written order, in which, after reciting the hearing and consideration of the motions, it "finds that the failure of said Nellie Wertner to have citation issued in due time arose from the entirely excusable neglect of her attorney as set out in his affidavit; that it was such neglect as would entitle said Nellie Wertner to relief from the consequences thereof, if this court had power and jurisdiction to grant such relief, but this court is of opinion, and therefore so decides and adjudges, that it has no jurisdiction or power to grant such relief." Following this statement is an order granting the motion of Permelia L. West, denying those of Nellie Wertner, and dismissing the contest. From the order or orders so made, the contestant appeals.

[1] It is suggested by respondent that the part of the order denying relief is not appealable. But we think the denial of relief was necessarily involved in the dismissal of the contest, and may therefore be reviewed on the appeal from the order dismissing. That the last-mentioned order is a proper subject of appeal is not questioned.

If the order which was made could be construed as an exercise of the court's discretion to refuse relief under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure, there would be little or nothing to discuss here. Such determination could be assailed on appeal only where the court had abused its discretion in denying the relief. But the court below did not decide that the applicant's default was not due to excusable neglect. It refused to give the relief asked, solely because it believed it had no power, on any showing, to relieve a contestant from the failure to have citation issued within the time limited by the Code.

[2] The order denying the contestant's motion for relief must therefore be regarded as "a dismissal of the motion for lack of jurisdiction." Cahill v. Superior Court, 145 Cal. 42, 78 Pac. 467. So regarding it, the appeal presents for decision the one question whether the court below was right in its view on this matter of jurisdiction. It is contended by the respondent that this question is immaterial in the case before us, and that the error committed, if error there was, could not have been prejudicial.

[3] The argument is that, whatever may be our view of the right, in a proper case, to be relieved from the default here involved, this particular motion could not properly have been granted, because (1) there was no showing to justify a finding of excusable neglect, and (2) there was no sufficient affidavit of merits. If these matters are to be considered on an appeal from an order refusing to entertain a motion for want of jurisdiction, we cannot agree with the contentions thus made. The showing of excusable neglect was not, to be sure, a strong one. If the court below had denied relief on the merits, we should hardly have felt justified in interfering with the order made. On the other hand, it cannot be said that the showing was so devoid of merit that an appellate court would have been bound to overturn a conclusion that a case of excusable neglect had been made out. It is only in extreme cases that the action of the trial court, in granting or denying relief, can be reversed on appeal. The case before us is not one of those in which an abuse of discretion would be manifested by the granting of the relief.

[4] Nor can we assent to the contention that there was a total want of the affidavit of merits which is requisite to the granting of relief for excusable neglect under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The affidavit of the contestant declared that she had "stated all the facts in connection with the said contest" to her attorney, and upon said statement had been advised by him, and believed that she had a good and meritorious case. This is sufficient. The averment is not that she had stated only one side of the case to her attorney, as did the affidavits under consideration in People v. Larue, 66 Cal. 235, 5 Pac. 157, and similar decisions.

[5] She deposed that she had stated all the facts in connection with the "contest." The word "contest," in this connection, is fairly to be understood as meaning, not merely the ground of attack presented by the contestant, but the entire dispute involved in such attack and the defense thereto.

The procedure for contesting a will after probate is defined, so far as the main question here involved is concerned, by sections 1327 and 1328 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Section 1327 authorizes a contest by any person interested, within one year after probate. "For that purpose," it is provided, the contestant "must file * * * a petition in writing, containing his allegations against the validity of the will or against the sufficiency of the proof, and praying that the probate may be revoked." Section 1328 provides that:

> "Upon filing the petition, and within one year after such probate, a citation must be issued to the executor * * * and to all the legatees and devisees mentioned in the will, and heirs residing in the state, * * * requiring them to appear before the court on some day therein specified, to show cause why the probate of the will should not be revoked."

[6] It seems entirely clear that, under this statutory scheme, jurisdiction of the subject-matter of the contest is vested in the court by the filing of the petition. Mr. Justice Temple, in his concurring opinion in S. F. Prot. O. A. v. Superior Court, 116 Cal. 443, 48 Pac. 379, expresses the view that the proceeding is one in rem, and that service of a citation might have been omitted from the statutory procedure because not essential to jurisdiction of the res. But, if it be thought that service of the citation has any bearing on the jurisdiction, its office can be only that of a summons in a civil action, viz., to give jurisdiction of the persons of those whose rights would be affected by revocation of the probate. A voluntary appearance would dispense with the necessity of service. Abila v. Padilla, 14 Cal. 106; Estate of Ricks, 160 Cal. 467, 117 Pac. 539. While the issuance of citation within the year is requisite to the maintenance of the contest, and a failure to have it thus issued would, in the absence of an appearance by adverse parties, justify the dismissal of the contest (Estate of Hite, 155 Cal. 390, 101 Pac. 8; Estate of Ricks, supra), the proceeding is none the less commenced by the filing of the petition, and the court's jurisdiction of the contest attaches upon such filing. Bacigalupo v. Sup. Ct., 108 Cal. 92, 40 Pac. 1055, relied on by respondent, merely holds that, where the petition for revocation had been dismissed, the court was without jurisdiction, after the expiration of a year from probate, to revive the lapsed petition and order a citation issued.

While section 1328 requires that the citation shall be issued within the year, there is no provision as there now is in the case of a summons (Code Civ. Proc. § 581a), prohibiting further prosecution of the proceeding, and requiring a dismissal for failure to comply with the requirement.

In view of these considerations, we think it must be held that the court has power, under section 473, to relieve a contestant, whose petition for revocation, duly filed, has not been dismissed, from the failure to have citation issued and served within the year. The proceeding (i. e., the contest) has been instituted, and jurisdiction over it has attached. The "default" sought to be excused is a failure to take, within time, one of the requisite steps in the prosecution of the proceeding thus pending. The analogies to be drawn from the decided cases point to the conclusion that, in such a case, the granting of relief is permissible under section 473. As we have heretofore had occasion to point out, this court has given a very liberal interpretation to the provisions of this section. "Thus, for example," it was said in Union C. Co. v. Oliver, 162 Cal. 755, 124 Pac. 435, "it has been held that the trial court may relieve a party from the consequences of his failure to serve in time a proposed bill of exceptions (Stonesifer v. Kilburn, 94 Cal. 33, [29 Pac. 332]; Pollitz v. Wickersham, 150 Cal. 238 [88 Pac. 911]), or statement on motion for a new trial (Vinson v. Los Angeles P. Ry. Co., 147 Cal. 479 [82 Pac. 53]), or from a failure to present to the judge for settlement, within the time allowed, a statement on motion for a new trial with the amendments thereto (Banta v. Siller, 121 Cal. 416 [53 Pac. 935])." The illustrations given are all of cases in which a step in a pending action or proceeding was required by the Code to be taken within a specified time, and the holding, in each instance, was that the objection to the belated taking of such step was a "proceeding taken against" the delaying party, and that relief might be given him under section 473. The case before us presents a similar situation. There is a clear distinction between it and Union C. Co. v. Oliver, supra, where it was held that a party could not be relieved from his failure to serve and file a timely notice of intention to move for a new trial. The motion for new trial is "in the nature of a new and independent proceeding collateral to the judgment in the action." Where a party desires to institute a new proceeding, such as a motion for a new trial, or an appeal transferring the cause to the jurisdiction of another court, or the commencement and prosecution of an action, his right depends upon his taking the initial step within the time limited by law. But where the proceeding itself is pending, and the delay relates to a step in the course of that proceeding, the court may, upon a proper showing, relieve from the effect of delay, unless the statute expressly provides that the delay shall terminate the right to proceed further.

It follows that the order must be reversed, and that the court below should proceed to pass upon the merits of the appellant's application for relief, and dispose of the other motions according to the decision upon such application. We do not reach this conclusion without some reluctance. The desirability of a prompt determination of questions affecting the settlement of estates is apparent. The opportunities afforded by the Code for contesting wills are ample and on liberal terms, and it would seem to be the better policy to hold parties desiring to attack wills after probate to a rigid compliance with the requirement of issuing citation within the time allowed. But this is a consideration which must be addressed to the Legislature, rather than the court. Under the existing statutes, as they have been applied by former decisions, we see no sufficient reason for holding that the court is without power to grant the relief here sought. We are not, of course, to be understood as intimating that the court below should, when it comes to exercise its discretion upon the showing here made, exercise that discretion in favor of the appellant. The so-called finding, in the order, that there had been excusable neglect was a mere preliminary to a refusal, for want of jurisdiction, to decide the question presented.

[7] The court below will be at liberty to pass upon the motion as if it were presented for the first time.

The order is reversed.

PACIFIC GAS & ELECTRIC CO. v. ROBERTS, State Treasurer, et al. (S. F. 6867.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1914.)

LICENSES (§ 19*)—GROSS EARNINGS TAX—MOTOR VEHICLE TAX.

Const. art. 13, § 14, imposes a gross earnings tax on gas and electric light companies, and declares that such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county, and municipal, on the property enumerated of such companies, except as otherwise provided in such section. Held, that such exemption should not be limited to ad valorem taxes imposed on the property of such corporations, but should be construed in accordance with its language, and exempted such corporations from liability for license fees imposed by Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1913, p. 641) §§ 4, 5, in so far as it attempted to impose such fee on vehicles used by such corporations exclusively in their business, as a condition to the requisite registration under the act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Licenses, Cent. Dig. §§ 48–54; Dec. Dig. § 19.*]

In Bank. Mandamus by the Pacific Gas & Electric Company against E. D. Roberts, as Treasurer, and W. F. McClure, as Engineer of the State of California. Writ granted.

Garret W. McEnerney, of San Francisco (Wm. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, of counsel), for petitioner. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Raymond Benjamin and John T. Nourse, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This is an original petition in mandate to compel the respondent E. D. Roberts, as treasurer of the state of California, to accept the applications for registration of certain motor vehicles, the property of the petitioner, and to signify in proper form to the department of engineering of the state of California that no fees are chargeable to the petitioner in the matter of its applications, and further to compel the respondent W. F. McClure, as state engineer of the state of California, to file these applications when so presented and alphabetically and numerically register the motor vehicles described in the applications, and do all other acts and things in this regard required of him by law and in particular by sections 4 and 5 of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1913, p. 641).

The petitioner is a public service corporation, organized under the laws of the state of California, and engaged in the business of transmitting and selling gas and electricity in the state of California. It owns a number of motor vehicles, automobiles, and motorcycles, which are used exclusively in the operation of its public service business in the state of California. The Motor Vehicle Act requires that motor vehicles shall be registered, and in registering shall pay a license fee or tax fixed under the terms of the act, and graduated in proportion to the horse power of such vehicles. Respondents contend that it is not their duty to register these vehicles, excepting upon payment by petitioner of the license fees contemplated by the Motor Vehicle Act. Petitioner contends that it is entitled to have its vehicles registered without the payment of any fee, by force of section 14, article 13, of the Constitution of this state, which section has relation to the taxation of public service corporations. In support of this position petitioner argues either that the Motor Vehicle Act must be construed as excluding from its contemplation in the matter of the payment of the license fee vehicles so owned and exclusively used, as operating property of such public corporations, or, if the conclusion is necessary that such vehicles are included within the purview of the Motor Vehicle Act, it then follows that, at least to this extent, the Motor Vehicle Act is void as being in conflict with and in contravention of section 14, article 13, of our Constitution.

The question is presented on demurrer to the petition, so that over the facts there is no controversy. The proposition is one strictly of law. Article 13, § 14, of the Constitution, declares as follows:

> "Taxes levied, assessed and collected as hereinafter provided upon * * * telegraph companies; telephone companies; companies engaged in the transmission or sale of gas or electricity * * *; and taxes upon all franchises of every kind and nature, shall be entirely and exclusively for state purposes, and shall be levied, assessed and collected in the manner hereinafter provided. The word 'companies' as used in this section shall include persons, partnerships, joint-stock associations, companies, and corporations.
> "(a) * * * All telegraph and telephone companies; and all companies engaged in the transmission or sale of gas or electricity shall annually pay to the state a tax upon their franchises, roadways, roadbeds, rails, rolling stock, poles, wires, pipes, canals, conduits, rights of way, and other property, or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business in this state, computed as follows: Said tax shall be equal to the percentages hereinafter fixed upon the gross receipts from operation of such companies and each thereof within this state. * * *
> "The percentages above mentioned shall be as follows: * * * On all telegraph and telephone companies, three and one-half per cent.; on all companies engaged in the transmission or sale of gas or electricity, four per cent. Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property above enumerated of such companies except as otherwise in this section provided; provided, that nothing herein shall be construed to release any such company from the payment of any amount agreed, to be paid or required by law to be paid for any special privilege or franchise granted by any of the municipal authorities of this state."

The vital point in controversy centers upon the construction of the sentence:

> "Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county, and municipal, upon the property above enumerated."

But before entering into a discussion of the meaning of this language, which meaning must, of course, be determined from its reading in connection with the whole constitutional provision of which it is a part, a few words may be said as to the history of the change in our fiscal system touching the taxation of public utilities. Under the system formerly in vogue an attempt was made to place an ad valorem tax upon the properties of these utilities, including therein their franchises. In addition to this privilege taxes of various kinds and amounts were imposed by the different authorities. As a necessary result many of these utilities, such as the petitioner herein, owning property in many counties of the state and supplying its utility to many municipalities, were subjected, first, to assessments by county assessors; second, to assessments by municipal assessors; and, third, to privilege taxes by such municipalities as saw fit to impose them. The method was crude and cumbersome, and it came to be believed that it was unequal and unjust. It was recognized that a small amount in value of real and personal property could, by use in business, bring in returns by way of revenue greatly in excess of the separate values of the properties employed. This earning capacity it was felt had a value which should be taxed, and no better method of taxing it was apparent than that which levied a percentage upon the gross revenue returns. This we find set forth in the Report of the Commission on Revenue and Taxation of the State of California (1906) pp. 193 and 194, in the following language:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

> "The inadequacy of the property taxed when applied to express companies has been strikingly pointed out by the Supreme Court of the United States. In the so-called Ohio Express Company Cases (see Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194, 17 Sup. Ct. 305, 41 L. Ed. 683) the court said that it was 'unity of use' which enabled $23,400 worth of horses, wagons, safes, and so on, in the state to produce $275,446 in a single year."

The next difficulties which presented themselves were those which had to do with the legal requirements that taxes should be equal and uniform and should be levied upon "property." The Supreme Court of the United States hesitated to declare that a percentage tax upon the gross earnings of a corporation was in any true sense identical with an ad valorem tax upon the properties of the corporation. Thus in Galveston, H. & S. A. Ry. Co. v. Texas, 210 U. S. 227, 28 Sup. Ct. 640 [52 L. Ed. 1031] we find the court saying:

> "By whatever name the exaction may be called, if it amounts to no more than the ordinary tax upon property or a just equivalent therefor, ascertained by reference thereto, it is not open to attack as inconsistent with the Constitution."

The Supreme Court of Minnesota construed the tax to be a property tax, measured by the gross earnings within the state, which, under their construction of the tax, included the earnings here in question. That court held that the statute was a part of a system long in force in Minnesota, passed under the authority of the state Constitution, and was intended to afford a means of valuing the property of express companies within the state. While the determination that the tax is a property tax measured by gross receipts is not binding upon this court, we are not prepared to say that this conclusion is not well founded, in view of the provisions and purposes of the law. In this connection the language of Mr. Justice Peckham in McHenry v. Alford, 168 U. S. 651, 671 [18 Sup. Ct. 242, 42 L. Ed. 614], while it was not necessary to the decision of the case is nevertheless apposite:

> "When it is said, as it is in this act, that the tax collected by this method shall be in lieu of all other taxes whatever, it would seem that it might be claimed with great plausibility that a tax levied under such circumstances and by such methods was not in reality a tax upon the gross earnings, but was a tax upon the lands and other property of the company, and that the method adopted of arriving at the sum which the company should pay as taxes upon its property was by taking a percentage of its gross earnings."

Without pausing here to review the decisions of the Supreme Court bearing upon the question, but contenting ourselves with a subsequent reference to some of them, it may be said that the conclusions of the Supreme Court were that property used in the public service frequently acquired a value in the use, which value was something greater than the value of the property not engaged in such use; that by the systemization and unification of such properties in use they in the aggregate acquired a special value by virtue of this unity of use; that this special value was in the nature of property; that a fair tax upon gross earnings bore such a relation to the values of these properties under their unity of use as to justify such a tax upon revenue as being a legal and commutated or substituted tax for other taxes which were or might have been levied. Maine v. Grand Trunk Ry., 142 U. S. 217, 12 Sup. Ct. 121, 163, 35 L. Ed. 994; Cleveland & St. Louis Ry. Co. v. Backus, 154 U. S. 439, 14 Sup. Ct. 1122, 38 L. Ed. 1041; Erie Ry. v. Pennsylvania, 158 U. S. 440, 15 Sup. Ct. 900, 39 L. Ed. 1046; Adams Express Co. v. Ohio, 165 U. S. 194, 17 Sup. Ct. 305, 41 L. Ed. 683; U. S. Express Co. v. Minnesota, 223 U. S. 335, 32 Sup. Ct. 211, 56 L. Ed. 459.

So much for the justness and reasonableness and legality of the new method. Further, it was believed that the income of the state could be largely drawn from these sources with great advantage both to the state and to the public service utilities, in that the method would be simple, direct, and inexpensive as compared with the existing method, necessitating the action of many assessors and numerous appeals to boards of equalization, and also that the new method would remove all temptation to such utilities to engage in political activity. Having subjected public utilities to this revised form of taxation, it was for the people under their Constitution to say whether these new taxes should be all of the taxes and charges imposed upon such corporations, and, if not all, then for what purposes could they or their properties be further taxed? For manifestly it was competent for the Constitution to declare that this commutated tax should be in lieu of all taxes, should be in lieu only of ad valorem taxes, or that it should not forbid the right to levy privilege taxes. What the Constitution did say in this regard is found in the sentence expressly quoted and adverted to, and it is to the construction of this sentence we are thus brought.

The interpretation put on it by petitioner has been outlined. It contends that the license fee sought to be exacted from it is a charge expressly prohibited in the very language of the Constitution; that this license fee is a privilege tax sought to be imposed upon the personal property of the corporation, which personal property is exclusively used in its business and necessary to the unified use of its operative property; or, in other words, that the demand of respondents is that petitioner shall pay this excise tax or privilege tax as a condition of its right to devote its operative properties to the remunerative use in the conduct of its business, for which remunerative use it pays a tax upon its gross revenues, which the Constitution itself declares shall be exclusive of all other taxes or license fees upon its property.

Respondents answer that the Constitution means that the commutated tax upon gross revenue is a substitution only for previous existing ad valorem taxes upon physical properties and franchises; that the Constitution does not include in its inhibition the right to levy a privilege or excise tax; but that, if it does include this inhibition, then this is not a privilege tax, but is in the nature of a rental charge or a toll exaction; or, finally, if no one of these positions is sustainable, it is a measure attributable to the legitimate exercise of the state's police power.

Certain of these arguments of respondents are disposed of by the case of In re Schuler, 139 Pac. 685, where the constitutionality of this Motor Vehicle Act came under review. It is there pointed out that an enormous revenue will be and is obtained under the act, and that this revenue, over and above the small expense of collecting it, is to be devoted to the maintenance, repair, and construction of highways. It is declared that the act is not referable to the police power, this court saying:

> "The repair of public roads is not a police measure, yet it is evident that the bill was passed for the principal purpose of raising revenue for use in the upkeep of such highways."

The true character of the license fees and charges is summed up in the following sentence:

> "The contention is made (and correctly made) that it imposes an excise tax or privilege for the purpose of providing a fund for roads under the dominion of the state authorities."

This explicit declaration as to the purpose and character of the Motor Vehicle Act is sufficient itself to negative the contention of respondents that the act may be construed as imposing a rental charge or toll charge for the use of the highways. But as those propositions were not specifically considered in the Schuler Case, and are here insistently urged, they demand brief consideration.

The contention that the Motor Vehicle Act should be construed as imposing a rental charge for the use of highways owned or controlled by the state is based solely upon the decision of the Supreme Court in St. Louis v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 148 U. S. 93, 13 Sup. Ct. 485, 37 L. Ed. 380, and considered at length by this court in Western Union Telegraph Co. v. Hopkins, 160 Cal. 106, 116 Pac. 557. In the federal case the telegraph company had made a permanent and exclusive appropriation of a part of the public streets of St. Louis by telegraph poles. The holding of the Supreme Court was that this permanent occupation of a portion of the public highway to the absolute exclusion of the public from the enjoyment of that part of the highway was something entirely different from the common right to the use of the highways for purposes of transitory locomotion, and that the charge which St. Louis exacted of five dollars per pole for poles so occupying portions of the highway was—

> "more in the nature of a charge for the use of property belonging to the city—that which may properly be called rental. * * * The city has attempted to make the telegraph company pay for an appropriation to its own and sole use a part of the streets and public places of the city. It is seeking to collect rent."

It is not easy to adjust the law of that case to the facts of this case, where the use which petitioner's vehicles propose to make of the highways is identically that which of common right all persons and vehicles may make. If it is a rental charge at all, then a like rental charge may be imposed upon every pedestrian, as well as upon every vehicle traveling upon our highways. The common use of the highways is open to all. For the permanent and exclusive use of a portion of the highway a charge may be made. Such is the whole of the law upon this proposition.

As little force can be given to the next contention, that the Motor Vehicle Act should be regarded as an act imposing a toll for the use of the highways. Support for this proposition is sought to be derived from the two cases of Huse v. Glover, 119 U. S. 543, 7 Sup. Ct. 313, 30 L. Ed. 487, and Sands v. Manistee River Imp. Co., 123 U. S. 288, 8 Sup. Ct. 113, 31 L. Ed. 149. Mr. Justice Field wrote the decision in both cases. They grew out of a similar state of facts. Certain of the states had by expensive works improved the navigation of their rivers. For the use of these improvements tolls were charged. Here was a portion of a natural highway artificially improved at a large expense. But the federal Constitution guaranteed the free right of navigation. It was held by the Supreme Court of the United States that a toll for the use of a portion of such a particular highway artifically created or improved was not a violation of the federal Constitution. But the effort here made is not to charge a toll for the use of a toll road. It is exacting a fee from every automobile, the amount of which is based upon the horse power of the automobile for its entry upon or use of any highway in the state, improved or unimproved, within a municipality or without. A similar effort was made by the city of Chicago, which improved by dredging and otherwise the Chicago river, and then imposed a license fee upon certain crafts using the Chicago river. An effort was made to justify this charge as being a toll under the authority of Huse v. Glover and Sands v. Manistee River Co. Justice Field again wrote the opinion of the Supreme Court (Harmon v. City of Chicago, 147 U. S. 396, 13 Sup. Ct. 306, 37 L. Ed. 216), and, scouting the argument that the license fee should be "treated as in the nature of a toll or compensation for the expenses of deepening the river," declared:

> "But the plain answer to this position is that the license fee is not exacted upon any such ground, nor is any suggestion made that any special benefit has arisen or can arise to the tugs in question by the alleged deepening of the river. The license is not exacted as a toll or compensation for any specific improvement of the river, of which the steam barges or tugs have the benefit, but is exacted for the keeping, use, or letting to hire of any steam tug, or barge or tow boat, for towing vessels or craft into the Chicago river, its branches, or slips connected therewith."

So here the charge is a fee exacted of motor vehicles for the right to use any public highway. It is not a toll. It is a revenue measure pure and simple.

It being thus clear both upon principle and upon the adjudication of the Schuler Case that this license charge is a privilege tax, established for purposes of revenue and forbidding petitioner's automobiles to use the public highways until payment thereof, we come to the principal contention of respondents: That, conceding it to be such a tax, still it is not a tax the levying of which is forbidden by the Constitution, and therefore it may justly be laid. Respondents' argument is the following: The new method of taxation was adopted solely as a substitute for the ad valorem taxes theretofore levied upon franchises and physical properties; it was not designed by the framers of this constitutional amendment to forbid the levying of any other kind of a tax, either upon the corporations or upon their physical properties; and as the taxing power is of so vital importance that it is of the essence of the existence of a government, no intendment should be indulged in any case that the state has relinquished any part of this all important power. The principle of construction here declared is unimpeachable. In cases of doubt upon such questions the doubt will always be resolved in favor of the sovereignty. Providence Bank v. Billings, 4 Pet. 514, 7 L. Ed. 939. But it is to be noted here that the principle is wholly inapplicable, in that the state, so far from surrendering its taxing powers, has simply declared a method by which it will tax such corporations, coupled with the declaration that though the percentage upon incomes is fixed, the percentage may be increased by the Legislature from time to time, as in fact the Legislature has done.

So far as goes the argument that the people meant in this constitutional provision only to declare that the franchises and physical properties should no longer be subject to an ad valorem tax, the determination of this will depend solely and exclusively upon the meaning of the language which the people have employed. Some light has already been shed upon this meaning by two decisions of this court, that of City & County of San Francisco v. Pac. T. & T. Co., 166 Cal. 244, 135 Pac. 971, and Hartford Fire Ins. Co. v. Roberts et al., 142 Pac. 839. In the first of these cases the city of San Francisco imposed that form of a privilege tax known as an occupation tax upon the right of the defendant, a public service corporation, to conduct its business, requiring it to pay a license fee based upon its gross receipts. It was held that under the inhibition of the constitutional provision which we are here considering such a privilege tax was void. In the second case the state itself, under its State Corporation License Tax Act, demanded of a foreign corporation doing business in this state the license fee as a condition of its right to continue in its business. Insurance companies paying the proper proportion of their gross revenues are included in the constitutional provision under consideration. It was held that this constitutional provision forbade the exaction of this privilege occupation tax upon the right of the insurance company to conduct its business. Here are two declarations that privilege taxes, in their nature occupation taxes, may not be imposed, because the Constitution has said that the tax imposed by the state "shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal upon the property above enumerated of such companies."

The essential difference between an ad valorem tax and any form of privilege tax is that the ad valorem tax is based upon the value of the property, tangible or intangible. The privilege tax need not be based upon such value at all. Privilege taxes themselves fall into two general classes: The first, a tax upon that intangible thing known as the right to conduct business; and the second, a tax upon specific personal property as a condition of the right to use it generally or for some specific purpose. Instances of the two forms of privilege tax will readily occur. Thus such a tax may be imposed upon the right to conduct the business of a taxicab company, and again a tax may be imposed upon each taxicab, to be paid before that particular piece of personal property may be employed in the business. Of course, as in the case of every tax, and upon whatsoever form or kind of property it may be laid, in its essence, it is a tax upon the owner of the property.

With these distinctions in view, it is easy to be seen that the decisions above adverted to clearly declare that the privilege occupation tax is forbidden by the Constitution. And yet certainly there is not so clear an inhibition against this tax as there is against the privilege tax upon the property exclusively used in the operation of the business. For in precise terms it is declared that the state tax shall be in lieu of all "other taxes and licenses * * * upon the property * * * of such companies." Respondents argue that this court in the Telephone Case, supra, has placed a limitation and definition upon this constitutional provision which support their contention that at the utmost only that form of privilege tax known as occupation tax is prohibited, and that therefore this particular form of privilege tax, not laid directly upon the business but only upon certain operative properties of the business, is valid. The language relied on is the following:

> "Every word in the clause under discussion can be given a reasonable and legitimate effect by reading the term 'licenses' as including revenue charges of any character upon the exercise of the franchises which are declared to be taxable for state purposes only. In this way the phrase 'upon the property above enumerated' is made fully effective, as qualifying both 'taxes' and 'licenses' preceding it, while no word is either ignored or distorted from its fair meaning."

But respondents entirely mistake its meaning and import. The argument which this court was there called upon to meet was the direct opposite of the one here presented. The city and county of San Francisco was there advancing a contention utterly destructive of respondents' position here. It was contending that the language of the Constitution in terms forbade the imposition of a tax upon the operative properties such as this, but did not in terms deny, and therefore should not by inference be held to deny, the right of the municipality to impose an occupation tax. A few extracts from the brief of the appellant city and county of San Francisco will establish this beyond question. We quote:

> "A tax, such as the tax provided for by this ordinance, is not a property tax at all. It is not a tax imposed upon any of the property of the person taxed. It is an occupation or business tax. The intention of the Legislature was clearly to prevent the levy of taxes of any sort (whether levied openly as property taxes or disguised as licenses) upon certain specified property of certain corporations. In an endeavor to carry out the legislative intent, and in order to cover all taxes upon said property, the word 'licenses' was used. In conclusion of this part of our argument we submit that the Legislature did not use the words 'upon the property' without intent. The intent clearly was to relieve the property assessed from all taxes other than state taxes levied upon it under the constitutional amendment."

It was in answer to this argument that this court used the language relied on by respondents. It is too plain for discussion, therefore, that this court did not hold that taxes could be levied upon operative property but that it did hold that the language of the Constitution forbidding taxes upon operative property "included revenue charges of any character upon the exercise of the franchise." Wherefore it must be concluded that this decision, if not directly against the respondents' contention here made, at least lends no aid or support to that contention.

But it is only in deference to the arguments of the fiscal and legal officers of the state that so much has been said upon a proposition which, to the mind of the layman as well as of the lawyer, is not debatable, under the plain and unambiguous language of the Constitution itself. We repeat:

> "Such taxes shall be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses, state, county and municipal, upon the property above enumerated."

Where is there room for the play of construction upon language so plain as this, addressed to the facts of this case? With the argument of respondents, that the framers of this article were intelligent men and must be presumed to know what they meant to say, we are in perfect accord. What they said is so plain, so clear, so free from ambiguity and the possibility of construction, as to forbid debate. They declared that the state tax should be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses. If they meant that it should be in lieu of but some of those taxes, they would have said so. If they meant that it should be in lieu only of ad valorem taxes, they could easily and would undoubtedly have said so. What they did say was that this state tax, with the state's ability to increase it at will, should be in lieu of all other taxes and licenses. If argument is required upon the meaning of plain words so clearly expressing an obvious idea, it can only be because of an utter breakdown in our written language in its ability to convey thought. Additionally, it may be said that the purpose of the Constitution to exclude all other taxes and licenses is emphasized and accentuated by the one exception which that instrument itself declares when it provides that this inhibition against the levying of any or all taxes and licenses shall not be construed to release these companies from pre-existing agreements to pay specified sums of money.

And as a last word upon the subject it may be pointed out that, if confirmation can be required upon so plain a proposition, it is found in Railroad v. Harris, 99 Tenn. 684, 43 S. W. 115, 53 L. R. A. 921. It was there held that railroad companies, by virtue of the language providing for a commutated tax were not relieved from privilege taxes, the court in addressing itself to the particular language of the law, saying:

> "Exemption from ad valorem taxation no more includes exemption from privilege taxation than the imposition of an ad valorem tax includes the imposition of a privilege tax. If one imposition does not embrace both, one exemption does not embrace both."

The court then proceeds:

> "It is not to be implied from what has been said that no exemption from privilege taxation could have been granted without naming the subject of such taxation and exempting it in so many words. That result could have been accomplished by a statement that the company was to have exemption from all taxation, or by any other form of expression that would, beyond doubt, disclose such an intention."

In our Constitution we have this exemption most completely, comprehensively, and explicitly expressed.

Let the mandate issue as prayed for.

JOSSELYN v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 6074.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1914. Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1914.)

1. Municipal Corporations (§ 956*)—Taxes—Limitation of Amount.

Whether there is any necessity for levying a special and additional tax under San Francisco Charter, art. 3, c. 1, § 13, in excess of the limit of $1 on each $100 assessed valuation prescribed by section 11 is a question of fact, as to which the determination of the board of supervisors is not final.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2010–2013; Dec. Dig. § 956.*]

2. Appeal and Error (§ 907*)—Record—Matters Presented for Review.

In the absence of a bill of exceptions, it will be assumed that a finding of the superior court that there was no emergency justifying the suspension of the provisions of San Francisco Charter, art. 3, c. 1, § 11, limiting the tax levy to $1 on each $100, was supported by evidence.

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 968*)—Taxes—Levying—Conditions Precedent.

San Francisco Charter, art. 12, § 1, provides that the board of supervisors, after determining that public interest or necessity demands the acquisition of a public utility, must procure from the board of works plans and estimates of the cost thereof. Section 5 prescribes the procedure to be followed, which includes the passage of an ordinance declaring the board's finding as to the public interest or necessity, a direction to the board of public works to procure and file plans and estimates, the publication of the ordinance, negotiations and contracts for the work if the cost can be paid out of the city's annual revenues, and, if a bonded indebtedness is necessary, the calling of a special election. Held, that where in 1903 at such a special election the proposal to issue bonds for a municipal street railway was defeated, the board of supervisors could not, in 1907, levy a tax for the construction of such railway without again following the procedure prescribed in the charter.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2070–2074; Dec. Dig. § 968.*]

4. Municipal Corporations (§ 968*)—Taxes—Limitation of Amount.

The board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco included in the annual budget appropriations of $720,000, for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of streets, and $100,000 for an increase in salaries of schoolteachers, to be paid out of a special tax levy in excess of the levy of $1 on each $100, the limit prescribed by the charter except in case of emergency or great necessity, and also passed an ordinance declaring that the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of the streets and the proposition to increase such salaries constituted and was a great necessity and emergency. It was found by the superior court, however, that no such necessity and emergency existed. The budget also included an item of $720,000 for the construction of a municipal street railway to be paid from the general levy. This appropriation was void because the board had not followed the procedure prescribed by the charter for the acquisition, construction, or completion of a public utility. Held, that though the elimination of this item reduced the general tax levy below the charter limit, the item of an equal amount for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of streets could not be substituted therefor and raised as a part of the general levy, the board having shown an intention that the money therefor should be raised by a special tax, and there being no reason for substituting this item in the general levy rather than the item for the increase in salaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 2070–2074; Dec. Dig. § 968.*]

5. Municipal Corporations (§ 956*)—Taxes—Limitation of Amount.

Article 3, c. 1, § 11, of the charter of the city and county of San Francisco, providing that the tax levy, exclusive of the state tax, the tax to pay the interest and maintain the sinking funds of the bonded indebtedness of the city and county, and of the tax to pay for the maintenance and improvements of parks, etc., shall not exceed $1 on each $100, does not justify the levying of taxes for purely county purposes, as distinguished from city purposes, in excess of the limitation prescribed.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; J. M. Seawell, Judge.

Action by Charles Josselyn against the City and County of San Francisco. From a judgment in part for plaintiff, both parties appeal. Reversed, with instructions.

Percy V. Long, City Atty., and Jesse Steinhart, both of San Francisco, for appellant. Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover certain taxes paid by him under protest in the city and county of San Francisco. The case comes here on complaint, answer, findings of fact, and judgment. Three separate items of taxation were involved. The court found in plaintiff's favor on two of these, and against him on the third. Each party to the litigation appeals, plaintiff from that portion of the judgment which is adverse to him, and defendant from the whole of it. The facts as determined from the findings are, in brief, as follows:

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Between the first Monday in May and the first Monday in June, 1907, the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco met to prepare a budget for the fiscal year 1907–08. One of the items of this budget was an additional and special tax levy of 20 cents on each $100 assessed valuation to raise $720,000 for the construction of a municipal railroad on Geary street. On June 3, 1907, the budget came up for final passage, but in the meantime it had been amended so that the tax for the construction of the Geary street road was not named as a "special and additional" tax, but as a part of the general levy and an item for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of streets was added. This was "to be paid for out of an additional and special tax levy of 20 cents on each $100 assessed valuation," the amount being $720,000. Prior to May 27, 1907, before the budget passed to print, a time was fixed by the supervisors for hearing taxpayers and citizens in regard to it, and the board attended at the time so set. After the adoption of the amendments no time was fixed for the hearing of taxpayers with reference to the budget or the amendments, but on June 10, 1907, at a meeting of the board, the privilege of the floor was granted and accepted by certain citizens and taxpayers who discussed the budget. At that date the three items involved in this case were set forth in the budget as follows:

"Geary Street Railroad—For the construction of a municipal street railway from Market street, along Geary street to Point Lobos avenue, along Point Lobos avenue to Tenth avenue; thence along Tenth avenue to Fulton street	$720,000."
"For the repair, sprinkling and sweeping of streets, to be performed by the board of works, under the direction of the board of supervisors, to be paid for out of an additional and special emergency tax levy of 20 cents on each $100 assessed valuation	$720,000."
"For increase in salaries of teachers in primary and grammar schools, to be paid out of the additional and special tax levy of 20 cents on each $100 assessed valuation	$100,000."

Exclusive of the last two items and of the amounts not contemplated in that part of the charter which imposes the restriction commonly designated the "dollar limit," the budget required a levy of $1 on each $100 of assessed valuation for city and county purposes.

On June 21, 1907, Eugene E. Schmitz, who on June 10th had received, as mayor of the city and county, the budget as passed, returned it with his veto on the items for the Geary street road and the sprinkling, repair, etc., of the streets. On June 17th the board of supervisors, acting under the proper charter provision, and declaring that because of his incarceration the mayor was unable to perform his official duties, chose one James L. Gallagher as president pro tempore. On June 24th the board, by a vote of 17 supervisors, being all of those present (Supervisor Rea being absent) formally overruled the veto. On July 1, 1907, the supervisors again adopted the budget over this veto, 17 members of the board voting in the affirmative and Supervisor Furey being absent. On July 2, 1907, the budget was signed by the acting mayor and the clerk of the board of supervisors.

On June 24, 1907, the board had passed an ordinance, No. 233 (N. S.), superseding the "dollar limit" provided in section 11, c. 1, art. 3, of the charter. The first section of the said ordinance was in part as follows:

> "It is hereby recited, determined and declared that the repair, sprinkling and sweeping of streets, to be performed by the board of public works under the direction of the board of supervisors, and the proposition to increase the salaries of teachers in the primary and grammar schools of the city and county, as specified in the budget of the fiscal year 1907–08, constitutes and is a great necessity and emergency of the kind and character contemplated by the provisions of section 13, c. 1, art. 3, of the charter."

In the second section of the ordinance the board determined and declared that the cost of the aforesaid propositions could not be paid out of the city's ordinary annual income. The superior court found in accordance with admitted facts that the Geary street road was a public utility; that in 1903 the supervisors voted that such an utility was a matter of public necessity, and, following the charter provisions (chapter 12, § 4), they determined that the cost of the utility so far exceeded the annual revenues of the city and county in addition to the other necessary expenses thereof as to render it necessary to incur a municipal bonded indebtedness therefor; that a special election was held and the proposal to issue bonds was defeated; and that no further steps toward the construction of the Geary street road were taken up to the time of the passage of the budget and the levy of the tax which we are here considering.

The court below determined that the suspension of the "dollar limit" was improper because neither in substance nor by proper allegation were the items described as necessities and emergencies really such. It was also adjudged that the appropriation for the Geary street road was without authorization of law. But as the amounts sought to be improperly collected for the Geary street road and the increase of teachers' salaries, when eliminated from the tax levy would have brought the tax to the "dollar limit," the plaintiff was allowed no relief from the tax for repairing, sweeping, and sprinkling streets. The exact language of the trial court's conclusion on this point is as follows:

> "That the said levy of taxes so made by said board of supervisors for said fiscal year for the purpose of repairing, sprinkling, and sweeping streets, as hereinbefore found, purports on its face to have been made in excess of the said limitation prescribed by section 11 of chapter 1 of article 3 of the said charter, and in and by the terms of said levy purports to be a levy authorized by the aforesaid invalid ordinance No. 233 (New Series), but that by reason of the invalidity of the said appropriation and levy for the construction of the said Geary Street Railroad, the said tax for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of streets does not exceed the said last-mentioned limitation, and that therefore the plaintiff is not entitled to recover any of the said taxes levied for said fiscal year upon his said properties for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of streets."

Plaintiff's first attack is directed at the entire levy, his contentions being that the taxes were all illegal because: (1) At the time they were levied no appropriations or budget had been made; (2) neither the budget nor the levy was made within the time prescribed by the charter; (3) the appropriation for the so-called emergency matters preceded the declaration that a necessity for them existed. We need not consider these interesting questions, however, as we agree with plaintiff's contention that the court erred in refusing to decree the refunding of that proportion of the tax levied illegally for payment of the expenses of repairing, sprinkling, and sweeping streets, while we are in accord with the conclusion that the purported levies for the construction of the Geary street road and the increase in the salaries of teachers were void.

[1, 2] In the very recent case of San Christina Investment Co. v. City & County of San Francisco, 141 Pac. 384, we held that the question of the necessity for the suspension of the "dollar limit" is one of fact, and that the determination by the supervisors of the existence of such necessity is not final. Here the court found that no such great emergency as that contemplated by the charter justified the suspension of the "dollar limit." We must assume that such finding is amply supported by evidence, as there is no bill of exceptions. It follows that under the authority of the case cited above, we must sustain the conclusion of law that ordinance No. 233 (N. S.), declaring the existence of such great emergency was void.

[3] Before discussing further the court's conclusion that the elimination of the item for the Geary street road made it possible for the city to collect that tax for the sweeping, sprinkling, and care of the streets levied avowedly as an emergency tax, we will briefly examine the reasons which must have governed the court in holding the former levy void. The powers of the board of supervisors relating to public utilities are conferred by and subject to the provisions of article 12 of the charter. By section 1 of that article the board, after determining that public interest or necessity demands the acquisition of a public utility, "must procure from the board of works" plans and estimates of the cost, etc., of such public utility. By section 5 the procedure of the board is prescribed. This includes the passage of an ordinance specifically declaring the board's finding that public interest or necessity demands the acquisition, construction, or completion of the utility; a direction in the same ordinance to the board of public works to procure and file plans and estimates of the cost; the publication of this ordinance for at least two weeks; negotiations and contracts for the work if the cost can be paid out of the city's annual revenues; and if the cost so far exceeds the annual revenues of the city in addition to the other proper expenses thereof as to render necessary a bonded indebtedness, then the calling of a special election. None of these things had been done. We cannot say that the proceedings taken in 1903 could be utilized by a board acting in 1907, because the determination by the board at the earlier date that public necessity demanded the acquisition and construction of the Geary street road had been reversed by the people themselves. Those proceedings terminated with the election, and the whole matter thereupon became functus officio. In order that money might thereafter be raised either by taxation or bond issue it was necessary that the supervisors should proceed anew under the provisions of article 12 of the charter. These provisions are mandatory, and the failure to comply with them made void the attempted levy of the tax for the Geary street road.

[4] Reverting to the conclusion of law that the striking from the levy of the item of $720,000 for the public utility restored the item for construction, repair, and upkeep of the streets, we are confronted with the fact that the same ordinance deals with the levies for the streets and for the increase of teachers' salaries. In the ordinance they are coordinately mentioned and collectively referred to as "a great necessity and emergency." While it may be very convenient bookkeeping to substitute for the sum specified in the Geary street railroad item the exactly similar amount involved in the item for expenditures on the streets, we can see no logic in preferring one part of the void ordinance to the other. When the items of $720,000 for the repair, sprinkling, and sweeping of the streets and of $100,000 for the increase in salaries of teachers were inserted in the budget and were by the very terms thereof made payable out of the proceeds of a tax to be levied in excess of the limitation prescribed by section 11, chapter 1, article 3, of the charter, the supervisors showed their intention that the money should be raised by a special tax. The ordinance by which this result was sought to be attained was invalid, and we may not validate one of its parts merely because by so doing we would authorize the taxation of property to the full extent permitted by the charter. Proceedings for taxation are in invitum, and where, as here, the only levy sought to be made for these two specified purposes was the "additional tax levy authorized by ordinance No. 233," the court may not properly add the amount of the special levy to the general levy. Ordinance No. 233 being void, the levy founded thereon falls with it. The levy being void there was no valid tax.

[5] Counsel for defendant say that the levying of a large part of the taxes here involved was for purely county purposes as distinguished from city purposes, and that the limitation prescribed by section 11 of chapter 1 of article 3 of the charter does not apply to taxes imposed for county purposes. The very language of the limitation contradicts this theory. It is as follows:

> "But such levy, exclusive of the state tax and the tax to pay the interest and maintain the sinking funds of the bonded indebtedness of the city and county, and exclusive of the tax to pay for the maintenance and improvement of the parks, squares and public grounds of the city and county, shall not exceed the rate of one dollar on each one hundred dollars' valuation."

Taxes for county purposes are not excepted by the language quoted above, while the state tax and certain others are excepted. If it had been the intention of the framers of the charter that the limitation should not apply to taxes for county purposes, that intention would have been expressed and the exception would have been inserted with the others which do appear.

That part of the judgment from which plaintiff appeals is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to amend its conclusions of law in accordance with the views here expressed and to enter judgment for the amount prayed for in the complaint.

MORRIS v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al.

(Sac. 2094.)

1. CARRIERS (§ 322*)—INJURIES TO PASSENGER—VERDICT—CONCLUSIVENESS.

In a passenger's action for personal injuries, in which the conductor and engineer of the train were joined as defendants, a verdict exonerating them was conclusive that there was no negligence in the operation of the train, causing its derailment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. § 859; Dec. Dig. § 322.*]

2. CARRIERS (§ 285*)—PERSONAL INJURIES—DERAILMENT—CARE REQUIRED.

Under Civ. Code, § 2100, requiring a carrier of passengers to use the utmost care for their safety, and to that end to exercise a reasonable degree of skill, defendant railroad, which exercised the required degree of care against danger from flood waters of unprecedented height, was not liable for injury to a passenger from a derailment at a place believed by its engineer, etc., to be safe, but where the water undermined the track without affecting the surface, and leaving nothing to show that it was not in a safe and sound condition.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1136–1139; Dec. Dig. § 285.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Merced County; L. W. Fulkerth, Judge.

Action by Charles C. Morris against the Southern Pacific Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

L. L. Cory, of Fresno, for appellants. F. G. Ostrander, of Merced, and J. B. Jennings, of Modesto, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. Plaintiff brought this action to recover for injuries which he suffered while a passenger upon defendant's train. The cause was tried before a jury, which returned a verdict in the sum of $6,814.50 against the defendant Southern Pacific Company. From that judgment, and from an order denying its motion for a new trial, the railroad company appeals.

The injuries resulted from the derailment of the train, occasioned by storm waters which undermined the track. The accident occurred about 11 p. m. of the 20th day of January, 1911, in Merced county. There had been rains of unprecedented heaviness in that part of the country, and the storm and flood waters were being carried down new and old river channels to defendant's tracks. The company had been warned of the possibility of danger to its tracks from these flood waters at a point a mile and a half north of its station at Minturn, where there was an old slough of the Chowchilla river. This slough had been known in the past to carry part of the storm waters of the river. The foreman of a large vineyard near Minturn had notified his superintendent that a very heavy freshet of storm waters was approaching the railroad tracks. The superintendent in turn notified the defendant's agent at Minturn. This agent promptly carried the information to the proper officials, and immediate steps were taken to watch and protect the tracks at the old slough a mile and a half north of Minturn, where alone any danger was expected. We may pause here to give the substance of the testimony of the witnesses called on behalf of the plaintiff.

W. A. Nourse was the foreman of the Sierra vineyard, and conveyed the information of the threatened danger to D. V. Harris, the superintendent of the vineyard. Nourse testified that about 3 o'clock in the afternoon of the night of the accident he telephoned to Harris—

"that the Chowchilla was very high, and the water was coming down toward the Southern Pacific tracks and might cause some damage or washout. When I gave the notice and said, 'Look out for the track,' I meant the track where the old slough came through. I did not give any notice that the water was coming up one mile northwest of that point. I have been foreman of this company for about eight years, and during all that time I have never known the water to be up to this particular point where the accident occurred. Sometimes I have seen heavy freshets when the water came down the old slough and when it overflowed, but the water never got up to this particular point where the wreck occurred during any of those times. The notice I gave the agent referred to the track at this old channel. Where the railroad crossed the old slough, there was a trestle; never very much water came down the old slough, not since I have been there. It was down that far in 1906. That is the only time that I have ever known it to approach the embankment at the old slough. Didn't then cause a washout. During all the time I have been there, there was water enough in this one time to run back towards the Chowchilla. I have never known it to go up as far as the point where the accident occurred."

Mr. Harris testified:

"In extremely high water the Chowchilla does overflow. On the day of the accident I sent a warning to the agent of the railroad with reference to high water. I asked my foreman to telephone the agent at Minturn that there was very high water. There is an old river channel paralleling the present channel, and in very high water the water overflows into that. This was nearly one mile south of the point of derailment. I received a telephone message from the Sharon estate that the river was very high. They said it was a cloudburst. All the time that I have been there I have never seen such a flood. This old channel is about one-eighth of a mile from the river, nearer San Francisco. The wreck occurred nearly a mile further west from the old channel. I was afraid the freshet would come down the old channel, and it was there I feared the damage would occur. I did not anticipate or expect that the water would go one mile up the track and make a washout. I had never seen water there before. There were no embankments there to control the water up to this point where the accident occurred. Notwithstanding this tremendous freshet coming down, I did not believe it possible for any water to get as far north as where the accident occurred. I have seen water in the old channel, but I do not believe it ever reached the railroad bridge. It is very sandy, and the water sinks very fast. I never saw the water reach the railroad bridge before in the old channel. I have been there when there had been other freshets. In the heavy freshets before, there never was enough water come down to imperil the railroad track at that point. There have been pretty high freshets before, so the water came down the old channel, but I never, up to this time, saw enough water come down to reach the railroad embankment. At this time, I understand, it not only reached the railroad embankment, but went one mile up the railroad track and caused this washout."

The foregoing testimony was all the testimony offered by plaintiff. The defendant's testimony corroborated this and stands uncontradicted. Thus Patrick Ferguson testified that he had been in the employ of the defendant company for 37 years; that he had been roadmaster of the particular district where the accident occurred for the last eight years. His evidence is as follows:

"I have never known of any freshet water having been at the point of the accident before. The embankment at that place was about 4 or 5 feet high. Before the accident the track was in first-class condition. Late in the afternoon of that day, I received a telegram from the superintendent's office. I wired instructions to the section foreman. The telegram is as follows: 'Water reported running towards track about mile and half west toward Minturn. Go there, examine and protect as soon as possible.' (In railroad parlance towards San Francisco is west and away from San Francisco is east.) The accident did not occur at that point, but a mile and a half west of that point, nearer Merced. The bridge over the Chowchilla river and the dry gulley is about a mile and a quarter from Minturn. During all the time I have been there I have never seen water in the Chowchilla river which would cause any uneasiness or any trouble. It is very seldom that the water ever covered the territory between the piers. All waterway was confined to a small portion of the channel. There were no fears from the Chowchilla river as far as I know."

Witnesses W. G. Hayes and C. C. Kloson testified that they had known the place where the washout and accident occured since the year 1880; that they had never known of any flood or storm waters being there; and that never before had there been any freshet or flood or any other water saving that from the ordinary rainfall upon the land.

The conductor and the engineer of the train which suffered derailment were made parties defendant. Their testimony is that they received orders that flood waters were to be apprehended about a mile and a half north of Minturn; that they were to proceed slowly and cautiously and not attempt to make up any time which was lost. They did so proceed. The headlight was an acetylene light, which made the track clearly visible for a hundred yards. The accident occurred, not at the channel of the old slough a mile and a half north of Minturn, but quite unexpectedly at a point about three miles north of Minturn.

The engineer testifies:

"Before we got there, I looked along the line, and everything looked physically intact. There was nothing in the track just at the point of the accident, as I approached it, that would warn me at all. The track looked fine. It never looked better at any time. The gravel was intact, and it looked all right until the engine trucks hit it. The little wheels ahead of the drivers, they must have crushed it in, and when the drivers came down they went right in the hole. The engine truck had scraped the gravel down in. It threw me forward, and she plowed right through, and by that time the engine became uncoupled from the train. The engine tender still stayed on the track. I have never known any water at the particular point where the accident occurred. The point I was cautioned about was a mile and a half west of Minturn, which is a mile and a half south of the point of the accident, which was three miles from Minturn."

The conductor declares:

"I looked to see what was the cause of the derailment. It was the water. The engine stayed on the track. It was across the washout from the train. The engine could not have stayed on the track if the washout had been there when the engine went over it."

[1] The jury by its verdict exonerated the conductor and engineer, which is conclusive upon the proposition that there was no negligence in the operation of the train. Therefore the sole negligence in the case is that charged against the corporation in not maintaining its roadbed in a safe condition.

[2] The facts in this case, as has been said, are not in conflict. They not only fail to show the slightest negligence upon behalf of the appellant, but they demonstrate that appellant exercised to the utmost the high degree of care demanded of it by law. Civ. Code, § 2100. Never in the history of the road had there been danger from flood waters at the place of the accident. This particular flood was of unprecedented severity. At a place upon the roadbed believed by everybody to be safe, the waters undermined the track without in the least affecting the surface conditions, so that the track seemed to be in sound condition. It was a trap, the existence of which was only known as the engine passed over it. Says the Supreme Court of Missouri (Holt v. S. W. Missouri E. Ry. Co., 84 Mo. App. 443):

> "A carrier of passengers is not obliged to proceed to provide against casualties which have not been known to occur before, and which may not be reasonably anticipated. That which never happened before, and which, in its character, is such as not naturally to occur to prudent men to guard against its happening at all, cannot, when in the course of years it does happen, furnish good grounds for a charge of negligence in not foreseeing its happening and guarding against that remote contingency."

This language has been explicitly approved by this court in Cary v. Los Angeles Ry. Co., 157 Cal. 599, 108 Pac. 682, 27 L. R. A. (N. S.) 764, 21 Ann. Cas. 1329, and again in Teale v. Southern Pacific Co., 20 Cal App. 570, 129 Pac. 949, and it is in accord with the rule of decision in all jurisdictions. In the following cases the accidents were occasioned, as here, by storm waters: Libby v. Me. Cent. R. Co., 85 Me. 34, 26 Atl. 943, 20 L. R. A. 812; Railroad Co. v. Halloren, 53 Tex. 46, 37 Am. Rep. 744; Central Tr. Co. v. Wabash Ry. (C. C.) 57 Fed. 441; Ellet v. St. Louis, etc., Ry. Co., 76 Mo. 518; Norfolk, etc., Co., v. Marshall, 90 Va. 836, 20 S. E. 823; Baltimore & Ohio R. Co. v. Sulphur Spring Ind. School Dist., 96 Pa. 65, 42 Am. Rep. 529; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pomeroy, 67 Tex. 713, 498, 3 S. W. 722; McPherson v. St. Louis, etc., Co., 97 Mo. 253, 10 S. W. 846.

The trial court fairly instructed the jury upon this proposition. Under the instructions given, and under the evidence set forth, the jury could with propriety have rendered but one verdict, and that of exoneration.

The judgment is therefore reversed, and the cause remanded.

HIGGINS v. KAY et al. (L. A. 3684.)

1. PARTIES (§ 61*)—DEVOLUTION OF INTEREST — SUBSTITUTION PENDENTE LITE — NOTICE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 385, provides that in case of the death or disability of a party, the court on motion may allow the proceedings to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest, and in case of any other transfer of interest, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding. Held, that since one whose rights may be affected by action against him is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard, and a failure to accord such notice amounts to lack of due process of law, an order substituting a transferee of the subject-matter of litigation as party plaintiff, on application of the defendant without notice to such substituted party, was invalid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. § 97; Dec. Dig. § 61.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 424*)—NOTICE OF APPEAL—SERVICE—IMPROPER PARTY.

Where a transferee of the subject-matter of litigation pendente lite was substituted as plaintiff without notice, on the application of the defendants, such substitution being invalid, service of notice of appeal on such substituted party was insufficient to sustain the appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2152–2154; Dec. Dig. § 424.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Dell M. Higgins, substituted for A. E. Higgins, against W. O. Kay and others. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Kay appeals. On motion to dismiss. Granted.

L. L. Boone, of San Diego, for appellant. Dell M. Higgins, Hunsaker & Britt, and John A. Powell, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LORIGAN, J. Dell M. Higgins was substituted as plaintiff in the above entitled action by order of the superior court and notice of appeal served on her by the appellant, W. O. Kay. She moves to dismiss the appeal as to herself.

A. E. Higgins, the original plaintiff, brought an action against Kay and others to quiet his title to an undivided one-fourth interest in a certain lot in the city of San Diego. Kay answered, asserting an interest in the land under an executory contract between himself and plaintiff, and also filed a cross-complaint under which he sought specific performance of this executory contract. A general demurrer to the cross-complaint was sustained. On the trial judgment was entered in favor of plaintiff. This was on April 26, 1913. Kay took no steps to appeal under the new or alternative method of appeal, nor any steps to appeal until October 21st following, when a few days before his right to appeal under the old method would have expired he made an ex parte motion or application to the trial court for an order substituting Dell M. Higgins, the moving party herein, as plaintiff in the action in the place of the original plaintiff, A. E. Higgins, and this application the court forthwith granted. This was done without any notice to said Dell M. Higgins of the application for said order. The grounds upon which the motion for such substitution was made and ordered were that the original plaintiff, A. E. Higgins, had died on August 31, 1913; that prior thereto he had conveyed by deed, which was of record, all the property involved in the action to said Dell M. Higgins; that the estate of A. E. Higgins had no further interest in the property; and that said Dell M. Higgins was the only person interested therein as far as the interest of the original plaintiff was concerned.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

After this order of substitution was made, and on the same day it was made, notice of the making thereof was served on said Dell M. Higgins, as also a notice of appeal in this action. She now moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that the order of substitution was void because made without any notice to her of the application therefor; that such notice was a jurisdictional prerequisite to the making of a valid order of substitution. The position of respondent in resisting her motion is that the superior court had authority to make the order without notice to her, or if notice should have been given it was not a jurisdictional essential, and failure to do so only rendered the order voidable; that this being true, the remedy of Dell M. Higgins was by motion in the trial court to have the order of substitution set aside or to proceed by direct appeal to have it vacated in this court, and that, having failed to seek relief by either of these methods, she should not be granted the relief of a dismissal of the appeal which she seeks under the present motion.

It is provided by section 385 of the Code of Civil Procedure as follows:

> "An action or proceeding does not abate by the death, or any disability of a party, or by the transfer of any interest therein, if the cause of action survive or continue. In case of the death or any disability of a party, the court, on motion, may allow the action or proceeding to be continued by or against his representative or successor in interest. In case of any other transfer of interest, the action or proceeding may be continued in the name of the original party, or the court may allow the person to whom the transfer is made to be substituted in the action or proceeding."

It was under this section of the Code that the application for substitution was made, and it will be observed that any right of the defendant Kay to apply and have it done under the asserted fact that the original plaintiff had transferred his interest in the subject-matter of the litigation is given in the last sentence of the section, which provides that it may be ordered "in case of any other transfer" than the devolution of interest by death. While the application for an order of substitution here is based, in a measure, upon the death of the original plaintiff, that fact is really a false quantity in the case. The right of the defendant to have the substitution as made could not be based upon that fact, but only upon the alleged fact of the transfer prior thereto, and as far as either the death of or transfer by the original plaintiff is concerned, it could not affect the rights of the defendant, which would be fully secured if after the one the action continued to be prosecuted in the name of his personal representatives, or after the other it was still prosecuted in the name of the original plaintiff. This is clear from the terms of the section itself, and is supported by the authorities. Walker v. Felt, 54 Cal. 386; Malone v. Big Flat Gravel M. Co., 93 Cal. 384, 28 Pac. 1063. On the death of the original plaintiff Kay had the right to have his personal representatives substituted in his place and nothing more. This also is equally clear from the language of the section. But a substitution of this nature was not what was sought by the defendant or obtained. He based his right to it upon the fact that Dell M. Higgins had acquired by transfer from the original plaintiff all his interest in the subject-matter of the litigation, and on this showing, but without any notice to her, obtained the order of substitution.

[1] It is insisted by her counsel that this failure to give her notice of the application rendered the order void. This precise question has never been heretofore presented to this court for consideration. The cases in this court, and generally where the validity of orders of substitution have been presented for review show, however, that they have been heard and made only after notice to the party sought to be substituted, except where the application has been made by the party himself seeking to be substituted, and we are satisfied on principle that notice was essential to the validity of the order here made. The rule is that in any proceeding of a judicial character, one whose rights or interests may be affected by action against him therein is entitled to notice and an opportunity to be heard, and that a failure to accord him that right amounts to lack of due process of law. He is entitled to an opportunity to question the right of the party applying therefor to have an order for it at all, or whether the discretion of the court should be exercised in his favor, because the granting of such an order rests in the sound discretion of the court (Emerson v. McWhirter, 128 Cal. 268, 60 Pac. 774), and likewise is entitled to an opportunity to contest the facts upon which the motion or application for substitution are based. His substantial rights or interests may be vitally affected if substitution is made, or responsibilities and duties entailed upon him, and it is violative of fundamental principle that this may be done without any notice or opportunity given him to be heard in protection of his rights and interests.

The case of Campbell v. West, 93 Cal. 653, 29 Pac. 219, 645, relied on by respondent in support of the order, is clearly distinguishable from the matter at bar. In that case while the question on appeal was as to the correct method of pleading the death of the plaintiff pending the action and the appointment of his executor, the court did say, as to motions to have an action continued against the representatives or successors in interest of a deceased, "that the practice in this state is well settled in such cases for courts to allow the substitution to be made upon suggestion of the death of a party and on an ex parte motion showing the appointment and qualification of the executor or administrator of the estate of the deceased party." But this language had reference to motions for the substitution of the executor or administrator of a deceased party made by such executor or administrator himself, which was the situation in the Campbell Case. Of course, a motion for substitution so made is not in any sense an adversary proceeding and it was to such a motion that the court in the Campbell Case was referring. But here the proceeding was of an adversary nature. It was sought to make Dell M. Higgins, who was not a party to the action without her consent, a litigant therein, and before this might be done she was entitled to her day in court—to notice and an opportunity to be heard in the matter. Undoubtedly the court may make a substitution such as was sought here upon a proper showing. But this may be done only after notice of an application therefor. Failure, however, to give her any notice here constituted lack of due process of law rendering the making of the order void.

[2] It follows that as there was no valid substitution of Dell M. Higgins as plaintiff in the action, the service of notice of appeal upon her was of no legal efficacy, and the motion to dismiss this appeal as to her is granted.

NICCOLLS et al. v. NICCOLLS et al.

1. WILLS (§ 91*)—TESTAMENTARY CHARACTER OF INSTRUMENT—CREATION OF TRUSTS.

A deed by a husband and wife, reciting that it was to take effect upon the death of the husband, and purporting to sell, assign, etc., all property, real and personal, that they might own at the husband's death, to trustees, in trust for purposes therein expressed, and reserving the right to revoke or modify it at any time during the husband's life, was testamentary in character and of no effect for the erection of a trust, since it only purported to take effect on the husband's death, and passed no interest till that time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Wills, Cent. Dig. § 220; Dec. Dig. § 91.*]

2. TRUSTS (§ 53*)—CREATION OF TRUSTS—ESTOPPEL TO DENY TRUST.

Where a deed by a husband and wife conveying in trust the property which they might own at the death of the husband was ineffective, the fact that one of the trustees accepted the trust in writing and took charge of the husband's property after his death, and proceeded to carry out its terms, and the concurrence of the wife in such acts, gave the beneficiary no rights, by way of estoppel, in the property of the husband.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Action by Melinda Clemens Niccolls and others against Frances Niccolls and others. From a judgment for defendants, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Mills & O'Farrell, W. J. Mossholder, and Marks P. Mossholder, all of San Diego (Edward O'Bryan, of San Diego, of counsel), for appellants. Luce & Luce and Wadham & Cosgrove, all of San Diego, for respondents.

MELVIN, J. The plaintiffs filed their complaint, wherein they asked that the defendants be compelled to recognize the validity of a certain trust deed and to be governed by its provisions. A general demurrer to the complaint was sustained without leave to amend, and, from the judgment entered for defendants, plaintiffs appeal.

It is alleged that Rogers was the administrator of the estate of Eben Smith Niccolls, deceased; that plaintiff Melinda Clemens Niccolls is the widow of said Eben Smith Niccolls; that the other plaintiffs are surviving children of said decedent and are his heirs at law; that Rogers resigned as administrator of the Eben S. Niccolls estate, and Layne was appointed his successor; that on April 13, 1907, and from thence to the date of his death, November 4, 1909, one Robert Niccolls, an uncle of Eben S. Niccolls, was seised in fee simple of certain tracts of real estate, descriptions of which are fully set forth in the complaint; that during said period Robert Niccolls was possessed also of a large amount of personal property, which is also described; that Frances Niccolls is the widow of Robert, and was his wife at the time of the execution of a certain purported deed of trust, which is set forth in full in the complaint. The said deed by its terms seeks to create a trust to take effect upon the death of Robert Niccolls in favor of Frances Niccolls, his widow, and it also provides that upon her death the property shall be distributed to certain beneficiaries; Eben S. Niccolls being named as one of them. It is principally upon the terms of this deed of trust, so called, that plaintiffs base their supposed cause of action. The complaint contains averments that Robert and Frances Niccolls duly acknowledged the trust deed of April 13, 1907; that the executed instrument was afterwards delivered to Eben Smith Niccolls by the trustors in escrow, to be delivered according to its terms to the trustees, Thorp, Weldon, and Rogers; that, after the death of Robert Niccolls in 1909, Eben Smith Niccolls delivered the deed to Rogers, who in writing accepted the trust declared therein; that Thorp had predeceased the trustor Robert Niccolls, and Weldon refused to act; that Rogers took charge of all of Robert's property, recorded the deed, and proceeded to carry out its terms, but that subsequently, in collusion with Frances Niccolls, the surviving trustor, he caused himself, on her petition and his own, to be appointed administrator of the estate of Robert Niccolls, deceased, since which time they have refused to perform their duties under the trust deed or to recognize its validity. It is further set forth that Robert Niccolls left no children and no father nor mother surviving him.

[1] By the first paragraph of the trust deed the trustors, Robert and Frances Niccolls, reserve the right to revoke or modify the said deed at any time during Robert's life. The second paragraph is as follows:

> "That the said trustors by these presents, to take effect only upon the death of said Robert Niccolls, one of said trustors, sell, assign, transfer and confirm unto the said trustees, in joint tenancy, and to the survivor of them and their successors and assigns, all our property of every kind and nature, both real and personal, that we may have and own at the time of the death of the said Robert Niccolls, one of said trustors, to have and to hold the same unto the said trustees as joint tenants and not as tenants in common, with the right of survivorship, and to their successors and assigns, in trust and confidence, nevertheless for the purposes hereinafter expressed."

Clearly this did not convey any present interest in the property of the trustors. It only related to the property which they should possess at the time of the death of Robert. It purported to convey no interest in any property owned by them at the date of its execution, and the mere fact that they possessed the same property then which was theirs when Robert Niccolls died is a coincidence which in no manner alters the purport or effect of the instrument. While it is competent to create a trust which shall take effect after the death of a grantor, nevertheless there must be some interest or estate which passes at the time of the execution of the deed. In the recent case of Tennant v. John Tennant Memorial Home, 167 Cal. 577, 140 Pac. 246, this court had occasion to reaffirm the rule for determining whether or not a given instrument is testamentary in character, and in that behalf the following language was quoted from Nichols v. Emery, 109 Cal. 329, 41 Pac. 1089, 50 Am. St. Rep. 43:

> "The essential characteristic of an instrument testamentary in its nature is that it operates only upon and by reason of the death of the maker. Up to that time it is ambulatory. By its execution the maker has parted with no rights and divested himself of no modicum of his estate, and per contra no rights have accrued to, and no estate has vested in, any other person. The death of the maker establishes for the first time the character of the instrument. It at once ceases to be ambulatory; it acquires a fixed status and operates as a conveyance of title. Its admission to probate is merely a judicial declaration of that status. On the other hand, to the creation of a valid express trust it is essential that some estate or interest should be conveyed to the trustee, and, when the instrument creating the trust is other than a will, that estate or interest must pass immediately. By such a trust, therefore, something of the settlor's interest has passed from him and into the trustee for the benefit of the cestui, and this transfer of interest is a present one and in no wise dependent upon the settlor's death. But it is important to note the distinction between the interest transferred and the enjoyment of that interest. The enjoyment of the cestui may be made to commence in the future and to depend for its commencement upon the termination of an existing life or lives or of an intermediate estate."

Measuring the trust deed by this rule, we cannot escape the conclusion that it sought to postpone not merely the date of the taking effect of the trust but also the passing of the interest of the so-called trustors to a time subsequent to the death of one of them. There was no attempt by words of description or otherwise to make the trust apply to the property owned by Robert and Frances Niccolls when the deed was executed. The words "that we may have and own at the time of the death of the said Robert Niccolls" are not ambiguous. They seek to specify a future event, namely, the death of the said Robert Niccolls, as the time for the creation of the trust estate. Such an instrument is clearly testamentary in its character and is of no effect for the erection of a trust.

[2] Appellants seek to make the further point that, under the allegations of their pleading, defendant Rogers is estopped by his conduct, and Frances Niccolls is estopped by her concurrence therein, from denying the efficacy of the trust deed; but no conduct could give vitality to a void instrument. The only interest in the property asserted by plaintiffs is one alleged to have been created in favor of Eben S. Niccolls by the deed of trust. That instrument being void, no trust in the property of the deceased Robert Niccolls may arise by the conduct of his supposed trustee nor of his alleged cotrustor.

CRABBE v. MAMMOTH CHANNEL GOLD MINING CO. (Sac. 2111.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1914.)

1. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 217*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—DUTY OF SERVANT TO INSPECT.

A miner is not bound to inspect his place of work, though he must exercise that amount of care which the law presumes every person will employ for his own preservation, and hence he does not assume the risk of injury from the fall of rocks in a finished chamber in the mine because he did not inspect it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 574–600; Dec. Dig. § 217.*]

2. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 241*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CARE.

A miner engaged in new operations such as driving a new shaft is bound to exercise much greater care than when at work in a finished chamber in the mine.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. § 757; Dec. Dig. § 241.*]

3. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 204*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—ASSUMPTION OF RISK.

Employers' Liability Act (St. 1911, p. 796) § 1, subd. 1, having abolished the defense of assumption of risk, recovery for the death of a miner killed by a fall of rock, cannot be defeated on the ground that he assumed the risk because he did not inspect his place of work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 544–546; Dec. Dig. § 204.*]

4. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 107*)—INJURIES TO SERVANT—CHANGE IN CONDITIONS OF PLACE OF WORK.

The owner of a mine cannot defeat recovery for the death of a miner, killed by the fall of rock in a finished chamber, on the ground that it was a place where the conditions were continuously changing, where timbers for the chamber were outside the shaft, and could have been put up at any time.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 199–202, 212, 254, 255; Dec. Dig. § 107.*]

5. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 262*)—INJURIES TO SERVANTS—ACTIONS—DEFENSES.

The defense that a mineowner was not liable for the death of a servant because he was killed in a place where changes were continuous must be specially pleaded.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 855–859; Dec. Dig. § 262.*]

6. TRIAL (§ 250*)—INSTRUCTIONS—APPLICABILITY TO PLEADINGS AND EVIDENCE.

Instructions must be applicable to the pleadings and the proof.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 584–586; Dec. Dig. § 250.*]

7. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 262*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—NECESSITY OF PLEADING.

The defense of contributory negligence in an action for the death of a servant is an affirmative one, which must be pleaded before it can be relied on.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Master and Servant, Cent. Dig. §§ 855–859; Dec. Dig. § 262.*]

8. MASTER AND SERVANT (§ 262*)—INJURY TO SERVANT—PLEADING CONTRIBUTORY NEGLIGENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

In an action for the wrongful death of a servant, an answer, consisting of a general denial and general allegations that the accident was caused by the servant's own gross negligence and failure to use ordinary care for his own protection, is not a sufficient pleading of the defense of contributory negligence, which is one in confession and avoidance.

9. DEATH (§ 58*)—TRIAL (§ 252*)—PRESUMPTIONS—NATURE OF PRESUMPTIONS—INSTRUCTIONS.

In an action for the wrongful death of a miner, where there were no eyewitnesses of the accident, the presumption that he exercised due care in his own behalf, announced by Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4, while rebuttable, is conclusive under section 1961, not being controverted; hence instructions on contributory negligence were properly refused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 75–78; Dec. Dig. § 58;* Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 505, 596–612; Dec. Dig. § 252.*]

10. DEATH (§ 99*)—DAMAGES—MEASURE.

An award of $20,000 damages in favor of the widow and four minor children of the deceased was not excessive where he had an expectancy of over 33 years, and had earned $6 a day, though at the time of the accident he was earning only $3.50 a day.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Death, Cent. Dig. §§ 125–130; Dec. Dig. § 99.*]

11. DEATH (§ 88*) — DAMAGES — ELEMENTS — LOSS OF SOCIETY.

In an action for the wrongful death of a father, the jury may consider the loss of society, comfort and care suffered by his surviving children.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; John C. Gray, Judge.

Action by Lavinia Crabbe, as administratrix of the estate of William R. Crabbe, against the Mammoth Channel Gold Mining Company. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Carlin, of Marysville, for appellant. Lon Bond, of Chico, and John H. Crabbe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. William R. Crabbe, a skilled and experienced miner, aged 33 years, was killed by a falling stone while at work under ground in the mine of appellant. His administratrix brought this action for damages. It was tried before a jury; verdict passed for plaintiff in the sum of $20,000, and judgment followed the verdict. Defendant moved for a new trial, and from the order denying its motion prosecutes this appeal.

Defendant's mine comprised a tunnel leading from the surface into a mountain for a distance of 1,200 feet. There the tunnel connected with a shaft extending downward about 200 feet to what is known as a "station," which is an excavated underground room. The underground room in this case was 12 feet wide, 20 feet long, and 10 feet high. From the end of the station opposite the shaft another tunnel or "drift" was being driven in the hope of finding a pay gravel channel. Plaintiff's intestate, with a companion, was at work in excavating in this drift, which at the time of the accident extended from 25 to 30 feet from the station. He was "mucking" or carrying out the waste material to the end of the shaft in the station, whence it was conveyed out of the mine. While so engaged a stone in the roof of the station fell upon him and caused his death. The complaint charged negligence in failing properly to timber this station so as to prevent rock falling from the roof thereof. The answer made denial and affirmatively charged that the accident which resulted in Crabbe's death "was due to and caused by his own gross negligence and failure to exercise and use ordinary care for his own protection." The injury which resulted in Crabbe's death befell him on the 13th day of September, 1911, when the Employers' Liability Act was in force. This act was also in force at the time of the trial of the action. Stats. 1911, p. 796.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

At the time of the accident the station had been but partially and incompletely timbered. An additional set of timbers was placed near the mouth of the shaft ready for use, and was visible to the deceased as he went to and from his labors. No work had been done toward making the station safe and secure for two weeks before the accident, during which time the timbers remained at the mouth of the shaft.

[1] In argument appellant takes the position that the station was reasonably safe and had been made reasonably safe for the conduct of the mining operations which were under way; that the blasting in the drift had a tendency to jar and loosen the rock both in the drift and in the station; that it was the duty of the deceased as an experienced miner to observe the condition of the mine and station, and when that condition called for additional timbering in the station, to report this fact to the superintendent or foreman; that it was likewise Crabbe's duty, as a matter of common prudence for his own safety, to notice "if anything appeared out of the way, rendering it dangerous, and to report that condition promptly." The evidence of defendant's superintendent and foreman is to the effect that the station was in a reasonably safe condition. The opposing evidence is that it was unsafe, and the incontestable fact is that if the roof had been supported by the additional timbers the accident could not have happened. All of the evidence is to the effect that Crabbe was engaged in the performance of his regular duties as miner. There is not a scintilla of evidence that he was careless or negligent in the performance of those duties, unless this inference is to be drawn from the fact that while wheeling the loosened rock from the face of the tunnel through the station to the shaft a large stone from the unsupported roof of the station fell and killed him. If such a fact as this warrants even an inference of negligence upon the part of a miner, it must come from the position, which appellant asserts, that it is the duty of miners continually to observe the condition of the mine for their own safety. But even if this be conceded to be true, and only in a very limited sense can it be said to be true, no inference can be drawn that if he had inspected the roof he could have detected the hazard and the imminence of his danger. Indeed, it would be a much more natural inference that if he had paused to make such an examination he would have been killed while making the inspection, since the roof of the station was 10 feet high and, with the lights which miners carry, to inspect it necessitated standing under the point to be inspected and holding high the light. We say that the doctrine for which appellant contends is true only in the most limited extent—the duty namely of continued inspection of the condition of the mine. Such duty of inspection is the duty of the employer, and it should be performed with all proper care by the employer's agents. Dyas v. S. P. Co., 140 Cal. 308, 73 Pac. 972. In this case it is contended by appellant that it was so properly performed by the superintendent and foreman. To say that in a mine such as this it is the duty of each miner, holding high his light to inspect the roof of the station and the shaft and the condition of the tunnel is to say that the mineowner owes them no duty in this regard. Moreover, a miner who did, without special instruction from the owner, so employ his time in observation and inspection and not in his regular miner's work, would remain in the employ of the mineowner only until the fact was discovered. The truth of the matter is that a miner under such circumstances is charged with the duty of exercising only such an amount of care as the law presumes that every person will employ for their own interest and preservation. The quantum of that care will depend upon and vary with the degree of hazard of the particular occupation.

[2] Where miners are employed in drifting and are working into new formations, the degree of care which they will be called upon to exercise for their own protection to avoid injury from a cave or from falling rock will be very much greater than the degree of care imposed upon them in using the older workings which are or should be in a thoroughly protected condition, and which they have the right to assume are in such condition.

[3] But even if it be said that the station as used by Crabbe was in an unsafe condition, and that he knew it, this amounts to no more than a declaration that Crabbe assumed the risk of a known hazard. But this fact, by the very terms of the Employers' Liability Act, no longer affords the employer a defense. Employers' Liability Act, § 1, subd. 1.

[4, 5] The argument of appellant that it was not bound to furnish a reasonably safe place for the work of deceased because of the changing conditions is open to the twofold answer: First, that there were no such changing conditions as to the station which made it impracticable to make that safe, since the extra timbering lying unused at the mouth of the shaft would unquestionably have done this thing; and, second, such a contention is in the nature of an affirmative defense which, to be availed of, should be pleaded. Bird v. Utica Gold Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 677, 84 Pac. 256.

[6] Appellant's especial complaint, however, is directed to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions proposed by it. One of these instructions was to the effect that if the deceased knew or should have known the unsafe condition of the station in time to report it to the superintendent, and failed to do so, he was negligent. Again the court was asked to instruct the jury that if the negligence of the deceased was not slight, and that of the defendant was not gross the verdict should be for the defendant. Other instructions going to the asserted contributory negligence of the deceased and the degree of that negligence, whether slight or gross, as contemplated by section 1 of the Employers' Liability Act, were either refused or given in modified form. Over the action of the court in these respects appellant has no just cause for complaint, fundamentally because appellant's pleading did not justify the giving of these instructions, and, secondarily, because the evidence in the case did not call for them.

[7, 8] Appellant's answer, as above indicated, consisted of a denial that its negligence occasioned the death of Crabbe, and then it affirmatively declared, as above quoted, that his death was "caused by his own gross negligence and failure to exercise and use ordinary care for his own protection." Contributory negligence in this state is an affirmative defense which must be pleaded. While the pleader may charge the contributory negligence in general terms, yet he must plead the facts of such negligence, and the facts pleaded must show a causal connection with the injury. Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 95, 27 Pac. 29; Stephenson v. S. P. Co., 102 Cal. 144, 34 Pac. 618, 36 Pac. 407. In this case the pleader does not plead contributory negligence as such at all, for contributory negligence is in its nature a plea of confession and avoidance. Contributory negligence in law is predicated upon the existence of negligence upon the part of the defendant, the responsibility for which he avoids by showing a concurrent and contributing negligence upon the part of the person injured. Cogdell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., 132 N. C. 852, 44 S. E. 618; Newport L. & A. T. Co. v. Pirmann, 82 S. W. 976; Watkinds v. S. P. R. Co. (D. C.) 38 Fed. 711, 4 L. R. A. 239. Appellant's plea is therefore not a plea of contributory negligence, but consists of a denial of negligence upon the part of the pleader and an assertion of gross negligence upon the part of the deceased. But this asserted gross negligence itself is not pleaded in form sufficient to tender an issue. The case then rests upon the asserted negligence of defendant averred in the complaint and the denial of that negligence sufficiently pleaded in the answer.

[9] But even if so great an extension of the rule of pleadings should be indulged in as to say that if the evidence (without a pleading of contributory negligence) showed such negligence upon the part of the injured person, the court should instruct accordingly, in this case such a showing is entirely lacking. The precise cause of Crabbe's death is well established. The precise amount of knowledge of conditions actually existing at the time of or just prior to his death is not known. It is, however, thoroughly well established that if the station had been properly timbered the stone which caused Crabbe's death would not have fallen. Even if it be said that as an experienced miner the deceased knew that the condition of the station was unsafe, in continuing to work in and through it, he but assumed the known hazard, which as a defense is no longer available to appellant. It was necessary for appellant to plead and to show that, even after the assumption of this known risk, he negligently conducted himself in regard to it. Where death is occasioned under circumstances such as this, without eyewitnesses, the law comes to the aid of the plaintiff who is pressing a suit for damages for the death, and that law is found in the presumption of the Code of Civil Procedure, namely, that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns. Code Civ. Proc. § 1963, subd. 4; Cogdell v. Wilmington & W. R. Co., supra; Shannon v. Delwer, 68 Minn. 138, 71 N. W. 14. This is a controvertible presumption, it is true, but until controverted it is evidence in accordance with which the jury is bound to decide. Code Civ. Proc., § 1961. There is no evidence in this case to rebut this presumption, and, standing uncontroverted, it is binding to the effect that the deceased was exercising the due amount of care in all matters connected with his progress through the station at the time when he met his death. There being no evidence, therefore, tending to show negligence upon the part of the deceased, all instructions touching that subject-matter were properly refused. Sill v. Ceschi, 140 Pac. 949.

[10, 11] Deceased left four minor children. He was at the time of his death earning $3.50 a day. He had earned $6 a day. His expectancy of life was over 33 years. The jury were entitled to take into consideration the loss of society, comfort, and care suffered by the surviving children on account of the death of their father. Dyas v. S. P.

Co., 140 Cal. 308, 73 Pac. 972. It may not be said that under the facts and circumstances of this case the award of the jury was excessive.

The order appealed from is therefore affirmed.

ECONOMIC GAS CO. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 3369.)

1. GAS (§ 14*)—RATES—POWER OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

The authority conferred by Const. art. 11, § 19, empowering municipal corporations to regulate charges for gas sold by any public service corporation, and St. 1911, p. 2063, authorizing a city to fix and determine rates to be collected for gas, is plenary, and is not limited to the fixing of maximum rates, but includes the power to prohibit the lowering of rates directly or indirectly by any device which a gas company may adopt, including the device of discount to consumers paying their bills at the office of the company on or before a designated day of the month next succeeding that during which the indebtedness for gas was incurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gas, Cent. Dig. §§ 10–11; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 111*)—ORDINANCES—PARTIAL INVALIDITY.

The validity of a city ordinance, fixing gas rates and making it unlawful to collect by rebate, drawback, or other device greater or less than or different from the rates fixed, is unaffected by the invalidity of the provision authorizing the board of public utilities to consent to a reduction in rates on application therefor on the theory that the board may fix rates more frequently than once a year, contrary to St. 1911, p. 2021.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 245–256; Dec. Dig. § 111.*]

3. GAS (§ 14*)—RATES—ORDINANCES—CONSTRUCTION.

A city ordinance, fixing gas rates and prohibiting the collection, by rebate, drawback, or other device, of a greater or less or different sum than the rates fixed, prohibits a gas company from granting a discount to consumers paying their bills at its office on or before a designated day of the month next succeeding that during which the indebtedness was incurred.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Gas, Cent. Dig. §§ 10–11; Dec. Dig. § 14.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; N. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by the Economic Gas Company against the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed and remanded.

John W. Shenk, Charles D. Houghton, and Roy A. Linn, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. Trippet, Chapman & Biby, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. By ordinance No. 22947 (New Series) the city of Los Angeles established a rate of 80 cents per thousand cubic feet as the amount to be charged for gas furnished by the Economic Gas Company, a corporation, to its patrons within the corporate limits of that city. The gas company, for the purpose of facilitating its collections and to save the expense of hiring collectors, made a rule that a discount of 6¼ per cent. would be allowed to each consumer who would pay his bill at the office of the company on or before the 10th day of the month next succeeding that during which the indebtedness should be incurred. This action was one by which plaintiff sought to enjoin defendants from enforcing that part of the ordinance which prohibited the selling of gas at a rate less than that prescribed therein. Defendants demurred to the complaint; their demurrer was overruled; they declined to answer; and judgment was accordingly entered in compliance with plaintiff's prayer, enjoining defendants from any interference with the granting of the said rebates. They have appealed from the judgment.

By the first section of the ordinance in question the rates to be charged by the various gas companies in the city of Los Angeles, are fixed, that specified for plaintiff being, as stated above, 80 cents per thousand cubic feet. By section 2 it is made unlawful for any person, firm, or corporation furnishing gas in said city to charge, collect, or receive any compensation in excess of the rate fixed thereby for the year commencing July 1, 1911, and ending June 30, 1912. Section 3 is in part as follows:

> "It shall be unlawful for any person, firm or corporation, either as principal, agent, employé, or otherwise, to charge, demand, collect or receive any rate or compensation for gas supplied during the year commencing July 1, 1911, and ending June 30, 1912, to the city of Los Angeles, or to any inhabitant thereof, less than the rate fixed by this ordinance, unless an application for a reduction in such rate is made by the person, firm or corporation so supplying such gas, and the consent of the board of public utilities thereto is obtained in the manner hereinafter provided."

It is unnecessary, for the purposes of this opinion, to state in detail the procedure required to invoke the action of the board of public utilities. Suffice it to say that the board is authorized by the section to lower the rate on application and to raise it again on request of a gas producer, but not to a figure in excess of that established by the first section of the ordinance. It is alleged in the complaint that the gas company has not made application to the board of public utilities for permission to discount its bills, for the reason that said board has notified the officers of the company that such request would be denied.

Section 4 provides that it shall be unlawful to charge any person any rate greater or less than that demanded of another for the same service.

Section 5 prohibits the collection by rebate, drawback, or other device, of compensation for gas greater or less than or different from the rates fixed by the said ordinance.

[1] By section 19 of article 11 of the Constitution, any municipal corporation is given authority to "regulate the charges" for gas sold by any public service corporation or any individual engaged in similar business, and among the enumerated powers of the city in its charter (Stats. 1911, p. 2063) is that "to fix and determine rates of compensation to be collected * * * for gas." The authority conferred is plenary, and by the terms of the Constitution and the charter does not limit the city to the establishing of a maximum rate. Respondent insists, however, that the city's power is merely to declare a maximum rate, and that the corporation may do anything it desires in the way of a reduction of price to a general class of consumers. We cannot agree with this contention. One of the purposes of regulation is to exclude favoritism to an individual or a class. If the legislative body of a city might only fix a maximum rate, it might be possible for a corporation to reduce its charges, in some form or another, to a point which would drive a competitor out of business and, after accomplishing that result, to resume the maximum charge permitted by law.

It is contended that the city's police power extends only to the protection of the consumer. But "regulation" involves more than that. It includes the power to prevent ruinous competition among the producers as well as unjust charges to the consumers. Familiar examples of the right of a regulating body to fix rates which may not be exceeded nor rebated are furnished by the controversies which have arisen between the Interstate Commerce Commission and certain transportation companies. The Supreme Court of the United States has held that the tariff rates for shipments may not be evaded by any pretext or device. Armour Packing Co. v. United States, 209 U. S. 71, 28 Sup. Ct. 428, 52 L. Ed. 681; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., v. Mottley, 219 U. S. 476, 31 Sup. Ct. 265, 55 L. Ed. 297, 34 L. R. A. (N. S.) 671. In the recent case of Pinney & Boyle Co. v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Corp., 141 Pac. 620, this department disposed of the whole subject of contracts with consumers made in violation of this ordinance. There, as here, one of the contentions was that the police power of the city permitted the establishment of a maximum rate only, but it was held that such a theory was in practical effect "a denial of the existence of the rate-fixing power itself."

[2, 3] Respondent argues that the power sought to be vested in the board of public utilities by section 3 of the ordinance may not be lawfully exercised because by its exercise rates might be fixed more frequently than once a year, contrary to the express prohibition of the law. Stats. 1911, p. 2021. It is unnecessary to discuss this interesting matter, for the reason that admittedly the board has not ever been requested to act upon the subject of respondent's proposed discounts. If we eliminate this part of the ordinance there still remains that portion of it by which the city council, in the exercise of its undoubted authority, fixed rates which it deemed reasonable. It forbade any departure from these rates except by permission of the board of utilities, and if the exception be void, the inhibition is clearly not so. We are not here concerned with the reasonableness of the rate of 80 cents per thousand cubic feet for gas. Indeed by seeking in some instances to charge a lower rate respondent concedes its reasonableness. We are merely concerned with the power of a municipality to prohibit the lowering of rates directly or indirectly by any sort of device which a gas company may adopt. Such power does exist and it has been exercised in the ordinance now before us.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the superior court to sustain the demurrer of defendants to the complaint and to dissolve the injunction.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

STEELE et ux. v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO. (L. A. 3346.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1914.)

CARRIERS (§ 316*)—PASSENGER'S ACTION FOR INJURIES—BURDEN OF PROOF—RES IPSA LOQUITUR.

While proof of a collision or derailment of a train or other accident, resulting in injury to a passenger through the operation of the instrumentalities employed by the carrier in the conduct of its business of transporting him, raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, and throws upon it the burden of showing that the accident was the result of causes beyond its control, and while such presumption arises from proof that the car was suddenly started while a passenger was alighting, no such presumption arises from the fact of an injury to a passenger without proof, if the fact be controverted, that the injury was caused by a collision, derailment, or sudden starting of the car while the passenger was alighting; and hence where the evidence was conflicting as to whether a passenger was injured by the car starting while she was alighting, or by reason of her attempt to alight while the car was in motion, it was error to charge that proof of the injury while on defendant's car cast upon defendant the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or some other cause that human care or foresight could not prevent, or by contributory negligence.

Action by Sarah I. Steele and husband against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. From a judgment on a verdict for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

J. W. McKinley and R. C. Gortner, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. F. A. Knight, of Long Beach, for respondents.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought to recover damages for personal injuries sustained by plaintiff Sarah I. Steele through the alleged negligence of the defendant, and, from a judgment entered on a verdict in favor of plaintiffs, defendant appeals.

The complaint alleges that, while plaintiff Mrs. Steele was a passenger on a street car of the defendant, she notified the employés of defendant operating it that she desired to get off at a certain point along its route which the car was approaching and where it regularly stopped; that the car was stopped when it reached said point, and she proceeded to leave it, but without allowing her sufficient time to safely do so, and, while she was still on the steps of the car, the employés of defendant carelessly and negligently and suddenly started said car, in consequence of which, and without any fault on her part, she was violently thrown to the street and grievously injured.

Defendant denied the charge of negligence, or that Mrs. Steele sustained the injuries claimed as a result thereof, and set up contributory negligence on her part in attempting to get off the car before it had stopped and while it was in motion.

There was no question but what Mrs. Steele was a passenger upon the car, and that she was injured while attempting to alight from it, but on the issue as to whether the car was stopped and was suddenly started while she was proceeding, as she claimed, to get off of it, or whether she attempted to alight therefrom while it was still in motion, and hence was guilty of contributory negligence as claimed by defendant, the evidence was sharply conflicting.

In this state of the pleadings, the issues made, and the condition of the evidence, the court gave the following instruction:

> "You are instructed that contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff cannot be presumed from the mere fact of injury, but must be proved. On the other hand, the proof of injury of plaintiff on a car of the defendant casts upon the defendant the burden of proving that the injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or some other cause which human care and foresight could not prevent, or by the contributory negligence of the plaintiff."

The correctness of this instruction, as far as the italicized portion of it is concerned, is attacked by appellant, and whether this attack is justified is the sole point presented for consideration on this appeal. It will be noted that under the instruction the jury is told that the proof of the mere happening of an injury to a passenger on the car of a carrier raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier, which casts the burden on it of proving that such injury was occasioned by inevitable casualty, or by contributory negligence on the part of the passenger. Appellant insists that, under the issues and evidence in the case, such an instruction is erroneous, and we are satisfied that this claim must be sustained. We are not pointed by counsel for respondents to any case which declares that such a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises from proof of the mere fact of injury itself to a passenger. The rule no doubt is that where a passenger is injured in a collision, or derailment of a train, or through the operation of the instrumentalities employed by the carrier in the conduct of its business of transporting him, proof of the collision, derailment, or accident due to such instrumentalities raises a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier. It is not necessary for the passenger to prove the cause of the collision, derailment, or other accident. It is sufficient for him to prove that it occurred, and such proof makes a prima facie case of negligence on the part of the carrier, which throws upon it the duty of explaining how it occurred, and showing that it was the result of causes beyond its control, and so relieving it from responsibility. The wisdom of this rule is apparent. The train being under the control of the carrier, and the collision, derailment, or accident occurring while being operated by it, the causes therefor are peculiarly within the knowledge of the carrier. The passenger cannot ordinarily know how the accident occurred. Such accidents do not occur if ordinary care is used in the operation of trains, and it is only reasonable, when they do occur, to require an explanation of the causes thereof to be made by the one upon whom the duty is cast of avoiding them. MacDougall v. Central R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 431; McCurrie v. Southern Pac. Co., 122 Cal. 558, 55 Pac. 324; Boone v. Oakland Transit Co., 139 Cal. 490, 73 Pac. 243; Kline v. Santa Barbara Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 741, 90 Pac. 125.

Within this rule it is no doubt equally true that where a passenger is attempting to alight from a car on reaching his destination, and the car suddenly starts, throwing him to the ground, on proof of the fact of such starting up while he is endeavoring to alight, a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier in such starting is raised, because, in the exercise of due care, a car will not be started while the passenger is undertaking to get off. The passenger is therefore not required to prove why the car started, but simply the fact that it did start. Having done this, he makes a prima facie case of negligence against the carrier, and the burden of proof is then cast upon the latter to prove the cause of the starting, and that it occurred under such circumstances as relieved it from liability for any injury occasioned the passenger thereby. But, in any case, no presumption of negligence arises from the mere fact that the passenger was injured. There must be, in addition, proof, if the fact is controverted, that it proceeded from a collision or derailment of the train or the starting of the car while the passenger was endeavoring to alight, before the presumption of negligence can be invoked, because it is only on such proof and a finding by the jury that the injury proceeded from such cause that the presumption arises. The rule in this regard is clearly stated in Wyatt v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 156 Cal. 170, 103 Pac. 892, as follows:

> "It is not the law, as the argument of the plaintiffs implies, that the mere fact that a passenger is injured while aboard a car, or while alighting therefrom, creates a presumption that the injury was caused by want of care on the part of the defendant operating such car. It must first be shown that the injury came from the movement of the car by those in charge of it, or from something connected therewith, or in control of the defendant. When this is done, the law then presumes prima facie that the particular thing thus shown to have caused the injury was due to the defendant's negligence, and the burden is thrown upon the defendant to disprove the prima facie case thus made. Such negligence is presumed because such accidents do not ordinarily happen if due care is used, and because the defendant is usually better able than the plaintiff to show the actual truth of the matter. In Griffen v. Manice, 166 N. Y. 193, 59 N. E. 925 [52 L. R. A. 922] 82 Am. St. Rep. 630, the court, referring to this maxim, says: 'It is not the injury, but the manner and circumstances of the injury, that justifies the application of the maxim and the inference of negligence. If a passenger in a car is injured by striking the seat in front of him, that of itself authorizes no inference of negligence. If it be shown, however, that he was precipitated against the seat by reason of the train coming in collision with another train, or in consequence of the car being derailed, the presumption of negligence arises.' So here the fact that the deceased was injured by falling to the ground creates no presumption of negligence. But, if it is also shown that the fall came about from the sudden starting of the car as she was stepping off the same, then it will be presumed that the sudden start was caused by the defendant's negligence. But the proof of the injury (that is, the bruise or hurt), or the proof that she fell to the ground, without proof as to why she fell, raises no presumption either that she was made to fall by the sudden starting of a car at rest, or by a careless attempt to get off while it was in motion and before it had stopped. Lincoln Tr. Co. v. Shepherd, 74 Neb. 372, 104 N. W. 882, 107 N. W. 764; Saunders v. Chicago, etc., Co., 6 S. D. 40, 60 N. W. 148."

It is this erroneous assumption discussed in the Wyatt Case which is embodied in the instruction at bar. The vice of that instruction arises from telling the jury that a presumption of negligence on the part of the carrier arises from the mere fact of injury to a passenger, when no such presumption arises from that fact alone. In the case at bar proof of injury alone had no tendency whatever to show how the accident to plaintiff occurred. It was simply the result of an effort to get off the car, and its happening no more tended of itself to prove that it occurred from a sudden starting of the car while plaintiff was attempting to alight therefrom than that it resulted from an attempt to do so while it was in motion. There was no question in the case but that plaintiff was injured while attempting to leave the car. The question was: How did it happen? Her injury alone could not raise the presumption of the negligence of defendant, because whether that injury was caused by the sudden starting of the car while plaintiff was in the act of alighting therefrom or not was the very question in the case. It was the crucial issue, and, before the jury would have been warranted in applying the presumption of negligence against defendant, it was necessary for it to determine that issue in favor of the plaintiff—to find that the car was in fact suddenly started by the employés of defendant while plaintiff was attempting to alight therefrom. Such a preliminary determination of the issue against defendant was the essential foundation upon which alone the presumption of negligence could arise, and the court should have so stated in its instruction to the jury. It should have instructed them that if upon this issue of fact between the parties, namely, whether the car did or did not start while plaintiff was attempting to alight therefrom, they found that it did so start, then that a presumption of negligence on the part of defendant arose, and the burden was cast upon it of showing that it arose from such cause which relieved it from responsibility for the injury to plaintiff. To instruct the jury that the mere fact of injury raised this presumption was to permit it to ignore the issue upon a finding of which, adversely to defendant, the presumption could alone be applied, and was for that reason error.

There were no other instructions given in the case under which it can be claimed that the error in giving this instruction was cured.

Counsel for respondents call our attention in their briefs to cases in which a similar instruction has been approved. MacDougall v. Central R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 431; Bush v. Barnett, 96 Cal. 202, 31 Pac. 2; Boone v. Oakland Transit Co., 139 Cal. 490, 73 Pac. 243; Kline v. Santa Barbara Ry. Co., 150 Cal. 741, 90 Pac. 125; Housel v. Pacific Electric Ry. Co., 139 Pac. 73. But in each of these cases it will be found on examination that there was no question but that the injury to the plaintiff was caused by collision or derailment of the car in which he was a passenger or while he was alighting from it. There was no issue in any of these cases as to how the injury occurred. Under such circumstances, the giving of the instruction was proper. But this is not the situation here. Here the essential fact in issue was: How did the accident occur? Was it through the act of defendant in starting up the car while plaintiff was attempting to alight, or did it result from an attempt on her part to get off while it was still in motion? And the vice of the instruction was in ignoring any necessity on the part of the jury of finding adversely to the defendant on this issue as a prerequisite to applying the presumption against it, but, on the contrary, instructing them that such presumption arose and could be applied simply from proof of injury sustained by the plaintiff.

The judgment appealed from is reversed.

HENRY DALTON & SONS CO. v. CITY OF OAKLAND. (S. F. 6343.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1914.)

1. Navigable Waters (§ 39*)—Littoral or Riparian Owners—Tide Lands.

A littoral or riparian owner of land on navigable tide waters has no right of access to the deep waters over intervening tide lands, and the state may, as against him, authorize a city, as its agent, to improve the tide lands in aid of navigation and commerce.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Navigable Waters, Cent. Dig. §§ 21, 53, 82, 103, 112, 117, 127, 239–244; Dec. Dig. § 39.*]

2. Navigable Waters (§§ 14, 37*)—Improvements—Authority of States.

In the absence of any legislation by Congress or acts by federal authorities, the states may improve their navigable waterways and harbors in subordination to the control of the general government over the subject; provided the improvement does not interfere with free navigation, or defeat any system for the improvement of navigation provided for by the federal government, and a state may grant tide and submerged lands to a city in trust to improve the harbor of the city in aid of navigation and commerce.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; William H. Waste, Judge.

Action by the Henry Dalton & Sons Company against the City of Oakland. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Z. N. Goldsby and H. D. Gill, both of Oakland, for appellant. Ben F. Wollner, of Oakland, for appellee.

LORIGAN, J. This action is brought by plaintiff as a private corporation and for its own benefit to enjoin the defendant from making certain proposed municipal improvements along its harbor in the bay of San Francisco. The complaint is in four counts, but a general statement of its allegations will present the grounds upon which plaintiff bases its right to relief.

It is alleged that plaintiff is the owner of a lot of land in the city of Oakland bordering on the line of ordinary high tide in the bay of San Francisco, in which the harbor of Oakland lies, as the line of said ordinary high tide existed in 1852; that upon this lot it has established and for many years past has conducted a large manufacturing plant and business; that extending seaward some 1,500 feet from said lot and in front of it is a strip of tideland alternately covered and uncovered by the daily and ordinary influx and reflux of the waters of the bay, over which for over 200 feet plaintiff has constructed and maintained a wharf and landing; that at high tides the waters covering said tidelands are not navigable for deep draft vessels, but at such tides light draft vessels may be navigated over them, and such are navigated and used by plaintiff in doing its shipping from said landing and wharf to and over the deep waters of the bay; that the defendant city of Oakland has exclusive jurisdiction, management, and control of the harbor of said city situated in said bay, and in contemplation of the development and improvement thereof has arranged for the establishment and construction of a system of municipal wharves and docks therein, together with the necessary adjuncts and appendages thereto to be constructed along its entire water front, and as an integral part thereof has arranged for and commenced the construction of a sea wall directly facing and fronting the land of the plaintiff and about 4,000 feet therefrom; that this sea wall, if constructed, will, in connection with other improvements already made in said harbor, present an impassable barrier and obstruction to the navigation from said waters of the bay shoreward from said sea wall, prevent access to and from the said land of the plaintiff by water, and deprive it of free passage to and egress from the navigable waters of said bay; that these acts done and threatened constitute a present and continuing nuisance specially injurious to plaintiff, and from which it has and will suffer great and irreparable injury, unless restrained by the court. The prayer was for an injunction restraining defendant from prosecuting such proposed improvement.

A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, without leave to amend, and from the judgment thereon entered in favor of the defendant the plaintiff appeals.

It will be observed that plaintiff does not claim any ownership in the tidelands in front of its property, nor that it possesses any franchise or permit granted it by the state or municipal authorities under which its wharf and landing over said tidelands were constructed. In fact, it is not questioned but that these intervening tidelands were granted by the state to the town of Oakland as part of its water front under the act of 1852 incorporating that town, subject only to the right of the public to use them for purposes of navigation and fishery, and charged with the public trust of improving said water front by the erection of wharves, docks, piers, and such other constructions in its harbor as are essential to facilitate and aid commerce and navigation therein. Oakland v. Oakland Water Front Co., 118 Cal. 160, 50 Pac. 277; Cimpher v. City of Oakland, 162 Cal. 87, 121 Pac. 374; Oakland v. Oakland

Water Front Co., 162 Cal. 675, 124 Pac. 251.

Further, by Act May 1, 1911 (St. 1911, p. 1258), the state in terms further granted to the city of Oakland the tide and submerged lands lying in front of the land of plaintiff and the deep waters of the bay in trust, and imposed on the city the duty of using said lands for the establishment, management, and conduct of a harbor and for the construction and maintenance thereon of wharves, docks, piers, slips, and other utilities and structures necessary or convenient for the promotion and accommodation of commerce and navigation. It is quite clear from the allegations of the complaint—in fact, is not questioned—that the improvements which the city of Oakland is making in its harbor are in discharge of the trust and duty imposed upon it under the acts of the Legislature and for the promotion of navigation and commerce therein.

[1] The theory under which appellant framed its complaint is that as a littoral or riparian owner of property fronting on the bay, and irrespective of who may be the owner of the tidelands lying between high-water mark and its deep waters, plaintiff by reason of such ownership of the upland possesses certain rights incident thereto, including the right to free and unobstructed access over such tidelands, to construct suitable landings thereon, and to enjoy exclusive occupancy thereof, subject only to the paramount public right of navigation; that the city has no right to erect structures, such as it contemplates, which will cut off access from the lands of plaintiff to the deep waters of the bay and destroy its right of navigation over them.

Counsel for appellant has discussed these propositions very thoroughly in his brief, citing cases which he contends sustain this position. Many of the cited authorities apparently do so, but they are cases which arose in other jurisdictions, where the laws relative to the rights of littoral or riparian owners on navigable waters are different from ours. Such rights depend upon the local laws of the different states, and if plaintiff possesses the littoral or riparian rights which it claims by virtue of the ownership of its upland lot, they must be found to be conferred under some law of this state. But under our laws plaintiff as littoral or riparian owner has no right of access as to the deep waters of the bay over intervening tidelands.

In People ex rel. v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 166 Cal. 627, 138 Pac. 103, decided since the appeal in this case was taken, this court had occasion to determine whether any such right existed in favor of a littoral or riparian owner, and it was decided that it did not. It was there said:

> "The defendants have a parcel of upland adjoining the tidelands in controversy, and they claim the right, as riparian proprietors, to wharf out and use the tideland in front of their upland for navigation in connection with the upland. It is settled by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of United States v. Chandler-Dunbar W. P. Co. [229 U. S. 53], 33 Sup. Ct. 667 [57 L. Ed. 1063], decided May 26, 1913, that when the riparian proprietor holds title to the soil under the water in front of his upland, and holds it by virtue of his riparian ownership in fee, such title is subject to the public easements of navigation and fishery; that when the public authorities see fit to make improvements on the land below high-water mark for purposes of navigation, the riparian owner must yield thereto; and that his right is subordinate to the public rights. There are many other decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States substantially to the same effect. Under these authorities it is apparent that the littoral rights of the defendants cannot impinge upon the control by the state of tide lands for the public purposes of navigation and fishery, or affect the public easement for those purposes."

We are not concerned here with what may be the rights of an upland proprietor to restrain a stranger from erecting structures upon intervening tidelands which will prevent his free access to the navigable waters. S. F. Sav. Union v. R. G. D. Petroleum Co., 144 Cal. 137, 77 Pac. 823, 66 L. R. A. 242, 103 Am. St. Rep. 72, 1 Ann. Cas. 182. We are considering only the complaint of the plaintiff against the action of the state, through its agency, the city of Oakland, in the erection of improvements on the tidelands within its harbor which will deprive it of such access. This the state had a right to do, even though this result followed, as it had equally a right to authorize the city of Oakland as its agency to do it.

[2] While the paramount right exists in the United States government under the provisions of the federal Constitution to regulate and control the improvements of navigable waters, still in the absence of any legislation by Congress or acts thereunder by the federal authorities the states have the right to improve their navigable waterways and harbors. The only limitation on this power is that it must be exercised in subordination to the control of the general government over the subject, and such local system must not interfere with free navigation or defeat any system for the improvement of such navigation provided for by such general government. County of Mobile v. Kimball, 102 U. S. 691, 26 L. Ed. 238; People v. Cal. Fish. Co., 166 Cal. 600, 138 Pac. 79.

Under these authorities there can be no question but that the state had authority to make the grants which it did of these tide and submerged lands to the city of Oakland in trust for the purpose of improving its harbor in aid of navigation and commerce, as there can likewise be no question but that the improvements which the city was making and contemplated doing by the scheme it had devised were such as were imposed on it by the act of the Legislature referred to and were designed to effect that purpose.

It is not questioned but that the improvements contemplated by the city in the harbor are projected in good faith or that they will not accomplish the purpose designed. If such improvements have the effect of cutting off access over said tidelands from the upland lot of the plaintiff, it is no ground of complaint, because, as pointed out, it had no right as an upland owner to the free and obstructed access to navigable waters over said tidelands as against the right of the state to at any time devote them to the improvement of the harbor of Oakland in aid of the public easement of navigation and commerce, or transfer them, as it did, to the city of Oakland, charged with the duty and obligation of doing so.

The judgment is affirmed.

TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. v. CALIFORNIA DEVELOPMENT CO. et al.

(L. A. 3690–3691.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 412*)—NOTICE OF APPEAL—AUTHORITY OF ATTORNEY—RATIFICATION.

Where attorneys in good faith, but erroneously believing that they had authority to appeal from a judgment against a corporation, served notice of appeal, such notice was ineffective to perfect an appeal for the corporation, nor could it be ratified by the corporation's board of directors after the time to appeal had expired.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 2135; Dec. Dig. § 412.*]

2. ATTORNEY AND CLIENT (§ 70*)—AUTHORITY—PRESUMPTIONS.

The fact that an attorney appears on behalf of a party raises a presumption of authority on his part to do so, but such presumption is disputable, and where it is fairly shown that the attorney was not authorized, the party for whom he assumed to act can found no rights on the attorney's unauthorized act.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attorney and Client, Cent. Dig. § 95; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. PRINCIPAL AND AGENT (§ 175*)—ACTS OF AGENT—RATIFICATION.

While ratification of an agent's unauthorized acts is ordinarily equivalent to a precedent authorization, no unauthorized act of such agent can be made valid retroactively to the prejudice of third persons without their consent, as provided by Civ. Code, § 2313.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Principal and Agent, Cent. Dig. §§ 662–668; Dec. Dig. § 175.*]

4. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 373*)—PROCEEDINGS TO APPEAL—REQUISITES—BOND.

No undertaking is required to perfect an appeal under the "new and alternative method" of taking appeals prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. §§ 941a, 941b, 941c, and this though the appellant may have attempted to follow the old method, if his proceedings were sufficient to perfect an appeal under the new method.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2001–2004; Dec. Dig. § 373.*]

5. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 428*)—PROCEEDINGS TO PERFECT APPEAL—UNDERTAKING.

In order to escape the necessity of serving notice of appeal and giving an undertaking, appellant must file his notice of appeal within the 60 days specified by Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, but if he allows that time to pass, he may still perfect an appeal, under the old method as prescribed by section 939, by serving his notice and giving an undertaking.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2166, 2167; Dec. Dig. § 428.*]

6. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 426*)—TIME TO APPEAL—NOTICE OF ENTRY OF JUDGMENT.

Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, authorizes the taking of an appeal within 60 days from and after notice of entry of the judgment appealed from has been served on the attorneys of record for the adverse party. Held, that the service of a notice of appeal was insufficient to show notice of the entry of judgment to the appellants so as to start the limitation so prescribed in motion, but that the service of written notice of the entry of the judgment appealed from must be actually made in order to have that effect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2151, 2162–2164; Dec. Dig. § 426.*]

7. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 417*)—TIME TO APPEAL — NOTICE OF ENTRY OF JUDGMENT — SERVICE.

Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, provides that an appeal may be taken by the appealing party filing with the clerk a notice stating that the party appeals to the Supreme or District Court of Appeals, which notice may be filed at any time after the rendition of the judgment, but must be filed within 60 days after notice of entry of judgment has been served on the attorneys of record appearing for the appealing party, except that if no notice of entry of judgment be given, the notice of appeal must be filed not later than six months thereafter. Held, that where more than 60 days prior to the filing of a notice of appeal by defendants, there was served on their attorneys a notice of appeal by intervener from parts of the judgment in the action, addressed to the clerk of the court and to all the parties, and directing them to take notice that intervener appealed from a certain portion of the judgment rendered in the action on January 4, 1912, and thereafter entered, such notice was sufficient to shorten the time, within which defendants might appeal, to 60 days under such section, though it was not intended primarily for that purpose.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2140–2143; Dec. Dig. § 417.*]

8. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 348*)—NOTICE OF JUDGMENT—TIME TO APPEAL—PARTIES.

Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, declares that the time to appeal from a judgment may be shortened from six months to 60 days by the service on the appealing party of a notice of entry of judgment. Held, that where notice of entry of judgment was served on defendants by intervener, such notice was sufficient to shorten defendants' time to appeal in favor of all the other parties to the action, and that the benefit of the notice was not limited to the parties serving it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1900–1904; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

9. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 384*)—UNDERTAKING ON APPEAL—SUFFICIENCY.

Where four parties defendant appealed jointly from a judgment, an undertaking on the part of the "appellant" that "said appellant" will pay all damages and costs that may be awarded on the appeal was fatally defective, since it was sufficient only to support the appeal as to one of the parties who could not be identified.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2049–2056; Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

10. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 384*) — APPEAL BOND—REQUISITES.

Where an appeal bond bound the surety to pay all damages that might be awarded against ———, it was fatally defective for uncertainty.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 2049–2056; Dec. Dig. § 384.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Walter E. Bordwell, Judge.

Suit by the Title Insurance & Trust Company against the California Development Company and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the development company and others appeal. On motion to dismiss appeals. Granted.

See, also, 164 Cal. 58, 127 Pac. 502.

Edwin E. Meserve, Shirley E. Meserve, Lewis R. Works, Works & Jordan, C. Hughes Jordan, and Eugene S. Ives, all of Los Angeles, for appellants. McCutchen, Olney & Willard and Page, McCutchen, Knight & Olney, all of San Francisco, and O'Melveny, Stevens & Millikin, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. Motions to dismiss appeals. The action is one to foreclose the lien of a mortgage or deed of trust made by the California Development Company to the Title Insurance & Trust Company, as trustee, to secure the payment of bonds issued by the development company. There was a judgment directing the sale of certain properties, and the payment, out of the proceeds of sale, of receiver's certificates, of the amount found due from the California Development Company to the plaintiff, and of certain judgments against said defendant and in favor of New Liverpool Salt Company and Southern Pacific Company, the balance, if any, to be paid to the California Development Company. The judgment further provides that all shares of stock of defendant Mexican Company held or claimed by defendants Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, Perry, and others are held in trust for California Development Company, and directs the indorsement and delivery to the commissioner named in the judgment of the certificates representing said shares, upon payment of one dollar per share. The judgment was entered on January 9, 1913.

A notice of appeal from said judgment was filed in the name of California Development Company. Another appeal, specifying certain parts of the judgment, was taken, or attempted to be taken, by Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry. The motions before us are directed to these appeals.

[1-3] The notice of appeal on behalf of the California Development Company was signed by Lewis R. Works and Works & Jordan, as attorneys for said defendant. One of the grounds of the motion to dismiss is that neither Mr. Works nor the firm of Works & Jordan ever had any authority from the California Development Company to represent it in said action or to give notice of appeal in its behalf. The evidence offered by the plaintiff in support of its motion to dismiss shows that the attorneys in question, while undoubtedly acting in good faith, were in fact without the authority which they believed they had, and which they assumed to exercise. This is not questioned by the attorney now representing the California Development Company. He attempts to meet the motion by showing that in October, 1913, some nine months after the entry of the judgment, and more than three months after the expiration of the right to appeal therefrom, the board of directors of the California Development Company adopted a resolution ratifying the act of Mr. Works and Messrs. Works & Jordan in filing the notice of appeal above referred to. The fact that an attorney appears on behalf of a party raises a presumption of "authority upon his part to do so." Garrison v. McGowan, 48 Cal. 592. But this presumption is disputable, and where it is clearly shown, as it is here, that the attorney was not authorized, the party whom he assumed to represent can found no rights upon the unauthorized act. The filing of the notice of appeal by the attorneys was not the act of the California Development Company, and that corporation, therefore, did not take an appeal within the time limited by law. The resolution of ratification cannot alter the situation. Ratification is ordinarily equivalent to precedent authorization, but "no unauthorized act can be made valid, retroactively, to the prejudice of third persons, without their consent." Civ. Code, § 2313. Thus, where a plaintiff sued, claiming under an assignment made by one who had no authority from the owner of the cause of action, it was held that a subsequent ratification did not relate back so as to defeat the defendant's attack upon plaintiff's right to institute the action. Wittenbrock v. Bellmer, 57 Cal. 12; Dingley v. McDonald, 124 Cal. 682, 57 Pac. 574. The present case is even stronger. With the lapse of six months from the entry of the judgment, the judgment became final as against all parties who had not appealed. No appeal had then been taken by California Development Company. The right of the successful parties to maintain the judgment against it could not be taken away by a subsequent ratification. To hold the contrary would amount to allowing this defendant to take an appeal nine months after the entry of judgment, whereas the statute clearly limits the right to six months. This court has no jurisdiction of an appeal taken too late, and the jurisdiction, once gone, cannot be revived by any act done after the expiration of the time limited. The purported appeal of the California Development Company cannot therefore stand.

[4] The motions to dismiss the appeals of Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry present different considerations. In these motions, originally made by the plaintiff, the defendant New Liverpool Salt Company and the intervener Boaz Duncan join. The dismissal of these appeals is based on the ground, among others, that no sufficient undertaking on appeal was filed. Since an undertaking is not required under the "new and alternative method" of taking appeals (Code Civ. Proc. § 941a, 941b, and 941c; Est. of McPhee, 154 Cal. 385, 97 Pac. 878; Mitchell v. Cal. S. S. Co., 154 Cal. 731, 99 Pac. 202; Union Coll. Co. v. Oliver, 162 Cal. 755, 124 Pac. 435), the want of an undertaking will not justify a dismissal if the steps taken to perfect the appeal complied with all the requirements of the new method. This is true, even though the appellant may have attempted to follow the old method. Theisen v. Matthai, 165 Cal. 249, 131 Pac. 747.

[5] But, in order to escape the necessity of serving notice of appeal and giving an undertaking, the appellant must file his notice of appeal within the time limited by section 941b. If he allows that time to go by, but is still within the time allowed under the old method (section 939), he must serve his notice and give his undertaking, as he was required to do when that method was the only one in force. Theisen v. Matthai, supra. The questions to be decided are: (1) Whether the notice of appeal was filed after the time allowed by section 941b; and (2) whether the undertaking filed by appellants was insufficient. Section 941b provides that the notice of appeal must be filed "within sixty days after notice of entry of said judgment * * * has been served upon the attorneys of record appearing in said cause or proceeding"—and, in the absence of such notice of entry, within six months after the entry. The notice of appeal of Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry was filed on July 7, 1913, or two days before the expiration of six months from the entry of the judgment. If notice of the entry had been served more than 60 days before July 7, 1913, the notice of appeal was filed too late to be effective under section 941b.

[6] The moving parties contend that the notice which started the running of the 60-day period was established in two ways. On April 5, 1913, the attorneys for Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry served on the attorneys for the New Liverpool Salt Company, and on the attorneys for Boaz Duncan, intervener, a notice of appeal from the judgment. The notice was never, however, filed. We think this act cannot be treated as establishing the notice which, under section 941b, starts the 60-day period running. Undoubtedly, a party who serves a notice that he appeals from an entered judgment gives thereby convincing evidence that he has knowledge of the entry of such judgment. And knowledge, for some purposes, is synonymous with notice. But section 941b does not provide that an appeal must be taken within 60 days after notice of the entry of the judgment or order. If this were its language, any evidence that the party in fact knew of the entry would be sufficient. In section 953a, dealing with the preparation of a record on appeal, it is provided that the party desiring to appeal must file his request for a transcript "within ten days after notice of the entry of the judgment, order or decree." Under this provision, notice of the entry, on the part of an appellant, is sufficiently shown by his service of a notice of appeal. Est. of Keating, 158 Cal. 109, 110 Pac. 109. But the 60 days for taking an appeal, under section 941b, runs from and after "notice of entry * * * has been served upon the attorneys of record * * * ." This implies, as is intimated in Estate of Keating, supra, "that the notice * * * contemplated is necessarily a notice in writing which may be served in the ordinary manner of serving a writing." Parol evidence that a party knows a fact, or his written statement from which such knowledge may be inferred, is not equivalent to service upon him of written notice of the fact. The construction of the statute thus suggested in the Keating Case has been definitely adopted in a later decision. Huntington Park I. Co. v. Park L. Co., 165 Cal. 429, 132 Pac. 760.

[7] In addition, however, to what has just been set forth, the moving parties show that more than 60 days prior to the filing of notice of appeal by Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry, there was served on the attorneys for said Heffernan and others a notice of appeal by Boaz Duncan, intervener, from parts of the judgment in the action. This paper was addressed to the clerk of the court and to all of the parties, and directed them to take notice that said Duncan appealed from a certain portion "of the judgment rendered in said action on the 4th day of January, 1912, and thereafter entered." Here was a written notice, duly served, advising the parties, through their attorneys of record, that judgment had been entered. The statute requires no more. It is immaterial that the notice was not intended, primarily, for the purpose of shortening the time within which the party served might appeal. The section (941b) gives him 60 days after he has been served with notice of the entry of the judgment. The purpose of the enactment evidently is that the full period of six months shall be allowed, unless knowledge of entry is brought home to the party by service of a notice in writing, stating the fact of such entry. If he is served with such notice, this purpose is fulfilled. He is bound by the law which limits his time of appeal to 60 days from notice of the fact of entry, and is not entitled to ask that the other party, in addition to giving him written information of the fact, shall also advise him of the consequences flowing from the notice, or shall embody the notice in a paper which has no other purpose than that of starting the 60-day period.

[8] It is suggested that only the party giving notice (i. e., Boaz Duncan) is entitled to rely upon it, and that the appeals should be dismissed, if they are to be dismissed, only as to him. We do not agree with this position. The statute declares that the time of appeal shall be 60 days after the party desiring to appeal has been served with notice of the entry. It proceeds upon the theory that 60 days is long enough, provided there be evidence, of a given kind, that the party knows of the fact which starts this time running. If the required notice has been served on him by any one, he knows that a judgment, from which he may appeal within 60 days, has been entered. If he desires to take advantage of the new method, he should then file his notice of appeal within the 60 days. He would be in precisely the same situation if every party served him with notice. To require such service, in cases where there are many parties, would introduce unnecessary complication to no purpose. If the different parties served notices at different times, the party served would have as many varying periods of appeal as there were parties, and this, although he takes his appeal as against all adverse parties by simply filing a notice, without serving it on any one. There is nothing in the statute to indicate that such repeated services must be made. It is held, accordingly, that when a party has once been served with notice of entry of judgment, he must, in order to avail himself of the new method, file his notice of appeal within 60 days after such service.

[9] The only question remaining is whether the appeals of Heffernan and others were properly taken under the old method. An essential part of an appeal under that method is the filing of a sufficient undertaking. The undertaking here filed, after reciting the judgment, and the intended appeal therefrom of Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry, goes on as follows:

> "Now, therefore, in consideration of the premises and of such appeal, the undersigned Pacific Coast Casualty Company, a corporation, * * * does hereby undertake and promise on the part of the appellant—that said appellant—will pay all damages and costs which may be awarded against ——— on the appeal, or on a dismissal thereof, not exceeding three hundred dollars, to which amount it acknowledges itself bound."

This bond is not in compliance with the statute. The four parties having appealed jointly, the undertaking should have been "on the part" of the four, and each of them. It is, however, merely on the part of "the appellant," and promises that "said appellant" will pay all costs, etc. Such an undertaking can support only the appeal of a single appellant (Zane v. De Onatavia, 135 Cal. 440, 67 Pac. 685), and as there is no way of determining which one is meant, all of the attempted appeals must fall.

[10] Furthermore, the surety promises to pay all damages that may be awarded against ———. Here again, is a fatal uncertainty. The surety is entitled to stand on the letter of its bond, and where it has not undertaken to do the thing required by the statute, the undertaking cannot be held sufficient.

The motions are granted, and the appeal of California Development Company, as well as the appeals of Heffernan, Flores, Rockwood, and Perry dismissed.

McDONALD v. McDONALD. (S. F. 6925.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 348*)—TIME TO APPEAL—ENTRY OF JUDGMENT—NOTICE.

Before respondent can invoke the limitation of 60 days to appeal prescribed by Code Civ Proc. § 941b, after service of notice of judgment, he must show that a formal notice of the entry of judgment has been actually served on appellant's attorney of record.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 1900–1904; Dec. Dig. § 348.*]

2. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 339*)—TIME TO APPEAL—STATUTES.

Civ. Code, § 131, provides that an appeal may be taken from an interlocutory divorce decree within six months in the same manner and with like effect as if the judgment were final. Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, declares that a person may appeal by filing with the clerk of the court in which the judgment was rendered a notice of appeal, at any time after the rendition of the judgment, but must be filed within 60 days after notice of entry of judgment has been served on the attorneys of record appearing in the case, and if no notice of entry of judgment be given, the notice must nevertheless be filed not later than six months after the entry of judgment, order, or decree. Section 939, subd. 3, provides that an appeal may be taken from an interlocutory judgment within 60 days after the judgment is entered in the minutes of the court or filed with the clerk. Held, that such latter section applied only to appeals under the "old method," in which case the appeal must be taken in 60 days, while Civ. Code, § 131, should be construed as fixing the maximum time at six months under the "new method," subject to be cut down to 60 days by the service of the notice of entry of judgment prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 941b.

Arthur Crane, of San Francisco, for appellant. James M. Hanley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. George McDonald, plaintiff and respondent, moves to dismiss the appeal of defendant from the judgment against her, and "from that part of the judgment being the intermediate order denying defendant's motion to set aside default."

The facts as disclosed by the certificate of the clerk and by respondent's uncontradicted affidavit are as follows: The judgment granting an interlocutory decree of divorce to plaintiff from defendant upon the ground of extreme cruelty was rendered on the 27th day of October, 1913, and entered in the appropriate judgment book of the county clerk's office on the following day. The notice of appeal was filed February 13, 1914. It is accompanied by no evidence of service upon the adverse party. On October 7, 1913, the court had entered the default of the defendant, and on the 15th of the same month, after a full hearing upon defendant's motion to set aside the default, the said motion had been denied. Defendant appeared personally with her counsel at the trial, introduced evidence in opposition to the allegation of the complaint, and her counsel examined and cross-examined witnesses. The bill of exceptions, signed by the judge who tried the cause, was filed November 10, 1913.

[1] It is contended by respondent that by filing her bill of exceptions the appellant waived notice of decision, and that as no notice of appeal of any sort was filed until more than 60 days had elapsed after the entry of the decree and after the proposed bill of exception had been filed and signed by the judge, defendant lost her right to appeal.

Respondent's first and most important contention is contrary to established authority. The actual notice of the entry of the judgment, if any there were, implied by the filing of the bill of exceptions on behalf of defendant, was not sufficient to meet the requirements of section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. Before respondent may invoke the limitation of 60 days contemplated by that section as the time within which, after notice of the entry of judgment, an appeal may be taken, there must be a formal notice of such entry actually served upon the attorney of record. Huntington Park Imp. Co. v. Park Land Co., 165 Cal. 430, 132 Pac. 760; Title Ins. & Trust Co. v. California Development Co. (L. A. 3690, 3691), 143 Pac. 723.

[2] Respondent cites section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, as limiting the time for appeal from an interlocutory judgment in an action for divorce to 60 days after the making and filing thereof, without reference to the service of notice of judgment. That section in its present form was passed in 1907. Since that time section 131 of the Civil Code has been re-enacted. Stats. of 1909, p. 941. The latter section, after declaring that an interlocutory judgment must be entered in every case in which the court determines that the divorce ought to be granted, provides that "from such interlocutory judgment an appeal may be taken within six months after its entry, in the same manner and with like effect as if the judgment were final." This is in accord with section 941b, Code of Civil Procedure, and if we should decide that section 939, Code of Civil Procedure, as amended in 1907, was intended as a statute of limitations applicable to the procedure permitted by section 941b, we would be compelled to hold that the later section of the Civil Code changed the period of limitation from 60 days to six months. If we regard subdivision 3 of section 939 as applicable only to appeals under the "old method," then all of the sections may be harmonized, for under such theory we have that section limiting the right to appeal from an interlocutory judgment under the "old method" to 60 days; and we also have section 131 of the Civil Code fixing the maximum time at six months under the so-called "new method" of appeal, subject to be cut down to 60 days, however, by the formal notice of entry of judgment permitted by section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. But in any view of the matter, the notice of appeal in this case, which was obviously intended to set in motion an appeal under the "new method," was not filed too long after the entry of judgment to give this court jurisdiction of the said appeal.

There is nothing in the opinion in Estate of Brewer, 156 Cal. 90, 103 Pac. 486, which at all conflicts with the conclusion reached in this case. The court was there considering an appeal in a special proceeding and it was held that the "new method" of appeal and the time within which an appeal might be taken as prescribed by sections 941a, 941b and 941c applied to probate matters only so far as the provisions of those new sections did not conflict with section 1715.

It follows that the motion must be denied; and it is so ordered.

2. COURTS (§ 212*)—APPELLATE JURISDICTION — PROSECUTION FOR VIOLATION OF ORDINANCE.

Const. art. 6, § 4, provides that the Supreme Court shall have jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered, and that the District Courts of Appeal shall have jurisdiction in criminal cases prosecuted by indictment and information in a court of record, except in criminal cases, where judgment of death has been rendered. Held, that where defendant electric company was prosecuted for violating a city ordinance requiring the sprinkling of tracks, and was fined $400, an appeal lay to the District Court of Appeal and not to the Supreme Court.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; J. W. Hughes, Judge.

Action by the People against the Pacific Gas & Electric Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Dismissed.

W. B. Bosley, of San Francisco, L. T. Hatfield, of Sacramento, and Thos. J. Straub, of San Francisco, for appellant. F. F. Atkinson and V. A. McGeorge, both of Sacramento, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. In this case the respondent moves to dismiss the appeal, on the ground that the Supreme Court has no appellate jurisdiction of the case.

The defendant was convicted in the police court of the city of Sacramento, of the offense of violating an ordinance of that city, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $400. The ordinance required every person or corporation operating a street railroad in the city to sprinkle with water a sufficient portion of the street in and near its tracks to prevent the motion of the cars from raising dust, and declared that a violation thereof should be a misdemeanor, punishable by a fine or imprisonment. The defendant owned and operated a street railroad in Sacramento. On appeal to the superior court of Sacramento county the judgment of conviction in the police court was affirmed. From this judgment of affirmance in the superior court, the defendant has attempted to take an appeal to the Supreme Court.

The jurisdiction of the Supreme Court and the District Courts of Appeal is prescribed by section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution. The portions thereof material to the question here involved are as follows:

"The Supreme Court shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases in equity, except such as arise in justices' courts; also, in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real estate, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, or in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to two thousand dollars; also, in all such probate matters as may be provided by law; also, on questions of law alone, in all criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered: * * *

"The District Courts of Appeal shall have appellate jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts in all cases at law in which the demand, exclusive of interest, or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars, and does not amount to two thousand dollars; also, in all cases of forcible and unlawful entry and detainer (except such as arise in justices' courts), in proceedings in insolvency, and in actions to prevent or abate a nuisance; in proceedings of mandamus, certiorari, and prohibition, usurpation of office, contesting elections and eminent domain, and in such other special proceedings as may be provided by law (excepting cases in which appellate jurisdiction is given to the Supreme Court); also, on questions of law alone, in all criminal cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record, excepting criminal cases where judgment of death has been rendered."

There is a corresponding provision relating to the original jurisdiction of the superior court, which is as follows:

"The superior court shall have original jurisdiction in all cases in equity, and in all cases at law which involve the title or possession of real property, or the legality of any tax, impost, assessment, toll, or municipal fine, and in all other cases in which the demand, exclusive of interest or the value of the property in controversy, amounts to three hundred dollars, and in all criminal cases amounting to felony, and cases of misdemeanor not otherwise provided for."

The section proceeds to enumerate other cases in which the superior court has jurisdiction, which it is not necessary here to mention. Article 6, § 5.

[1] One of the points urged against the validity of the judgment of conviction is that the ordinance of the city of Sacramento is unconstitutional. The contention of the defendant is that this claim brings the case within the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court because it brings directly in question the legality of a "municipal fine." It is argued that the term "municipal fine" as used in the constitutional provision above quoted includes fines imposed for a violation of a city ordinance. It has long been settled that actions of this character are criminal and not civil actions. Santa Barbara v. Sherman, 61 Cal. 57.

[2] Practically the same question that is involved here was before this court in 1866 in People v. Johnson, 30 Cal. 98, and was there decided adversely to appellant's contention. The defendant there was convicted in the court of a justice of the peace of the offense of unlawfully collecting toll without a license, which was declared by statute to be a misdemeanor. On appeal to the county court the conviction was affirmed. Thereupon the defendant undertook to appeal to the Supreme Court, claiming that the case involved the validity both of a toll and of a municipal fine within the meaning of the Constitution. The court held that it was not a municipal fine within the meaning of the Constitution. Taking up the question of jurisdiction upon the theory that it involved the legality of a "toll," the court, after quoting the constitutional provision then in force, which was in all substantial particulars identical with that now in force, said:

> "The power conferred in the foregoing language relates to four separate branches of the general subject, which are separately and specifically enumerated: (1) Cases in equity; (2) all cases at law of a certain character; (3) all cases arising in the probate courts; (4) all criminal cases of a certain grade. In view of this clear and precise division of the subject-matter, aside from the ordinary import of the words 'cases at law,' it is clear that those words refer only to civil as distinguished from criminal cases. Equity cases are first provided for, then civil cases at law, then probate cases, and lastly, criminal cases. That such is the true reading is made still more obvious by a reference to the sixth section of the same article, which defines the jurisdictions of the district courts, where the same language is used."

The sixth section referred to is substantially the same as the fifth section above quoted from our present Constitution.

We are entirely satisfied with the reasoning and decision in People v. Johnson. People v. Johnson was cited and approved in Wheeler v. Donnell, 110 Cal. 657, 43 Pac. 1. A similar question was decided in Matter of Curtis, 108 Cal. 661, 41 Pac. 793, declaring that the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in criminal cases extends only to those which are prosecuted by information or indictment. The decision in People v. Johnson had established the meaning of this clause in the Constitution of 1849 as embracing civil cases only, and the people, in the Constitution of 1879, adopted the same language to define the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. It must be presumed that this language was selected with knowledge of the construction which had been given to it, and with the intention that it should have the same meaning. Sharon v. Sharon, 67 Cal. 189, 7 Pac. 456, 635, 8 Pac. 709; People v. Edwards, 93 Cal. 153, 28 Pac. 831; People v. O'Brien, 96 Cal. 181, 31 Pac. 45; Morton v. Broderick, 118 Cal. 483, 60 Pac. 644; People v. Webb, 38 Cal. 477; People v. Coleman, 4 Cal. 50, 60 Am. Dec. 581. The question must be considered as settled.

The appeal is dismissed.

HINES v. BRODE. (L. A. 3252.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 3, 1914.)

1. FRAUD (§ 59*)—JUDGMENTS—MEASURE.

In an action for fraud in the sale of land, the measure of damages is the difference between the actual value of the property and its value if as represented, together with any depreciation in the value of improvements placed thereon by the purchaser, resulting from the fact that the land was not as represented, notwithstanding such damages may be greater than the consideration paid for the property; but this extreme rule will only be applied in clear cases and on just terms.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 60–62, 64; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

2. FRAUD (§ 33*)—DAMAGES—MEASURE—EXECUTORY CONTRACT.

The right to recover damages for fraud in the sale of land is not defeated by the fact that the contract for the purchase is executory; since the action is not upon the contract, but is collateral thereto.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Dec. Dig. § 33.*]

3. FRAUD (§ 31*)—NATURE OF ACTION.

Where a vendor has fraudulently misrepresented the land, the purchaser, on discovering the fraud, may either repudiate the contract and recover the consideration and other special damage sustained, or may affirm the contract whether it is executed or executory, and sue for the damages occasioned by the fraud; the affirmance of the contract not being an affirmance of the fraud.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. § 27; Dec. Dig. § 31.*]

4. FRAUD (§ 59*)—DAMAGES—MEASURE—EXECUTORY CONTRACT.

When a purchaser under an executory contract, who has paid only part of the purchase price, discovers that the land was misrepresented and elects to affirm the contract, he must, in an action for damages, show that he is ready and willing to complete the purchase, and the amount yet due under the contract should be deducted from the damages sustained.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Fraud, Cent. Dig. §§ 60–62, 64; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

5. PLEADING (§ 253*) — ADMISSIONS — COMPLAINT AMENDED AT TRIAL.

Where a complaint for fraud in the sale of land, which alleged that the defendant fraudulently misrepresented that there was a water right appurtenant to the land, was amended at the trial by inserting an allegation that there was no such water right, the failure to deny the new matter by filing an amended answer was not an admission of its truth; the allegation in the original complaint having been denied by the answer.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. T. Dooling, Judge.

Action by Thomas C. Hines against A. W. Brode. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

George H. Moore and Charles M. Ackerman, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. Kendrick & Ardis, of Los Angeles, L. L. Dennett, of Modesto, and W. C. Le Hane, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. By his action plaintiff sought damages for the deceit practiced upon him by defendant in the matter of an executory contract for the sale of land. The gravamen of plaintiff's complaint is as follows: He was induced to buy 40 acres of land in an arid district of Los Angeles county, upon representation by defendant vendor that there was appurtenant to this land water and a water right sufficient to raise by irrigation all ordinary crops. A written contract was entered into between the parties which fixed the purchase price of this 40 acres of land at $2,000; plaintiff agreeing to pay this amount in installments, with interest upon the deferred payments. He paid $250 upon the principal and $61.25 as interest. With the acquiescence of defendant, he entered upon the land and made improvements thereon before he discovered the falsity of defendant's representation in regard to the water right. The value of the land as represented by defendant, with the appurtenant water right, was $4,000. Without the water right it was $100. The value of the improvements placed by plaintiff upon the land, if it had possessed the water right, was $2,000. The value of the improvements, placed upon this arid land, was only $50. The written contract between the parties provided that plaintiff had the privilege to complete his payments and receive his deed and certificate of title at any time before maturity on paying the balance of the purchase price with interest. He alleges that upon September 28, 1911, he made an offer so to do in writing, but that defendant failed and neglected to comply with his offer. The complaint was verified upon the 29th day of September, the day after this offer was made, and was filed a few days later, upon October 2d. Another progress payment was due under the terms of the contract about a week after the date of the filing of the complaint. Plaintiff further alleged that he, "at the time of said offer to pay, ever since, and now, was and is ready, able, and willing to pay said purchase price upon the conditions in said contract until discovery of said fraud." As to the time of discovery plaintiff alleges that he learned of the falsity of the representations "within the last few days." As he verified this complaint upon the 29th of September and made his offer of performance on the 28th day of September, it is not to be questioned but that he knew of this asserted falsity at the time he made such offer of performance. He has remained, and still remains, in possession of the land under claim of right so to do, basing this claim of right upon the contention that, because of his offer of performance, he has fulfilled all the terms and conditions of his contract. He repudiates any suggestion that his action should be treated under these circumstances as an action for rescission, and with equal vehemence denies that, if his action be considered as in the nature of an affirmance of the contract, it is his duty to do any more than he has done. He laid his damages in the sum of $6,211.25, and by the verdict of the jury was awarded damages in the sum of $4,000. The somewhat surprising result of this litigation, therefore, is that plaintiff, having contracted to pay $2,000 for a piece of land, and having paid on account of the purchase price $311.25, gets the land, gets the improvements which he had placed upon the land, and gets $4,000 in money beside, or, reversing the statement, defendant, who sold the land for $2,000, gets $311.25, and is obliged to give up the land and $4,000 with it.

[1] If nothing else, the singularity of such a result challenges scrutiny. It should at once be stated, however, that the rule of damages in cases such as this, long announced in this state, and reaffirmed under review of the authorities in Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 383, 92 Pac. 1011, and in Betchel v. Chase, 156 Cal. 707, 106 Pac. 81, will in a proper case justify such an award as was here made. That rule declares that the measure of damages which a person is ordinarily entitled to recover in an action for deceit in the sale of property is the difference between the actual value of the property and its value had the property been as represented, and that the measure of recovery is not affected by the price paid. The price paid may be considered only as evidence of value. Therefore in a proper case a wronged plaintiff may assert, as here, and, if possible, show, that the actual value of the property was only $100, and that its value, if the property had been as represented, was $4,000. He may also show and recover for the depreciation in the value of the improvements which he may have placed upon the property —a depreciation resulting from the fact that the actual value was not the represented value; and he may also recover for any other legitimate expenditures he may have made. This is not only the rule in California, but it is declared to be the rule under the great weight of authority. The opposing rule is that which obtains in England and in the courts of the United States. That rule refuses to recognize as a legitimate element of damage the prospective profits which the vendee expected to make by his transaction. It points out that damages at law are compensatory merely (where not strictly exemplary), and make good to an injured party in terms of money the loss or injury which he has sustained, so that, if a vendee buys and pays $2,000 for a piece of land worth only $100, he may either by rescinding recover the $2,000 with interest for its detention, and thus be made whole, or he may retain the land worth $100 and recover back $1,900 of the purchase price, and thus be made whole. The authorities dealing with these two opposing views need not be cited. They will be found collated and discussed in George v. Hesse, 100 Tex. 44, 93 S. W. 107, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 804, 123 Am. St. Rep. 772, 15 Ann. Cas. 456; Tooker v. Alston, 159 Fed. 599, 86 C. C. A. 425, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 818; Stoke v. Converse, 153 Iowa, 274, 133 N. W. 709, 38 L. R. A. (N. S.) 465, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 270; 20 Cyc. 135; and in the notes to those citations. The conflict of authority upon the measure of damages in cases such as this is here adverted to for the purpose only of pointing out that the rule adopted in this state is the extreme rule, and it should therefore be applied only in clear cases and upon just terms.

[2] It has hereinbefore been said that such recovery may be had in proper cases upon proper showing. The cases generally, and, indeed, almost universally, are cases in which the defrauded party has executed the contract, has paid his price or consideration, and, electing to stand on his contract, and not to rescind, sues for damages for the deceit. The cases are such as this would have been had the plaintiff paid the $2,000 in full, and thereafter, upon discovery of the fraud, sought this recovery. The unusual feature of this case is that as to this plaintiff the contract is still in large part executory. He has paid but a trifling amount of the purchase price, and he is not aided by his pretended offer of complete performance. Pretended, we say, because the very pleading itself discloses and declares that plaintiff was not willing to perform after discovery of the fraud, and further that he made his discovery of the fraud before his offer. But, while the case in this respect is unusual, it is not exceptional. It is a principle of universal application that the right of action for damages for a fraud arises at once immediately upon the consummation of the fraud, and, of course, upon its discovery. The consummation of a fraud may arise in a contract executed or executory. But in either case the right of action immediately exists. This is so because even in the case of an executory contract the action for fraud is not upon the contract, but is collateral to the contract and is on the case. Whitney v. Allaire, 1 N. Y. 305; Allaire v. Whitney, 1 Hill (N. Y.) 484; Applebee v. Rumery, 28 Ill. 280; Eames et al. v. Morgan, 37 Ill. 261; West Florida Land Co. v. Studerbaker, 37 Fla. 28, 19 South. 176; Maxwell v. Sherman, 172 Ala. 626, 55 South. 520; 1 Page on Contracts, § 132; 20 Cyc. 92.

[3] But while such an action for deceit is not upon the contract, nevertheless it grows out of, and in that sense is founded on, the contractual relations between the parties. Therefore the nature and amount of a plaintiff's recovery must of necessity be controlled by the position which he takes in reference to that contract upon the discovery of the fraud. First, the vendee may rescind, and, in addition to the recovery of the consideration with which he has parted, obtain recoupment for any other special damage to which he has been subjected by the vendor's fraud. This he may do in every case where the contract is not wholly executed; and even where it has been executed by both parties, equity, if the facts will warrant, meaning hereby if no other innocent rights have intervened, may annul the contract for the fraud and restore the parties to their original position. In such a case, also, the vendee would have his action for damages for the deceit. The alternative to a vendee under such circumstances, and the only other course which he may follow, is that founded upon an affirmance of the contract. Here the vendee is obliged to accept the burden of the contract with its benefits, according to its terms, with the right to a recovery for the fraud based upon the fact that the benefits which he receives are not those which, under the representations of the vendor, he was entitled to receive. This last presents the usual situation in actions of this nature under executed contracts. Nor is it true that by an affirmance of the contract the vendee affirms the fraud. Such a declaration it will be impossible to find in any well-considered case. The true principle is well stated in Whitney v. Allaire, supra, as follows:

> "It is true that, if a party affirms a contract with knowledge of the fraud, he affirms it wholly, and this whether it is executory, or partially executed. But in neither case does he affirm it as a contract made in good faith. He consents to be bound by the provisions of the agreement, but does not thereby release or waive his claim for damages arising from a fraud collateral to the agreement."

That but one of these two courses and none other is open to a vendee under an executory contract, whether the vendor's wrong rests in fraud or breach of warranty, is not debatable under the authorities elsewhere as well as in this state. Gates v. McLean, 70 Cal. 42, 11 Pac. 489; Worley v. Nethercott, 91 Cal. 517, 27 Pac. 767, 25 Am. St. Rep. 209; Garvey v. Lashells, 151 Cal. 526, 91 Pac. 498.

[4] As it is humanly impossible for a man in the same breath to affirm and to repudiate an agreement, so is it legally impossible that he should have the same redress upon repudiation and rescission as upon acceptance and complete execution. It has already been pointed out that plaintiff's pleading in this regard is most anomalous. He begins his action for deceit upon an executory contract, as he has the unquestioned right to do. He does not repudiate and rescind, and protests against the contention that he is called upon to rescind. He does not affirm and express his willingness to complete his contract, but, to the contrary, expressly pleads that he was only willing to complete it up to the time of the discovery of the fraud. If he had executed his contract by the full payment of the $2,000, and then brought this action, the measure of damage and his consequent right of recovery would not for a moment be in question. It would be the measure of damage laid down by the trial court to the jury and hereinbefore declared. But what then would have been the precise situation? Plaintiff would have paid $2,000, and his recovery would have been the proved difference between the actual value of the land, pleaded as $100, and the value if the land had been as represented, pleaded as $4,000, with the additional loss which plaintiff had sustained in his proved expenditures by way of improvements, declared to be $1,950. But, under the case as presented by the pleadings and to the jury, plaintiff was entitled to this full recovery under an executory contract which he had not completed, which he refused to complete, and upon which he had paid but a trifling part of the purchase price. It is intolerable to think for a moment that in such a case the right of recovery to a man who has not completed his contract and declares his unwillingness to complete it by the payment of the money called for under the contract should be larger than that to a man who has fairly accepted the contract, parted with the full consideration called for by it, and seeks legitimate recoupment for fraud under a rule and measure of damage thoroughly well settled.

Little or no light upon the true measure of damages in such a case is afforded by the authorities. But three that have come under our observation seem even to have had the question in mind. In Whitney v. Allaire, supra, where the false representation was as to the value of a leasehold, with a rent charge fixed thereon in accordance with the represented value, it is said:

> "It is conceded that if the contract had been partly executed, even in the most trifling particular, the defendant would have the right to rescind and bring his action for the deceit, or affirm the contract and have his remedy by way of recoupment when sued for the rent."

That this is a fair and reasonable admeasurement of damage no one may question. In Applebee v. Rumery, supra, the plaintiff had given two promissory notes for the purchase of a horse which was diseased. He brought his action for damages for the deceit. The purchase price was $200. The damages laid for the deceit are not indicated in the opinion of the court. But it is said:

> "The gravamen of the action was the deceit and warranty, and the amount to be recovered was not the money paid, but the depreciation in value of the horse, in consequence of the disease, and it was no matter whether the consideration was more or less than $200, or whether it was paid down or not. * * * The amount, mode, or time of payment is not material, so as the sale was upon a sufficient consideration to sustain it. The giving of the two promissory notes was a sufficient consideration; nor could the defendant defeat the right of the plaintiff to recover by showing that the notes were still in his hands unpaid, though it may be that he might, upon a proper notice, bring the notes into court and offer to surrender them in mitigation of the damages to that extent, but we will not now affirm that even this could be done."

Here a determination of the question of affirmance or disaffirmance and of the right to reduce the award of damages by the value of the promissory notes is clearly avoided. In Williams v. McFadden, 23 Fla. 143, 1 South. 618, 11 Am. St. Rep. 345, the action was for deceit in the sale of land; the contract having been fully executed. The court declared the rule of damages to be that which, as above shown, has been adopted in this state. In the later case of West Florida Land Co. v. Studerbaker, supra, plaintiff's action was for deceit in the sale of lands. Plaintiff had paid the purchase consideration partly in cash and partly by his promissory note, which was unpaid. He affirmed his contract and sued for damages. The Supreme Court declared that, though the contract was executory in the sense that the full purchase price had not been paid, this fact did not bar the right of recovery, but further declared that:

> "Owing to the imperfect manner in which the facts of this case have been presented, we do not feel called upon to express an opinion as to the rule for measure of damages where the purchase price of the land has been only partially paid, and whether or not it would be the same announced in Williams v. McFadden, supra."

The foregoing presents all the light which we have been able to obtain from the adjudications, and it must be apparent that they are not even persuasive, much less conclusive.

Nevertheless we think the rule not difficult of determination. Where, under an executory contract, a plaintiff seeks recoupment in damages for deceit while affirming the contract (and it must necessarily be an affirmance if the action be not after rescission) it must be conclusively taken as to such plaintiff that he stands ready and willing to pay the full consideration called for by the contract, and that the damages which he is entitled to recover are no other and no greater than those which would be awarded to a plaintiff who had fully executed his contract. Therefore, in case of an executory contract, from the award which the jury may make because of the fraud must be deducted the unpaid part of the purchase price or the value of any other consideration. And to this effect the jury should be instructed.

Reference has been made to the peculiar form of the complaint in this case. It neither pleads in rescission, nor yet does it plead for damages after affirmance. Under the reversal of this case, which must be had, leave should be given to plaintiff to amend his complaint so as to state in understandable terms the position upon this all-important question which he elects to take and which, as has been said, can be only one of two—damages after rescission or damages after affirmance, with alleged and proved willingness and ability to perform the terms of the contract.

[5] But one other matter, and that a minor one, merits consideration. The trial court instructed the jury that "it is admitted by the pleadings in this case that the land described in the complaint did not have appurtenant to it a water right sufficient for irrigation." In the original complaint plaintiff alleged that defendant fraudulently represented and stated to the plaintiff "that the land had appurtenant to it a water right sufficient for the irrigation of the land for the raising of ordinary crops." Defendant denied that he "had fraudulently or otherwise made such representation." Upon the trial plaintiff introduced evidence in an effort to show that such a water right was not in fact appurtenant to the land sold. The court permitted an amendment of plaintiff's complaint to conform to the proof, which amendment was to the effect "that defendant has not now and never had any water right appurtenant to said land." This amendment so made was not in terms denied by any amendment to the answer, and respondent here urges that the instruction was justified because this failure so to deny by amendment to the answer was an admission of the truth. Such is not the rule of pleading in this state. Hedstrom v. Union Trust Co., 7 Cal. App. 278, 94 Pac. 386; Myers v. Holton, 9 Cal. App. 114, 98 Pac. 197; McDougald v. Argonaut, 117 Cal. 87, 48 Pac. 1021. The instruction should not have been given.

Wherefore the judgment and order appealed from are reversed.

HOBBS v. DAVIS et al. (L. A. 3254.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1914.)

1. MINES AND MINERALS (§ 104*)—INSPECTION BY STOCKHOLDERS.

A stockholder in a mining corporation has the right to examine the mining property of the company, including the right to be accompanied on such examination by an expert.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Mines and Minerals, Cent. Dig. § 228; Dec. Dig. § 104.*]

2. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§ 114*)—COMPLAINT—SUFFICIENCY—EXCUSE FOR DEFAULT BY PLAINTIFF.

In an action to enforce specifically a contract for the sale of mining stock to plaintiff, the payments therefor to be made at stipulated intervals, and time to be of the essence of the contract, allegations that the seller of the stock knew that plaintiff did not have the money necessary to pay the entire contract price, and that he could not secure it from the party with whom he was negotiating, unless his engineer could examine the mine and would verify a report of new discoveries of great value, that the seller stated that he could not grant permission to make the examination, but that plaintiff as a stockholder had a legal right to make it, and that thereafter the seller conspired with the other directors of the company to prevent plaintiff from making such examination before the first installment under the contract became due, does not show that plaintiff's failure to pay the first installment was due to the conduct of the defendant, since it did not appear that he did not have enough money himself to make that payment, nor that the engineer would have made such a report as would have induced the others to furnish the money to plaintiff, and therefore plaintiff's default is not excused.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 356–370, 372; Dec. Dig. § 114.*]

3. SPECIFIC PERFORMANCE (§§ 49, 51*)—CONTRACTS ENFORCEABLE — CONSIDERATION — ADEQUACY.

A contract for the purchase of mining stock of the value of $624,000 for the sum of $255,000, only $1,000 of which amount had been paid, is not just and reasonable, or founded on an adequate consideration, and therefore cannot be specifically enforced under Civ. Code, § 3391.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Specific Performance, Cent. Dig. §§ 140–151, 153, 154; Dec. Dig. §§ 49, 51.*]

4. ACTION (§ 50*)—PARTIES (§ 26*)—MISJOINDER—DAMAGES FOR BREACH OF CONTRACT.

A complaint against the seller of certain stock in a mining corporation, the corporation, and the directors thereof, to enforce specific performance of a contract for the sale of the stock, if treated as a complaint for damages for breach of contract by the seller, is demurrable for misjoinder of defendants, and for misjoinder of causes of action affecting some, but not all, of the defendants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Action, Cent. Dig. §§ 511–547; Dec. Dig. § 50;* Parties, Cent. Dig. §§ 32–34; Dec. Dig. § 26.*]

Shaw, J., dissenting.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; W. M. Conley, Judge.

Action by John H. Hobbs against D. A. Davis and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appealed to the District Court of Appeal, which affirmed the judgment. On rehearing, in the Supreme Court, judgment of the superior court and of the Court of Appeals affirmed.

J. W. McKinley and H. L. McNair, both of Los Angeles, and Thomas, Bryant, Nye & Malburn, of Denver, Colo., for appellant. Hunsaker & Britt, of Los Angeles, C. J. Willett, of Pasadena, and N. P. Moerdyke, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing of this case on appeal was ordered so that we might further examine the opinion of the District Court of Appeal. Some of the members of this court thought that the conduct of the vendor in preventing the vendee from examining the mine amounted to a violation of the agreement, upon the principle that written into every contract is the stipulation that the vendee may have all of his lawful rights and may exercise them in relation to the subject-matter of the agreement. A further study of the case and of the opinion of the learned District Court of Appeal of the Second District, written by Mr. Presiding Judge Conrey, convinces us that the above-stated principle was considered and observed by that court in its decision. But, even if we should eliminate from the case the discussion with reference to the allegations that plaintiff was excused from strict compliance with the contract in the matter of making payments on the purchase price of the stock at the dates specified in the writing, still we must hold that the demurrer was properly sustained because the pleading failed to allege facts showing that the contract was just and reasonable and founded upon an adequate consideration, and because, assuming that a cause of action for damages was stated, the complaint was demurrable for the reasons set forth in the last paragraph (3) of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal. We adopt that opinion, which is as follows:

"Demurrers of the defendants to the second amended complaint in this action were sustained without leave to amend, and thereupon the action was dismissed. The plaintiff appeals from the judgment.

"Plaintiff seeks a decree for specific performance of a contract for the sale to him by the defendant Davis of certain shares of stock in the Tom Reed Gold Mines Company, a corporation, and judgment for damages, if for any cause such specific performance cannot be had according to law. The contract in question, as well as a prior option hereinafter mentioned, was made between defendant Davis and one H. E. Fluke; but it is alleged that in all of the proceedings Fluke was acting as agent of the plaintiff, and that Fluke has assigned to plaintiff his interest in said contracts. On July 29, 1910, on payment of $1,000, an option in writing was executed between Davis and Fluke giving Fluke the right during the period of 30 days to purchase said stock at a stipulated price, but did not bind Fluke or the plaintiff to complete the purchase. On August 25, 1910, a written contract was executed between the same parties for the sale of the same stock at the same price, and therein it was specified that Fluke agreed to buy the shares of stock and pay the purchase price in specified installments, payable successively as follows: $25,500 on or before September 2d, $102,000 on or before October 2d, and $127,500 on or before November 1, 1910; the vendor acknowledging receipt of $1,000 on the first installment. Time was specified to be of the essence of the contract, and all sums paid on the contract were to be forfeited in case of failure of the purchaser to perform his agreement. Nothing was paid on the contract except the first $1,000. No offer to perform by paying the contract price, or any further portion thereof, was made until at least as late as March, 1911. The contract price amounted to about $1.23 per share, and it is alleged that the reasonable value of said stock on September 2, 1910, was, and ever since has been, not less than $3 per share.

"It is manifest that upon these facts alone the complaint could not state a cause of action. Assuming everything else in favor of the plaintiff, it would still be necessary that the plaintiff furnish a valid excuse for his failure to make the payments at the times named in the agreement. This he has attempted to do as follows: It is alleged that on the day prior to the date of making said contract of August 25, 1910, the plaintiff informed the defendant Davis that he had procured persons who were ready, able, and willing to furnish the money necessary for the purchase of said shares of stock; that the plaintiff also would join with said persons and furnish a portion of the said purchase money; but that said persons were unwilling to proceed with the matter unless time should be allowed in order to permit an examination of the mine of the defendant corporation to be made by plaintiff's engineer, nor unless certain discoveries of ore alleged to have been made since a prior examination made by the plaintiff in April, 1910, should, upon such new examination, be verified by said engineer. 'And said defendant Davis, at said interview, said that he, as a single director of the defendant company, had no right to agree on behalf of the said company to an examination of said mining property by plaintiff's engineer, but that plaintiff, as a stockholder of the defendant company, undoubtedly had the right to examine said property, that such right had never been questioned, and had been repeatedly exercised, and that there should be no objection raised to the making of such examination; and plaintiff said to defendant Davis that his engineer was ready to proceed at once to said mine for the purpose of examining the same.' The plaintiff then was, and for some time past had been, a stockholder in said corporation. Neither plaintiff nor said Fluke at that time possessed sufficient ready cash to pay the entire purchase price of said stock at the times fixed by said contract, and depended wholly for procuring the greater part of said money upon the said arrangements made with other persons to furnish the money, all of which was well known to defendant Davis. It is then alleged that defendant Davis, contriving to fraudulently defeat said sale and purchase and to prevent the plaintiff from obtaining the money necessary for the consummation by plaintiff of said purchase, attended a meeting of the board of directors of the corporation, 'in the latter part of August, 1910,' and procured and voted for a resolution by the board of directors forbidding the examination of the underground workings of said mine by the engineer selected by plaintiff, 'and postponing such examination to an indefinite future time'; that four other of the defendants, who were then directors of the corporation, combined and conspired with Davis, by preventing the examination of said mine by plaintiff, and by said resolution, to defeat the consummation of plaintiff's said contract and to divert the purchase of said shares from plaintiff to themselves. On August 25, 1910, plaintiff was advised by letter from the secretary of the corporation to plaintiff's engineer, and received by him after the making of the contract, of the action taken by the board of directors and of the company's refusal to permit at that time an examination of said mine to be made. The plaintiff immediately protested and represented to defendants his readiness to make immediate examination of the mine and to complete the purchase and pay the purchase price and the impossibility of completing said purchase until such examination was permitted. Nevertheless the defendants then, and at all times down to the filing of said complaint, persisted in refusing to give plaintiff access to said mine. Defendant Davis has repeatedly informed the plaintiff that he 'will not perform said contract or recognize the validity of the same.'

"Plaintiff's counsel do not contend that the facts stated in the complaint carry with them any right to vary, supplement, or depart from the written contracts, nor that there was any additional agreement on the part of the defendant Davis, nor that there has been any breach of such additional agreement. His position is that, by reason of the described acts of Davis done as aforesaid, the plaintiff was intentionally prevented from making payments at the time that they were due, and that for that reason prompt performance of the contract was excused, and that therefore plaintiff's right to insist upon performance of the contract by Davis was still in existence at the commencement of this action.

[1] "Plaintiff was entitled to examine the mining property of the company. This presumably included the right to be 'accompanied by his expert.' Hobbs v. Tom Reed Gold Mines Co., 164 Cal. 497, 129 Pac. 781, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1112. But this was his right as a stockholder owning other stock, and is a matter wholly independent of the contract between him and defendant Davis.

[2] "1. The plaintiff did not agree to pay the purchase price upon condition that he could inspect the property and if he could borrow enough money. His promise, as stated in his contract, is unconditional. The default of plaintiff took place on September 2, 1910, by nonpayment of the unpaid portion of the installment of $25,500. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff's statement to Davis was that others were to advance money to be used in this transaction, and that the plaintiff would also join with said persons and furnish a portion of said purchase money. The only claim made by him of inability to pay is that he did not have sufficient ready cash to pay the entire purchase price at the times fixed by the contract. The sale by Davis to other defendants herein of a portion of the stock is alleged to have occurred 'about the month of September, 1910.' There is nothing stated in the complaint from which it can be inferred that on September 2d the plaintiff was unable to pay the comparatively small amount of money that became due on that day. This being so, the defendants did not prevent the plaintiff from making that payment, and they did not cause him to be in default. It must be remembered that the contract is a contract of the plaintiff alone, and not of the persons who were to furnish him with funds; also that the excuse for nonperformance relied upon by plaintiff was solely based upon the proposition that the defendants, and in particular the defendant Davis, prevented plaintiff from performing his part of the contract. Even on his own theory of this case, it was his duty to meet the payment of September 2d, if he had ability so to do. He would not be excused merely because defendants' conduct with reference to his intended examination of the mine led him to believe that such conduct, if persisted in by them, would later prevent him from obtaining funds sufficient to complete his later payments. If he made the payment on September 2d and if defendant Davis, by conduct sufficient to furnish legal excuse to the plaintiff, should later prevent the plaintiff from paying the last two installments, plaintiff would in that event have ample protection at law with respect to his previous payments, as well as the right in equity or at law to enforce the entire contract.

"2. Provisions of a contract calling for payments strictly at a time specified 'cannot be applied where the efficient cause of the failure of the party seeking specific performance to comply strictly and literally with the contract was the conduct of the other party.' Cheney v. Libby, 134 U. S. 68, 10 Sup. Ct. 498, 33 L. Ed. 818; Houghton v. Steele, 58 Cal. 421; Antonelle v. Lumber Co., 140 Cal. 315, 73 Pac. 966; Griffith v. Happersberger, 86 Cal. 606, 25 Pac. 137, 487. Yielding full assent to this principle on which the plaintiff's case depends, it is clear that the conduct of the defendants herein was not the efficient cause of plaintiff's default on September 2, 1910. The default occurring as above stated has never been remedied by agreement or by anything in the subsequent conduct of the parties. It may also be observed in this connection that the facts alleged with reference to the persons who were to furnish funds to the plaintiff are that they would not furnish the money, unless after examining the mine the engineer should verify certain currently reported 'new discoveries of ore of great value' therein. It is not alleged that the plaintiff's engineer would have reported favorably. Even if the new discoveries had been 'of great value,' the value might have been less than sufficient to satisfy the engineer. Moreover, it is not alleged that if he had reported favorably said persons would have furnished the necessary money to enable plaintiff to perform the contract. Unless these results were certain, it is difficult to see how it could be held that the defendants prevented the payments from being made.

[3] "3. It does not appear that the contract was just and reasonable, or founded upon an adequate consideration. For this reason specific performance could not be enforced. Civ. Code, § 3391; Kaiser v. Barron, 153 Cal. 790, 96 Pac. 806. It is alleged that the stock of the corporation has no established market value. Therefore the allegations of value as made by plaintiff must relate to intrinsic value. One of these is that the reasonable value of the stock included in the contract was, on September 2, 1910, $3 per share, which amounts to $624,000; yet he was buying it for $255,000. The only other statement pertaining to value is that, in April, 1910, plaintiff's engineer had reported to him that the value of the property of the company was 'not sufficient to warrant the price fixed by said contract.' Plaintiff has paid nothing on this valuable and important contract, except the $1,000 paid out on the original option. It would seem that the price fixed by the contract of August 25, 1910, was grossly inadequate and, under the circumstances shown by plaintiff's complaint, he ought not to have affirmative relief in equity.

[4] "Being of opinion that the complaint does not state a cause of action, we omit any discussion of the grounds of special demurrer, further than to say that, if the stated case were to be treated as showing a cause of action for damages against defendant Davis, then the demurrers would have been properly sustained upon the ground of improper joinder of parties defendant, and upon the ground that the plaintiff improperly united alleged causes of action affecting some, but not all, of the defendants. But we agree with counsel for plaintiff in their statement that 'the whole frame of the bill of complaint is for specific performance.'

SULLIVAN, C. J., and ANGELLOTTI, J., do not participate in the foregoing.

SHAW, J. (dissenting). I cannot agree with the conclusion of the court in the foregoing opinion. The plaintiff and the defendant Davis were both stockholders in the Tom Reed Gold Mines Company. Under the law every stockholder has a right to inspect the mine. Both parties must be presumed to know this. The complaint shows that the defendant Davis knew that the plaintiff made the contract with the expectation of obtaining means of making payments by reselling the stock to other persons. By the contract $25,500 was due on the 2d of September, and a much larger sum—$102,000—on or before the 2d of October. Defendant knew that the plaintiff could not obtain the latter sum unless he was allowed to examine the mine to discover its condition before making a resale. The condition of the mine was such that if he examined the mine he would have been enabled to make a resale and could have completed the contract. All this was known to the defendant. With the fraudulent intention of preventing plaintiff from carrying out the contract, the defendant caused the company to immediately refuse to permit the plaintiff to enter the mine for examination. He did this to prevent plaintiff from carrying out the contract, and persisted in so doing until after the payment of September 2d became due, knowing and believing that by that means he would avoid performance of the contract. In my opinion, this was fraudulent, and constituted an estoppel against the defendant sufficient to to prevent him from now claiming that the plaintiff was in default for failing to pay the comparatively small amount due on September 2d. If the plaintiff had paid that amount, as it may be conceded he was able to do, he was confronted with the certainty that the refusal to permit him to examine the mine would prevent him from making the much larger payment due in October, and that he would thereby forfeit the money already paid. In my opinion, the defendant is in no position to claim the default which he himself has in this manner produced. I think the complaint states a cause of action.

GONYER v. WILLIAMS. (L. A. 3355.)

1. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 126*)—INSOLVENCY—CLAIMS—DEPOSITS.

Where a bank received on deposit a check on another bank, and immediately placed the amount thereof to the credit of the depositor, although the check was not presented to, or paid by, the drawee bank until the next day, at which time the former bank was in the hands of the state banking department, the crediting of the amount of the check to the depositor's account made the bank a general debtor to the depositor for that amount, not a trustee to collect.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 305, 309; Dec. Dig. § 126.*]

2. BANKS AND BANKING (§ 166*)—INSOLVENCY—CLAIMS—COLLECTION.

Where a bank had collected a draft, and, in accordance with universal usage, had transmitted its draft upon a New York bank to the remitter of the collected draft, the agency of the bank for the collection was changed into the relation of general debtor, and the remitter of the draft cannot recover the amount from the state superintendent of banking as trustee, after the draft drawn by the collecting bank was returned unpaid because of the insolvency of the bank.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Banks and Banking, Cent. Dig. §§ 574–578, 586; Dec. Dig. § 166.*]

3. CUSTOMS AND USAGES (§ 15*)—EXPLANATION OF CONTRACT—COLLECTIONS BY BANK.

The contract for the collection of a draft and the disposition of the proceeds thereof was one resting in general usage, and the usage was therefore admissible, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 12, providing that a usage is admissible to explain the true character of a contract which is not otherwise plain.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; Paul W. Bennett, Judge.

Action by D. J. Gonyer against W. R. Williams, as Superintendent of the State Banking Department of California. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Hiram W. Johnson, Jr., of San Francisco, and A. A. Deligne, of Sacramento, for appellant. T. N. Harvey and George E. Whitaker, both of Bakersfield, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This was an action against the superintendent of banks to recover the value of two checks and a draft received by the Kern Valley Bank just before it was closed by his order. The amount of one of the checks, $200, was paid by the defendant before the trial of the action. The court held that $300, the money represented by the other check, and $140, the proceeds of a certain draft, were held by the defendant in trust for the plaintiff. From this judgment defendant appeals.

[1] Plaintiff was on May 11, 1911, and for a long time theretofore had been, a depositor with the Kern Valley Bank. On the afternoon of that day he deposited with said bank a check for $300, drawn in his favor, and bearing his indorsement in blank. Before the close of business on that day, the books of the bank were posted and balanced, and the amount of the check was placed to the credit of the plaintiff, D. J. Gonyer. On May 12th, before the opening of the bank at 10 o'clock a. m., one of defendant's deputies entered the premises. Under his instructions the doors were opened as usual for business, but all deposits made during that morning were segregated and kept separate from the other funds of the bank. Shortly before noon the bank closed its doors, and subsequently all deposits made on May 12th were returned to the depositors. Before the doors were closed on the morning of May 12, 1911, the Bank of Bakersfield, on which the check for $300 was drawn, balanced its accounts with the Kern Valley Bank, with the result that the sum of about $1,300 was found to be due by the latter to the former.

While it is alleged by plaintiff and admitted by defendant that the Kern Valley Bank was in fact insolvent when plaintiff's check was deposited, there is neither allegation nor finding that such insolvency was known at that time to the officers of the bank. There is therefore no question in this case with reference to the fraudulent receipt by an insolvent institution of an amount tendered for deposit. Respondent's theory, which was accepted by the trial court, was that the function of the depositary was to collect from the Bank of Bakersfield the amount of the check and place it to the account of the depositor, and that, until such a transaction was consummated by the balancing of the account of the two banks, Mr. Gonyer did not become a general creditor of the Kern Valley Bank; and that, as the Kern Valley Bank was under the supervision of the state's superintendent of banks when the balance between the two institutions was sought to be figured, it was incapable of transacting business, and therefore no general deposit of the $300 was completed. We cannot agree with this theory of the transaction. The deposit of the indorsed check by Mr. Gonyer with the Kern Valley Bank, in the ordinary course of business, transferred the title to the instrument from him to the bank. The transaction was not one which created the relation of principal and agent but rather that of creditor and debtor. The matter of depositing checks and the ensuing rights and obligations was considered by this department in the case of Plumas County Bank v. Rideout, Smith & Co., 165 Cal. 137, 131 Pac.

360, 47 L. R. A. (N. S.) 552, a cause in which a hearing in bank was denied. On the authority of that case we must hold that the court erred in deciding that the sum of $300 was a trust fund held by the superintendent of banks for the benefit of the depositor. See, also, Newmark Grain Co. v. Merchants' National Bank, 166 Cal. 208, 135 Pac. 958.

[2] The plaintiff sued also on an assigned claim for $140. The history of the transaction out of which that claim arose is as follows: In the early part of May, 1911, the Kern Valley Bank received for collection from the Clauss-Shear Company of Fremont, Ohio, a draft on A. Weill for $140. This was presented and duly paid by the said A. Weill on May 11, 1911. The Kern Valley Bank, after deducting the usual charge for collection, prepared a draft upon its New York correspondent for the balance of the $140 and sent said draft to the Clauss-Shear Company. Before the last-named corporation could present the draft for collection, the Kern Valley Bank suspended business; the New York correspondent, therefore, refused to honor the draft, and it has never been paid. It was stipulated by the parties that the course pursued by the Kern Valley Bank was that usually followed by banking institutions in collecting drafts and remitting the proceeds.

The money was not a special trust fund, but the general assets of the bank were subject to the payment of the draft on the failure of its correspondent in New York to honor its paper. The owners of the money collected from Weill were therefore general creditors, and the court erred in finding that a part of the assets of the bank which passed into the hands of the superintendent of banks constituted a trust fund for the payment of the balance due from the bank as the proceeds of the collection. Nothing in Henderson v. O'Conor, 106 Cal. 385, 39 Pac. 786, is in conflict with the conclusion which we have reached here. In that case the draft was not collected until after the closing of the bank to which it had been entrusted for collection, and the money due that insolvent institution from its correspondent (including the sum received from the corporation against which the draft was made) was actually paid to the receiver after the insolvency. The money, therefore, had never come into the possession of the bank which, as the plaintiff's agent, had taken the draft for collection. Undoubtedly the Kern Valley Bank was the agent of the drawer for collecting the draft, but this relation was changed by the manner of remitting the proceeds of the collection to that of debtor. The rule is thus expressed in 5 Cyc. 516:

> "When paper is received for collection, a trust relation often exists in the beginning which is changed by agreement or custom into that of debtor and creditor after the collection of the proceeds. * * * The transformation does not affect the depositor unless it is known by him either by agreement or usage."

In the present case it was known by the plaintiff that it is the custom of banks to credit those sending drafts for collection with the proceeds of the paper after the money has been collected. Such, indeed, is the invariable custom, in the absence of a special agreement to the contrary (First National Bank of Circleville v. Bank of Monroe [C. C.] 33 Fed. 411), and the stipulation in the present case amounts to an agreement that the course followed by the Kern Valley Bank was the universal one in such cases.

[3] Respondent insists that the contract was complete without recourse to proof or stipulation as to custom (citing sudivision 12 of section 1870, Code Civ. Proc.). On the contrary, the contract was for the collection of the draft, and the manner of disposing of the assets was clearly one resting in general usage. Proof of such custom is admissible, and the general usage, when not in contravention of law, is of governing force. Davis v. First National Bank of Fresno, 118 Cal. 602, 50 Pac. 666.

> "When a draft is forwarded to a bank for collection and remittance, and collection is made, and the proceeds placed in the vaults of the bank, a draft for the amount, less charges for collecting, being forwarded for payment, such proceeds do not become a trust fund in the hands of the bank." Morse on Banks and Banking (4th Ed.) § 248, p. 482.

See, also, Bowman v. First National Bank, 9 Wash. 614, 38 Pac. 211, 43 Am. St. Rep. 870, which is practically identical in its facts with the case at bar.

It follows that the judgment must be, and accordingly it is, reversed.

A notice as follows: "Notice is hereby given pursuant to section 953a, Code Civ. 2. HOMESTEAD (§ 58)—ASSIGNMENT TO WIDOW—PROPERTY SUBJECT TO.

A lot without improvements except two small buildings, neither fit for a dwelling place, may not be set apart as a homestead to the widow of the deceased owner under Code Civ. Proc. § 1465, providing for the setting apart of exempt property, though the deceased husband had, a few months before his death, removed from the lot a small dwelling house with the intention of building an apartment house thereon, and to live in one of the apartments, and was endeavoring at the time of his death to arrange for the construction of the building.

3. EVIDENCE (§ 541*)—FOREIGN LAW—COMPETENCY OF WITNESS.

Under Code Civ. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; W. R. Guy, Judge.

In the matter of the Estate of Frank R. Faber, deceased. From an order setting apart to Mildred Faber, widow of the deceased, a parcel of land as homestead, Mary E. Suffal appeals. Reversed.

Edward T. Lannon and Mannix & Lannon, all of San Diego, for appellant. Gordon L. Gray, of San Diego, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from an order setting apart to Mildred Faber, the widow of decedent, a parcel of land belonging to the estate, as homestead.

[1] The respondent moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that no sufficient notice of appeal has been filed. The opening part of the notice of appeal shows the defect relied on. It is as follows:

> "Notice is hereby given, pursuant to section 953a, Code of Civil Procedure, to all persons concerned that the undersigned Mary E. Suffal, desires to appeal and does hereby appeal to the Supreme Court from the order," etc.

We deem this a sufficient notice in substance, although it is not in good form. It differs from the notices of appeal held insufficient in Lent v. California, etc., Ass'n, 161 Cal. 719, 121 Pac. 1002, Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 299, 122 Pac. 461, and Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 695, 130 Pac. 430, in this: That it expressly states that Mary E. Suffal "does hereby appeal" from the order, etc., describing it with sufficient accuracy. The notices in the cases cited did not contain any equivalent language, but were plainly phrased for notices to the clerk to prepare the transcript, as provided by section 953a. This notice expressly states that the petitioner does appeal, and it is therefore good as a notice of appeal under section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. The fact that it is drawn so as to serve the double office of a notice of appeal and a notice to the clerk, under section 953a, as appears from the subsequent parts of the notice (not above quoted), does not destroy its effect as a notice of appeal, nor is the statement that it is given "pursuant to section 953a" fatal to its sufficiency as a notice of appeal. That phrase may properly be deemed applicable solely to the subsequent part constituting a notice to the clerk, or as mere surplusage. It could not have misled the parties interested and, under the rule prevailing since the enactment of section 941b, such faults do not vitiate an appeal. S. R. Co. v. Superior Court, 167 Cal. 250, 139 Pac. 71. The motion to dismiss the appeal is denied.

[2] The main objection to the order appealed from is that the land set apart as a homestead had no building or structure upon it that could be used as a dwelling house, either at the time of decedent's death, or thereafter up to the time of making the order. We think this objection is well taken. The land consisted of a lot in the city of San Diego. It had no improvements upon it, except two small buildings, which the petitioner herself designated as "shacks." One of them was scarcely large enough to inclose an ordinary buggy, the other was used as a garage. The petitioner testified that neither of them was fit for a dwelling place.

The question of the power of a court to set apart such property as a probate homestead is settled by the decision in Estate of Gallagher, 134 Cal. 96, 66 Pac. 70. In that case the property involved was farming land upon which the decedent and his wife, the petitioner, had at one time resided in a house situated thereon. This house, some two or three years before his death, was destroyed by fire. From that time until his death there was no building upon the land that could be used as a dwelling, and the decedent and his wife resided elsewhere. She offered to prove that if the court should set off the land to her as a homestead she would erect thereon a dwelling house and reside in it. This court held that this testimony was properly rejected. Upon the merits, it was decided that the authorities in this state establish "the rule that a probate homestead cannot be carved out of a tract of naked agricultural land having upon it no dwelling house or qualities of a home," and that the court below was right in refusing to set apart the land as a homestead. This is in harmony with the declaration in Estate of Noah, 73 Cal. 593, 15 Pac. 292, 2 Am. St. Rep. 834, that the superior court "would be justified in refusing to set apart land as a homestead, unless it were made to appear that there was thereon an edifice that could be used as a dwelling." See, also, In re Sharp, 78 Cal. 485, 21 Pac. 182.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The same principle applies here. The lot in question was no more suitable for a home than was the farming land applied for in the Gallagher Case. The purpose of the widow, in that case, to build a dwelling on the land, if it had been awarded to her, was declared to be insufficient to authorize such award. There is no suggestion in the case at bar that the petitioner intends ever to build a dwelling house on the lot or to occupy it as a home. There is evidence tending to show that the decedent intended to build an apartment house on the lot and to live in one of the apartments after the house was erected, that preparatory to carrying out this intention, he had, some three or four months before his death, removed from the lot a small dwelling house thereon, and that, shortly prior to his death, he was endeavoring to arrange for the borrowing of sufficient money with which to build the house, and was having plans therefor drawn by an architect. But it also appeared that these plans were conditional upon the uncertain event of his ability to borrow the money necessary for that purpose. No definite arrangement had been made therefor. This may have been entirely immaterial in any event, but it is, at all events, not sufficient to show that the lot was in any legal sense the residence of the decedent, or capable of being used as a residence at the time of his death. It remained in the same condition up to the time of making the order. An unexecuted and conditional intent to fit a place for residence, such as here appears, is not sufficient to justify a court in setting it apart as a probate homestead under section 1465 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The case cannot be distinguished from the Gallagher Case above cited so far as that point is concerned. It follows that the court erred in setting apart the property to the petitioner as a homestead.

[3] Some question arose upon the trial concerning the character of the property, whether it was community property or separate property of the decedent. As there may be another trial below, we deem it advisable to notice a ruling upon the admission of evidence upon the subject. The claim of petitioner was that the money with which the decedent purchased the lot was earned by him while he was residing in the city of Constantinople in Turkey, after her marriage, and that therefore it was community property. The contestant, on the other hand, claimed that the funds which paid for the lot were obtained by him by descent from his brother and were his separate estate. The contestant endeavored to prove that, under the law of Turkey, there was no community property, and that all property accumulated in Turkey by the husband became his separate estate. She called a witness who testified that he had been a factor engaged in selling and buying property in Smyrna, which is in the empire of Turkey; that the law of Turkey required that he should be licensed to carry on that business; that he held such license; and that in order to hold the same it was necessary that he should be familiar with the laws of Turkey governing property rights, both real and personal. Thereupon he was asked whether or not he was familiar with the laws of the empire of Turkey regarding property rights. The court sustained an objection to this question, and refused to allow him to testify further on the subject, basing the ruling upon the proposition that the laws of a foreign country cannot be proven by the testimony of a witness who was not engaged in the practice of the law therein. In this we think the court erred. Section 1902 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that:

> "The oral testimony of witnesses skilled therein is admissible as evidence of the unwritten law of a sister state or foreign country."

It does not declare that such witness must be engaged in the practice of the law in such country, or as a professor of law therein. It is sufficient if it appears that he was skilled therein. The witness in question testified that it was his duty as an officer to become familiar with the laws of Turkey regarding property rights, both real and personal. He was not allowed to proceed to testify whether he was familiar with such laws, or to testify concerning the law itself on the subject in question. We think this testimony was admissible. If it should appear that he was skilled therein, the objection that he was not a lawyer, or a professor of law, would go to the weight of his testimony, and not to its competency.

The order appealed from is reversed.

PEOPLE ex rel. HUBBARD v. LOS ANGELES RY. CORPORATION. (L. A. 3302.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 1, 1914. Rehearing Denied Oct. 31, 1914.)

1. Street Railroads (§ 60*)—Franchise—Forfeiture for Noncompletion — Effect on Completed Portion.

A franchise ordinance for the construction of a street railroad line, which provided that if the road was not fully completed and in operation within 18 months after the passage of the ordinance the franchise should be forfeited as to the uncompleted portion thereof, and the acceptance of the franchise by the company and the payment of a valuable consideration therefor, constituted a contract that the grantee of the franchise might abandon the uncompleted portion, and that the abandonment would be accepted by the council under the provisions of Civ. Code, § 502, that a failure to complete within the time required works a forfeiture of the right of way and of the franchise unless the uncompleted portion is abandoned in writing by the grantee of the franchise with the consent of the authorities granting, and therefore the failure to complete the entire line does not affect the validity of the franchise for the portion completed within the time fixed.

2. JUDGMENT (§ 735*) — CONCLUSIVENESS — MATTERS NOT IN ISSUE.

A judgment declaring the forfeiture of the franchise for the portion of the line not constructed within the time specified, where the pleadings raised no issue as to the validity of the franchise for the other portions of the line, is not conclusive as to such validity, although some of the language in the opinion on appeal was broad enough to include that portion.

3. STREET RAILROADS (§ 60*)—FRANCHISES—CONSTRUCTION — EXTENSION OF TIME FOR COMPLETION.

A subsequent ordinance extending the time for the "completion of the lines" did not destroy the privilege granted by the earlier ordinance to abandon the unused part of the route.

4. STREET RAILROADS (§ 61*)—FRANCHISES—CONSTRUCTION—ACTS OF PARTIES.

Nor did the attempt of the predecessor in interest of the present holder of the franchise to construct a railroad along the portion forfeited, though inconsistent with the claim that the original ordinance contracted to abandon the uncompleted portion of the railroad, divest the title of the street railroad company to the completed portion.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Quo warranto by the People of the State of California, by U. S. Webb, Attorney General, on the relation of A. A. Hubbard, against the Los Angeles Railway Corporation. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed, with instructions.

Gibson, Dunn & Crutcher, of Los Angeles (Edward E. Bacon, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Emmet H. Wilson, of Los Angeles, amicus curiæ, supporting appellant. George Cryer, Chas. S. Burnell, and John W. Shenk, City Atty., all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This action in the nature of quo warranto was instituted for the purpose of having a judicial declaration that the defendant was usurping and unlawfully exercising the franchise of maintaining tracks for its street railway along portions of San Pedro street in the city of Los Angeles, and that the said defendant had forfeited its right to operate its road or to maintain tracks along any part of the route described in that certain ordinance of the city of Los Angeles known as "Ordinance No. 4240 (New Series)." Judgment was given in favor of the plaintiff, and defendant appeals from said judgment.

The essence of the judgment was that by its failure to complete the construction of its tracks over the entire route described in Ordinance No. 4240 within the time prescribed therein and in a later ordinance by which an extension of time was granted, defendant ipso facto forfeited its right to maintain tracks upon any portion of said route. The facts are stipulated, and so far as they are necessary to the decision of this case are as follows:

On May 11, 1897, Ordinance No. 4240 (New Series) was passed and it was approved on the same day. It granted to John C. Lynch, his successors and assigns, a franchise to build and operate a line of street railway along a route—

> "commencing at a point in the east line of Main street 30 feet north of the north line of the Pico House block, and running thence easterly along the Plaza to the center of Los Angeles street; thence southerly on Los Angeles street to First street; thence easterly on First street to San Pedro street; thence south along San Pedro street to its intersection with Stanley avenue; thence southerly along Stanley avenue to the southern city boundary."

Section 4 of the ordinance was as follows:

> "The above rights and privileges are granted upon the express condition that work on said road shall be commenced within six months, and the whole thereof completed within eighteen months, from the date of the passage of this ordinance. It being understood that, if said road is not fully completed and in operation within said time, then this franchise shall be forfeited as to the portion thereof uncompleted; and in case any portion of said road is unused and unoperated with reasonable service for one month, then that part of the road shall become forfeited and become the property of the city."

By section 6 it was provided that the grantee of the franchise on and after the completion of the road, "or any portion thereof, and the operation of the same," should issue and receive transfers to and from its other lines. The time for completing the work was extended by Ordinance No. 5381 (New Series) to expire May 12, 1899. No part of the road described in Ordinance No. 4240 was completed prior to the date last mentioned except that portion along San Pedro street between Fifth and Thirtieth streets, a distance of about one mile. This road was regularly operated by Lynch and his successors until May 1, 1903, when defendant's predecessor in interest, the Los Angeles Railway Company, commenced the extension of its road on San Pedro street and Park avenue (the new name for Stanley avenue) from Thirtieth street to the terminus described in Ordinance No. 4240. A portion of this extension was actually constructed when the city, acting through its agents, prevented further prosecution of the work. Thereupon the Los Angeles Railway Company commenced an action against the city of Los Angeles to restrain that municipality from interfering with its work of construction and operation of its road south of Thirtieth street and under protection of a restraining order completed its tracks to the terminus described in Ordinance No. 4240.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

On the hearing in the superior court of the railroad company's action, the restraining order was dissolved and judgment was entered for the defendant. Plaintiff appealed, and, pending the determination of the cause on appeal, entered into a contract with the city whereby, on payment of a certain monthly sum, the railroad company was permitted to occupy and use that portion of the route south of Thirtieth street on San Pedro street and on South Park avenue north of Slauson avenue. On appeal the judgment of the superior court was affirmed. Los Angeles Railway Co. v. City of Los Angeles, 152 Cal. 242, 92 Pac. 490, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1269, 125 Am. St. Rep. 54.

It was also stipulated that the portion of the road first constructed under the authority of Ordinance No. 4240 had always been operated as a part of a general system, and that by transfers and without extra charge passengers living near parts of the proposed route upon which no tracks were constructed prior to May 12, 1899, were taken to points conveniently near to their places of residence. Neither the city nor its agents ever declared the franchise granted by Ordinance No. 4240 was forfeited until the city attorney in the answer filed by him in the suit by the railway company against the city asserted that such forfeiture had occurred. After the decision of the railway company's suit in the superior court, the city attorney suggested that an action be commenced by the city for the purpose of forfeiting the entire franchise sought to be granted by Ordinance No. 4240, and he drew a recommendation and resolution to that effect which he presented to the city council. This was referred to the appropriate committee, and that committee rendered the following report:

> "It appears to your committee that at the time this franchise was granted in 1897 there must have been grave doubts in the minds of the mayor and council, as well as Mr. John C. Lynch, as to the propriety of building this road to the extreme southerly limits within the limit specified as a business proposition, for they at that time, by mutual consent, inserted the provision in the franchise, that has never before nor since been incorporated in a railway franchise in this city, that if the whole line was not completed within the time limit, the franchise for only that portion uncompleted should be forfeited. Your committee believes that, regardless of any advantages that we might attempt to avail ourselves of through the courts in the way of technical law points in the state Code bearing on this case, there was a very clear and definite understanding between the city, through its officials, on one side, and the purchaser of this franchise, on the other, as to the conditions expressed therein, and one which it is the plain duty of this council as their successors to carry out. We therefore recommend that this council shall decline at this time to instruct the city attorney to take any legal action with a view to seeking a forfeiture of the franchise in question."

On November 6, 1905, the committee's report was adopted by the city council and spread upon the minutes of its meeting of that date.

Shortly after the decision of this court in Los Angeles Railway Co. v. City of Los Angeles, the said company made application in writing to the city council to advertise for sale a franchise for a street railway over the portion of the route of the former franchise which had been in controversy in the injunction suit. The city attorney reported against such a course, stating his opinion that the whole of the franchise sought to be granted by Ordinance No. 4240 had been forfeited. However, the city council proceeded to advertise and sell the franchise for a street railway commencing at Thirtieth and San Pedro streets, and running thence over the southerly portion of the route designated in said Ordinance 4240. This franchise was duly granted by Ordinance No. 16320, and was assigned to defendant herein, but upon a referendum to the electors of the city the ordinance was rejected.

The stipulation contains reference to great expenditures made by the defendant and its predecessor in the way of taxes, paving, reconstruction of tracks, etc., induced by a belief, fostered by the conduct of the city, that a franchise had been regularly and effectively granted by Ordinance No. 4240 (New Series) to the railway company to occupy that portion of San Pedro street between Fifth and Thirtieth streets.

Appellant's first contention is that its demurrer should have been sustained because of the provisions of subdivisions 1 and 2 of section 340 of the Code of Civil Procedure and of section 343 of the same Code; but we need not discuss this matter, because we are of the opinion that on the merits the judgment ought to be reversed.

[1] Appellant insists that the franchise ordinance, together with the written acceptance thereof, which was shown by the stipulation of facts, constituted an abandonment in writing by the grantee, and a consent to such abandonment in writing by the governing body of the city, within both the letter and intent of section 502 of the Civil Code. We fully agree with this contention. Section 502 of the Civil Code is in part as follows:

> "Work to construct the railroad must be commenced in good faith within not more than one year from the date of the taking effect of the ordinance granting the right of way, and said work must be completed within not more than three years after the taking effect of such ordinance: Provided, that the governing body of such municipal corporation at the time of granting said right of way shall have the power to fix the time for either the commencing or completion, or both, of said work; not, however, to a time less than six months for commencing, and not less than eighteen months for completing the same. A failure to comply with either of the foregoing provisions of this section, or with either of the provisions of the ordinance granting said right of way, works a forfeiture of the right of way, and also of the franchise, unless the uncompleted portion is abandoned by the person or corporation to whom said right of way is granted, with the consent of the authorities granting the right of way, such abandonment and consent to be in writing."

Under the authority of this section the city council fixed a shorter time for the commencement and completion of the work than that named in the statute itself. This right to shorten the time is correlative with the power of the city council to waive forfeiture of a franchise. No time is fixed by the statute for the abandonment of the uncompleted part of the right of way and the acceptance by the city of the finished portion. We can easily imagine conditions in which such abandonment might be sought during the progress of the building of the railroad by a grantee of a franchise who would foresee the impossibility of finishing the work on time, and we can also see that in proper cases a city council would grant the requested relief. So, too, a grantee, having used his best efforts during all of the time allowed in the ordinance for the completion of the work, might with propriety, in some cases, ask and obtain permission to abandon the uncompleted portion of the right of way theretofore given him, and thereby retain the franchise for that part over which his tracks had been constructed. But why may not a city council, in advance of any construction of tracks at all, agree with the grantee that all parts of the right of way not used at the expiration of the time limit prescribed by the ordinance shall be abandoned, and that the franchise shall be in full effect as to the constructed portion? The franchise and the written acceptance thereof constituted a contract between the city and Mr. Lynch. He had paid $5,000 for the privilege granted. The city said, in effect:

> "If you will be satisfied with less territory for your tracks than we have allowed you, then we shall be satisfied with the more limited service, provided you will abandon the unused portion of your right of way."

And they contracted accordingly. The same result might have been obtained by the grant of a number of franchises for short spaces along the proposed route of the railway each with the same time limit. At the expiration of the prescribed period all of these spaces upon which tracks were built and in use would be protected by franchises, and the right of way over the unused spaces would have lapsed. The city council chose to adopt the more logical and direct method permitted by section 502 of the Civil Code.

[2] But respondent insists that the judgment in the case of Los Angeles Railway Company v. City of Los Angeles concludes and estops appellant in all matters urged as a basis of its present right to occupy any portion of the route described in the original ordinance. It is true that in the complaint in that action the railroad company averred its ownership of the entire franchise over the designated route, and defendant therein, the city of Los Angeles, denied the company's ownership of a franchise to operate its road over any part of the said right of way by reason of the failure of Lynch or his assigns to complete the work of constructing the road. But this pleading did not necessarily put in issue the ownership of the entire franchise. The decision by the superior court, which was affirmed by this court, referred only to the pretended right of the railway company to extend its tracks along San Pedro street south of Thirtieth street—territory upon which it had failed to build during the period delimited by the two ordinances. Whether or not the railway company possessed a vital franchise to operate its road between Fifth and Thirtieth streets on San Pedro street was a question not necessarily involved in that litigation. Certainly it was not a question which was there decided. We must hold, therefore, that the decision of this court in the 152d volume of the California Reports did not estop the railway company from asserting ownership of a franchise to operate its road between Fifth and Thirtieth streets on San Pedro street.

Respondent cites authorities to the effect that where the subject-matter of two litigations is the same the second is governed by the decision of the first. There can be no doubt of the existence of this rule, but we cannot concede that the forfeiture of the entire franchise was involved in the former action. Respondent quotes the following language from the decision in the former case (152 Cal. 244, 92 Pac. 491, 15 L. R. A. [N. S.] 1269, 125 Am. St. Rep. 54):

> "The question whether the superior court erred in dissolving the temporary injunction and denying a permanent injunction depends mainly upon the further question whether the franchise of plaintiff was forfeited ipso facto by its failure to complete the road within the time limited by the grant. The respondent claims that it was so forfeited under the provisions of section 502 of the Civil Code."

But we must remember that the court was considering, not the long-constructed, long-used, and long-taxed portion of the road, but that part which was built long after the expiration of the time granted by the city council. Counsel for respondent insist that the quoted language applies to the entire franchise, and must necessarily so apply because, as they assert, "the law makes no provision for a forfeiture of a part of a franchise"; but the law does make just such provision when the assent of the city council and the grantee concurs. In the case from which counsel quote there was no question of the interpretation of the contract between the city and Mr. Lynch, whereby it was agreed that both parties would assent to a franchise covering the part of the road which should be built during the time limit granted by the council. This court had its attention directed to that part of the franchise which, in any view of section 502 of the Civil Code, must be regarded as forfeited for nonuser. This is shown by the following language in the opinion:

"It follows from this conclusion that the plaintiff, having forfeited its right to use or occupy the street which it had left vacant for four years after the expiration of the time limited for the completion of its road, had no more right to lay its track there than one who had never been granted a right of way."

[3] But respondent makes the point that Ordinance No. 5381 (New Series) extended the time of the city's grantee only for the "completion of said railway lines," not for the completion of such part as the grantee might see fit to build. To hold that the quoted language destroyed the privilege granted by Ordinance No. 4240 (New Series) of abandoning the unused part of the route would be to give to it a narrow and technical meaning surely not contemplated by its authors. The purpose of the latter ordinance was merely to amend the earlier one in the matter of time and nothing else. Indeed, that was the only particular in which it could, under the statute, amend the earlier enactment. To be sure the ordinance specified the time for the "completion" of said lines, but their construction over a part of the contemplated route was clearly a "completion" in view of the terms of the original agreement.

[4] There can be no doubt that the attempt, on the part of appellant's predecessor, to build its road on San Pedro street south of Thirtieth street was inconsistent with the claim now made that the corporation had abandoned that portion of its franchise, but the fact that the predecessor of one of the parties now in interest committed an unlawful act would not justify a construction of the ordinance contrary to its plain terms. If a valid title to the franchise for the road constructed prior to May 11, 1899, vested at once in the grantee, that title could no more be divested by an unlawful attempt four years later to build on the abandoned right of way than it could be by an effort of that corporation to lay its tracks upon some totally different street upon which it never had any color of right to place its rails.

Our conclusion that by the very terms of Ordinance No. 4240 (New Series) and the written acceptance thereof the grantee obtained a franchise for the portion of the road constructed within the time limit makes it unnecessary to examine appellant's contention that the city by its conduct in taxing the railroad company, by requiring the corporation to construct a portion of the paving along the line of its tracks, by its own interpretation of the original ordinance (exhibited in the adoption by the city council of its committee's report), and by numerous other acts estopped itself from attacking the franchise of appellant. We may say, in passing, however, that these considerations appeal strongly to our sense of equity.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the superior court to enter a judgment confirming appellant's franchise in and to that part of its road on San Pedro street between Fifth and Thirtieth streets in conformity with the provisions of Ordinance No. 4240 (New Series) of the city of Los Angeles.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

RAYMOND et al. v. HILL. (L. A. 3335.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1914.)

1. Trial (§ 203*)—Instructions—Evidence—Applicability.

The court, in giving its instructions, must state the law on any reasonable theory of the case, supported by evidence, and need not model its instructions solely on the evidence of plaintiff.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 477–479; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

2. Highways (§ 184*)—Injuries to Pedestrian — Instructions — Evidence — Applicability.

Where, in an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by an automobile, the evidence of plaintiff showed that she was unaware of the approach of the automobile until she was struck by it, and the evidence of defendant showed that she suddenly became aware of the proximity of the automobile and in her terror rushed from a place of safety into one of danger, an instruction that the act of a pedestrian in running in front of an automobile as the result of terror caused by the sudden discovery of the automobile near her does not necessarily show contributory negligence was authorized by the evidence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 471–474; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

3. Trial (§ 191*)—Instructions — Misleading Instructions.

An instruction, in an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by an automobile, that pedestrians having in general, and under reasonable restrictions as to exercise of care by them, a right to travel anywhere on a public highway, and it is negligence for a driver on a public highway to recklessly run on a pedestrian who is standing or walking with his back toward him, is not objectionable as imputing reckless driving to defendant, and correctly states the law, holding one responsible for injuries which he may inflict by the reckless driving of a vehicle.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Trial, Cent. Dig. §§ 420–431, 435; Dec. Dig. § 191.*]

4. Highways (§ 173*)—Law of the Road—Statutory Provisions.

St. 1905, p. 816, requiring drivers of motor vehicles to pass to the right of an approaching person, and to give reasonable warning of the approach, and use every reasonable precaution, and requiring drivers approaching any person from the rear to pass to the left, is but declaratory of the common custom of the state, and requires vehicles generally to use the right-hand part of the highway, but does not prevent one using the left part of a highway where he cannot cross to the right-hand side, and negligence may not be predicated merely on such use, provided the roadway is of ample width to permit that use with safety to pedestrians, and a clear passage to approaching vehicles.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 459, 460; Dec. Dig. § 173.*]

5. Highways (§ 168*)—Law of the Road—Right of Pedestrians.

Pedestrians may use and traverse a highway at all its points, being chargeable only for the exercise of due care, measured by the use which they actually make of the highway, and this rule applies to city streets without reference to the amount of travel thereon.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 456, 457; Dec. Dig. § 168.*]

6. HIGHWAYS (§ 176*)—CARE REQUIRED OF PEDESTRIANS.

A pedestrian is under no obligation to look back to see whether he is in danger of being struck by an automobile approaching from the rear.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 465; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

7. HIGHWAYS (§ 176*)—CARE REQUIRED OF TRAVELERS.

While a pedestrian and a driver of an automobile thereon are charged only with the exercise of the same degree of care, the driver must, as required by St. 1905, p. 818, give reasonable warning of his approach and use every reasonable precaution to insure safety, and in the exercise of every reasonable precaution the driver approaching pedestrians, and particularly women, must have his car under such control that it may be promptly stopped, and the sounding of the horn and the noise of the muffler cutout are not sufficient.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 465; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

8. HIGHWAYS (§ 184*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—NEGLIGENCE.

Where, in an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by an automobile, there was evidence that defendant approached from the rear with horn blowing and with muffler cut-out roaring, but that plaintiff and her companions were, through preoccupation, unaware of the presence of the automobile until it was just behind them, and that plaintiff was frightened and rushed in front of the automobile, the issue was whether the driver used every reasonable precaution to insure the safety of plaintiff up to the moment she was struck, and if he did, the accident was either inevitable or attributable to the negligence of plaintiff, defeating a recovery.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. §§ 471–474; Dec. Dig. § 184.*]

9. HIGHWAYS (§ 176*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—NEGLIGENCE.

A driver of an automobile overtaking pedestrians must, to escape liability for striking any of them, make certain that they are aware of his approach, and that he is at such a distance from them as to avoid running over them in a sudden panic from a surprised knowledge of his unexpected approach, and the automobile must be under such control that it may be stopped promptly, and a driver doing these things is relieved from liability, though injury to a pedestrian results, for the injury must result only from the pedestrian's own negligence.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Highways, Cent. Dig. § 465; Dec. Dig. § 176.*]

10. HIGHWAYS (§ 184*)—INJURIES TO PEDESTRIANS—EVIDENCE—INSTRUCTIONS.

Where, in an action for injuries to a pedestrian struck by an automobile running on the left-hand side of the highway and approaching from the rear, there was evidence that the pedestrian was unaware of the approach of the automobile until she was struck by it, and also evidence that she suddenly became aware of the proximity of the automobile, and in her terror rushed from a place of safety into one of danger, and that the driver could not cross over to the other side, and the court merely gave general instructions to the effect that the operator of an automobile approaching a pedestrian must give reasonable warning and use every reasonable precaution to insure safety, refusal to charge that defendant was rightfully on the left-hand side of the roadway, and that if he used every reasonable precaution in his power, and the pedestrian notwithstanding ran into the automobile, there could be no recovery, was reversible error.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; M. P. Conrey, Judge.

Action by Lutie Raymond and another against Frank C. Hill. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Reversed.

Geo. S. Hupp, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Newmire & Morris, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought by Lutie Raymond and her husband, Harry Raymond, to recover damages for injuries inflicted upon the former. The complaint charged that Lutie Raymond was injured by the negligent act of the defendant in carelessly and recklessly causing an automobile driven by himself to strike Lutie Raymond, inflicting upon her specified injuries for which compensation was sought. Trial was had before a jury, which brought in a verdict in favor of plaintiffs in the sum of $2,000. Judgment followed. Defendant moved for a new trial, and from the order denying his motion and from the judgment, he prosecutes this appeal.

The accident happened upon North Lake street, a public highway of the county of Los Angeles. North Lake street runs north and south. At its northern end Sans Souci avenue, running east and west, crosses it. The middle portion of North Lake street from Sans Souci avenue southward was occupied by an electric railway, and was impassable to vehicles because of construction work which the railway company had under way. Plaintiff and her husband, with two companions, Mr. and Mrs. McMillan, were walking in a southerly direction on the eastern portion of the roadway of North Lake street. The two women were walking together, as were also the two men. The women were six or eight feet ahead of the men. They all were walking upon the westerly or street railroad side of the easterly half of North Lake street, Mrs. McMillan being nearest to the railroad tracks, the plaintiff Lutie Raymond walking at her left side. Defendant, Hill, driving his automobile, and accompanied by his wife and Mr. and Mrs. Mathews, turned into North Lake street from Sans Souci avenue on the east, and, desiring to go south upon North Lake street, and being unable to cross North Lake street at Sans Souci avenue, turned southward upon the eastern half or division of that street. They thus traveled some 400 or 500 feet, passing several different parties who were walking upon the highway, until they approached the pedestrians composing plaintiffs' party. The accounts of the accident as given by plaintiffs' party and by the occupants of the automobile are in sharp conflict, indeed in amazing conflict. The plaintiff, Mrs. Raymond, testifies:

> "The first thing I knew I was struck in the back—it seemed to me I heard a horn blow just at the time it struck me, but I didn't hear anything until it struck me, and I didn't know anything more until they picked me up. I don't remember hitting the ground—all I know was when it struck me that I felt the lick and the horn at the same time; that is all I know."

Her husband's testimony is to the following effect:

> "The first intimation I had of the presence of the automobile was when it struck my wife. I saw no automobile or heard any sound until the automobile struck her."

Mrs. McMillan declares:

> "The automobile was almost on us before we heard the noise, and I heard it just a little bit and turned and looked, and it struck her just then and hit her and carried her in front of the automobile. We didn't hear the sound of any horn. The front of the automobile hit her in the back and hip. It was not the fender that hit her."

Mr. McMillan adds this:

> "I did not hear any automobile horn. The first thing I saw was Mrs. Raymond going round in the air on the side of the automobile."

The testimony of the automobile party is that they proceeded south on North Lake street slowly and with great caution, keeping to the extreme easterly side of the roadway, and repeatedly sounding the automobile horn and keeping open the muffler cutout, which produced a loud roaring sound of the engine. They discovered the Raymond party at least 100 feet before they reached them and kept the muffler cut-out open continuously, and sounded the horn at least three or four times as they slowly approached them from behind. The horn was last sounded as the automobile came opposite to the men, who, as has been said, were some 6 or 8 feet behind their wives. The immediate circumstances of the accident are thus told by defendant Hill. Having testified to the facts above narrated and to the further fact that the roadway was about 15 feet wide, that he was traveling as near as possible to the eastern gutter, and in the course he was pursuing would have passed the Raymond party with at least 6 feet of space between, he says:

> "I passed Mr. Raymond about 6 feet distant. Just as I got about opposite the men my horn was sounded again, and then Mrs. Raymond threw out her hands and ran to the east, directly in the path of my machine, or that would have been my path if I had continued on my course. She had given some indication of hearing my horn by turning to the left. She threw out her arms this way, and got her head down and ran across the road as hard as she could. Just as she started I put on my brake and steered to the left, and she ran into the side of the front fender a foot or 18 inches back of the front end of it. My machine had practically stopped running at the time she struck, but the back end skidded off into the gully, which was on an incline from the roadway. From the time I applied my brake to the time I stopped the machine did not travel over 6 feet. * * * Mrs. Raymond ran into the machine with her hands up and tried to push herself away from the machine; she then turned around and sat on the running board between the two fenders, and from there sat down upon the ground."

Mr. Mathews testifies:

> "But just as we got up to the party Mrs. Raymond looked around and saw the machine and ran into the side of the front fender. At the moment Mr. Hill saw her starting to run he put on the brake and the machine skidded to the east, and the rear wheels went into the gutter. As she hit the fender she turned around and sat down on the running board and then fell to the ground."

Mrs. Hill declares:

> "As we passed the men and repeated our warning Mrs. Raymond suddenly turned around and jumped and ran into the road to her left, and we veered off as far as we could to the left and she ran into the side of the front fender."

And Mrs. Mathews add this in corroboration:

> "When we got even with the men Mrs. Raymond turned around and then started to run right toward the left of the road, and Mr. Hill immediately put on the brake, veered to the left, and stopped the machine, and by that time Mrs. Raymond had gotten right up to the machine. She ran into the front fender, and the impact of touching the machine pushed her back and she kept going back to back fender and sat down on the running board, and as the rear wheel skidded into the ditch, Mrs. Raymond slid off and sat on the road."

[1, 2] Appellant's first complaint is that the court gave certain instructions touching the conduct of a person suddenly faced with an imminent danger. Thus the court declared:

> "You are further instructed that the act of a pedestrian on a public highway in running in front of an automobile, as the result of fright or terror, caused by the sudden discovery of the automobile near him, or by a noise caused by the automobile, does not necessarily constitute contributory negligence on his part, or, in other words, if the act of the defendant caused fear and loss of presence of mind on the part of the plaintiff, so as to impel her to rush into danger, as stated before, her mere error or mistake of judgment in so acting shall not be taken by you to be contributory negligence on her part."

It is not questioned but that this instruction is unimpeachable in point of law. Schneider v. Market St. R. R. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734. But it is insisted that the giving of the instruction was erroneous and injurious, since under the testimony of the plaintiffs themselves and all of their witnesses to the accident, there is not the slightest evidence to show knowledge upon the part of Mrs. Raymond of the presence of an imminent or of any danger, her testimony being, as above quoted, that the first thing she knew was that she was struck in the back. It is unquestionably true that the testimony of plaintiffs and of plaintiffs' witnesses, if that testimony controlled the discretion of the court in the matter of giving instructions, would render such an instruction as this entirely foreign to the case, and perhaps injuriously erroneous under the authority of such cases as Hanks v. Naglee, 54 Cal. 52, 35 Am. Rep. 67, and In re Calkins, 112 Cal. 305, 44 Pac. 577. But the court was not under duty to model its instructions solely upon the evidence given on behalf of plaintiff. Its duty was to give instructions expounding the law upon any reasonable theory of the case finding support in the evidence. When the testimony on behalf of defendant is considered, it will be noticed that Mrs. Raymond suddenly and seemingly in a panic rushed blindly to the left and into the automobile. The very circumstances of the accident as related by defendant's witnesses lend weight to the argument that she suddenly became aware of the proximity of an automobile, and in her terror, not pausing to determine its location and direction, endeavored to get off the street, and so rushed from a place of safety into one of danger. Under this view of the evidence, which was a permissible one for the jury to take, the instructions complained of were pertinent and apposite.

[3] The court further advised the jury in the following language:

"Pedestrians have in general, and under reasonable restrictions as to exercise of care by them, a right to travel anywhere upon a public highway, and it is negligence for a driver of a vehicle upon a public highway to recklessly run upon a pedestrian who is standing or walking with his back toward him."

Appellant complains that this instruction imputes reckless driving to the defendant. This in fairness cannot be said. The instruction states an unimpeachable proposition of law, holding responsible for the injuries which he may inflict the reckless driver of a vehicle. Nor, however foreign to the facts appellant may think this instruction to be, it is neverthless true that it was addressed to an allegation of the complaint and to the testimony touching reckless driving which plaintiffs and their witnesses offered.

With these exceptions, the instructions given by the court are unchallenged, and it may be added that they are fair and dispassionate instructions. One of the appellant's principal grievances, however, is over the court's refusal to give certain proposed instructions which he insists were pertinent and even necessary to a fair consideration of the case by the jury. One of these instructions was to the effect that if "defendant Hill gave sufficient warning of his approach, and that the said Lutie Raymond knew of the approach of defendant's automobile, and in spite of said knowledge attempted to run toward said machine, the said Lutie Raymond was guilty of such negligence as contributed to the injury, and you should find for the defendant." Another was in the following language:

"The court instructs the jury that if they believe from the evidence that at the time of the accident the defendant, Hill, was driving his automobile in a careful and prudent manner, and if the jury further believes from the evidence that defendant, Hill, saw the plaintiff in front of him, and that she was then walking close to the track, and not in a line directly in front of said automobile, the said Hill had the right to assume that the plaintiff would continue on in the same direction in which she was then going, and had the right to assume that she would not turn to the left so as to be in front of the automobile, and you are further instructed that if you believe from the evidence that the plaintiff Lutie Raymond did turn toward the left without stopping and looking around to see if vehicles were coming up behind her, then she was guilty of such contributory negligence as will defeat her right of action herein, and your verdict should be for the defendant."

Additionally, the appellant requested the court to give the two following instructions:

"The court instructs the jury that the plaintiff in this action cannot avail herself of the mere fact that the defendant was on the wrong side of the road, inasmuch as she herself was on the wrong side of the road, and she cannot be heard to complain of the defendant doing an act which she herself was doing, and the jury is instructed that under such circumstances no presumption is to be raised against this defendant in this action."

"You are instructed that both the plaintiff and defendant were traveling lawfully and rightfully upon the east side of North Lake street, and each had an equal right to be on the east side of the street."

As has been said, the instructions which the court gave were unimpeachable in point of law. They were, however, in their nature general instructions, to the effect that a person operating a motor vehicle and approaching another walking on a highway must give reasonable warning and use every reasonable precaution to insure the safety of such person. Further, that if the plaintiff—

"was guilty of any act of negligence which directly contributed to her injury, or was guilty of any lack of ordinary care on her part, whether the act be an active one or an omission to do what she ought to have done under the circumstances, and such lack of care, act, or omission contributed to the accident, and without which the accident would not have occurred, then you cannot go further and apportion the accident or injury, but the plaintiff's contributory negligence in such case defeats recovery, and your verdict must be for the defendant."

The gravamen of appellant's complaint is that no specific instructions, touching the right to use the highway as it was being used by the parties to the litigation, or governing the question of Lutie Raymond's negligence in doing what defendant's witnesses testified she did do, were given by the court. As to the last specification of error, it is pointed out that while the jury was told in effect that the conduct of Lutie Raymond, if occasioned by sudden fright or terror, "did not necessarily constitute negligence on her part," the court refused to tell the jury, as requested in the first of the rejected instructions above quoted, that if the defendant exercised due care in operating his machine, and that, notwithstanding this, Lutie Raymond placed herself in a position of peril and was injured therefor, she could not recover.

[4] To the proper consideration of appellant's grievance, a word must first be said touching the use of highways. So long continued and universal is the custom in California for approaching vehicles or pedestrians to pass to the right, and to pass to the left where the approach is made from behind another vehicle or pedestrian, that it may be said to be a part of our common law. In this state the custom, in part, has been crystallized into statute law. Stats. of 1905, p. 816. This law declares it the duty of the drivers of all motor vehicles to pass to the right of an approaching person or vehicle and to "give reasonable warning of its approach and use every reasonable precaution to insure the safety of such person or animal." Section 3, subd. 3. In the same way it is declared the duty of the driver of the motor vehicle to pass to the left on approaching any person or other vehicle from the rear. The effect of these laws, as well as the universal custom, is to prompt vehicles generally to use the right-hand portion of the highway. But this does not mean that where one seeks to enter upon a highway under the circumstances depicted in the evidence of defendant, they must abandon the highway because the vehicle cannot cross to the right-hand side. It was legally permissible for the defendant to use the easterly or left-hand side of the highway as he undertook to use it, and no negligence could be predicated merely upon such use, it appearing that the roadway was of ample width to permit that use with safety to pedestrians and a clear passage to approaching vehicles.

[5] As to foot passengers, the old common-law rule declaring the King's highway to be "fair and free" has not been modified in this state by any positive enactment. So that it still remains the law that foot passengers have the right to use and traverse the highway at all its points, being chargeable only for the exercise of a due amount of care, which due amount of care, in its quantum, is measured by the use which the pedestrian actually makes. Thus in this state, even in populous streets of cities, pedestrians are not restricted to the crossings in traversing a street, but may cross it at any point. And the same is true of their right to walk along the roadbed of a highway. Owing to the fact that the great congestion of certain parts of our modern cities and the immensely improved modes of rapid transportation over the highway and the desirability of seeing that all such traffic is moved as expeditiously as may be, some cities have compelled pedestrians to use the authorized crossings alone. But no such law is upon our books, and it follows therefore that all parts of the highway are as open to the use of foot passengers as to vehicles. 2 Elliott, Roads and Streets (2d Ed.) paragraphs 1086, 1087, 1088, and cases. It follows herefrom that plaintiff was in the exercise of her right in being upon the highway when and where she was.

[6, 7] But under the circumstances shown in this case, certain very important considerations differentiate the rights and duties of plaintiffs and defendant. Some of these will readily occur to mind. One is that the pedestrians were traveling on a part of the road and under circumstances where they could reasonably look for vehicles approaching them from the front, but would not naturally be expected to contemplate that an automobile would come up behind them, and they were under no legal obligation to look back to see whether they were in danger of being struck from behind. Elliott, Streets & Roads (3d Ed.) § 1088. Another is that to the driver of the automobile the pedestrians were plainly visible. The automobile was not visible to the pedestrians. Still a third is that it was within the power of the automobile to inflict injury or death. Such was not the power of the pedestrians. Upon the part of the driver of the automobile, therefore, we have a known approach to foot passengers, with the power to inflict grave injury. Upon the part of the foot passengers we have the unconsciousness of such approach, with absolute inability to inflict injury and a measurable inability to avoid the infliction of injury. While both parties are charged only with the exercise of the same degree of care, it is manifest that the amount of that care by law exacted of the driver of the motor vehicle is far greater than the amount exacted of the foot passengers. Of the driver of a vehicle under such circumstances, the law in terms requires that he shall not only give reasonable warning of his approach, but "use every reasonable precaution to insure safety." We are aware that from the point of view of the driver of an automobile foot passengers frequently seem to display a negligence amounting to an indifference to the law of self-preservation; while from the viewpoint of the pedestrian, the driver of the automobile evinces a recklessness and indifference to human life meriting punishment by death. But nevertheless no person who has ever ridden in or driven an automobile can be unaware of one fact, and that is that pedestrians, and women particularly, are liable to sudden panic upon the unexpected approach of this terrifying machine. In the exercise of "every reasonable precaution" which the law enjoins, it is well within the spirit of the law to say that the driver of an automobile approaching pedestrians, and particularly women, must have his car under such control as that it may be promptly stopped. The sounding of the horn and the noise of the muffler cut-out are each and both well enough in their way, but they do not embrace and conclude all of the duties of the driver of the automobile. Geiselman v. Schmidt, 106 Md. 580, 68 Atl. 202; Simeone v. Lindsay, 6 Pennewill (Del.) 224, 65 Atl. 778; Gregory v. Slaughter, 124 Ky. 345, 99 S. W. 247, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 228, 124 Am. St. Rep. 402.

[8] It would seem to be fairly inferable from the facts (though it should be remembered that this is stated solely for the purpose of the legal discussion herein had and for the enlightenment of the trial court in the event of a new trial) that defendant did approach this party of pedestrians with horn blowing and with muffler cut-out roaring. It appears, further, that, through preoccupation, they were not aware of the presence of the automobile until it was just behind them. It further appears, as is not unusual, that Lutie Raymond was thrown into a blind panic upon the discovery, and that she rushed in front of or into the side of the automobile. Taking this statement as presenting a reasonable view of the evidence, then the questions for the jury are not complicated by the rightful or wrongful presence of either the automobile or the pedestrians upon the portion of the highway which they were occupying. Both were within their legal rights in being where they were. The vital question for solution by the jury was whether the driver of the automobile used every reasonable precaution to insure the safety of plaintiff up to the moment she was struck. If he did, then the accident belongs either in the category of inevitable casualty or is attributable to the negligence of plaintiff herself.

[9] But as a part of the reasonable precaution which the law enjoins upon the driver of an automobile to use is the necessity of making certain that foot passengers are aware of the rearward approach of the vehicle, that the vehicle itself is at such a distance from the pedestrian as to avoid running over him in his sudden panic from a surprised knowledge of its unexpected approach, and finally, that the vehicle is under such control as that it may be stopped promptly, if appellant did all these things, then he is exonerated, notwithstanding the fact that injury to plaintiff resulted, for such injury could have resulted only from her own negligence under circumstances relieving defendant from blame.

[10] It must be concluded, therefore, that appellant's grievance is well founded. There may well have been a misapprehension in the minds of the jury concerning the right of vehicles to use the left-hand portion of a highway. Appellant was entitled to the instruction that he was lawfully and rightfully upon that portion of the highway. He was further entitled to the specific instruction that if he used reasonable care—that is "every reasonable precaution" in his approach—and Lutie Raymond, notwithstanding, ran into the machine, defendant was not liable.

It follows herefrom that the court's refusal to give the indicated instructions was error seriously prejudicial to appellant, and for this reason the judgment and order are reversed and the cause remanded.

PEOPLE v. MUELLER. (Crim. 1859.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1914.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 304*)—Judicial Notice—Local Option Election—"Fact Established by Law."

The result of an election under the Wyllie act (St. 1911, p. 599), for or against the sale of intoxicating liquors within a city, town, or supervisorial district, is not a fact established by law, within Code Civ. Proc. § 1875, requiring courts to take judicial notice of such facts.

2. Criminal Law (§ 304*)—Judicial Notice—Local Option Election.

The result of an election under the Wyllie act (St. 1911, p. 599), for or against the sale of intoxicating liquors in a certain territory, is similar to the records and votes of city councils and county boards, and the courts cannot take judicial notice thereof, especially in view of section 10 of the act, which makes a certified copy of the record of the result of the vote prima facie evidence thereof, and of sections 6 and 11, which permit the result of the election to be changed by a subsequent vote or by a contest.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Joseph Mueller was convicted of the unlawful sale of alcoholic liquor in no-license territory, and he appeals. Reversed.

Jas. T. Matlock, Jr., of Red Bluff, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Asst. Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of an unlawful sale of alcoholic liquors in "no-license" territory under the provisions of the act generally known as the "Wyllie law" (Stats. 1911, p. 599). His appeal is from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. It will be necessary to consider but one point arising in the case.

[1] The court below instructed the jury, as a matter of law, that the city of Red Bluff was "no-license territory" by reason of an election held under the Wyllie act. There was no evidence on the subject. The charge was that the liquor was sold within the city of Red Bluff, the same being "no-license" territory.

The act provides for the calling of an election in any city or town, or in that part of a supervisorial district not within a city or town, to vote for or against licensing the sale of alcoholic liquors within such territory, and declares that unless the poll at such election shows a majority vote in favor of license, sales of alcoholic liquors within the territory shall thereupon be forbidden and shall be punishable as a misdemeanor. There are certain exceptions not here involved, and which it is unnecessary to notice. It appears, then, that the question whether or not the city, town, or district is "no-license territory," as defined in the act, will depend on the result of such election. It is claimed that the court may take judicial notice of the vote so given, and of its effect, if not in favor of license, to make the territory "no-license territory" and to put the law in force therein.

Upon this question the courts of this state have not heretofore spoken. In other states having laws of this kind there is a sharp conflict in the decisions. The courts of Georgia, Idaho, Indiana, Maryland, and Virginia hold that judicial notice may be taken of the result of the election and its effect to put the law in operation in the territory. Combs v. State, 81 Ga. 783, 8 S. E. 318; Woodard v. State, 103 Ga. 496, 30 S. E. 522; Oglesby v. State, 121 Ga. 602, 49 S. E. 706; State v. Schmitz, 19 Idaho, 566, 114 Pac. 1; State v. In Alabama, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Montana, Oregon, and Texas, the decisions are that although the court will take notice of the terms and effect of the law, as a general law, it cannot take notice of the result of the local election by which it is put in operation, or prevented from operation, in the local territory. Grider v. Tally, 77 Ala. 427, 54 Am. Rep. 65; Ex parte Reynolds, 87 Ala. 142, 6 South. 335; People v. Murphy, 93 Mich. 45, 52 N. W. 1042; People v. Edwards, 174 Mich. 450, 140 N. W. 473; Norton v. Eugene, 53 Or. 282, 100 Pac. 254; Gay v. Eugene, 53 Or. 289, 100 Pac. 306, 18 Ann. Cas. 188; State v. Wilson, 161 Mo. App. 301, 143 S. W. 534; State v. Hall, 130 Mo. App. 170, 108 S. W. 1077; Shively v. Lankford, 174 Mo. 546, 74 S. W. 835; Craddick v. State, 48 Tex. Cr. R. 385, 88 S. W. 347; Bills v. State, 55 Tex. Cr. R. 543, 117 S. W. 835; Kinnebrew v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 150 S. W. 775; Dorman v. State, 64 Tex. Cr. R. 104, 141 S. W. 526.

We believe the decisions last mentioned are more in accord with general principles. In respect of this question, the Wyllie law is not essentially different from other laws operating upon specific classes of things. It is general, in that its force extends throughout the state. But it is in actual operation only, where the subjects, or the prescribed conditions, upon which alone it is to operate, exist. The people of a city, town, or district do not, by voting against license, enact the law in that territory. The law, in substance, declares that no liquor licenses shall be issued in any city, town, or district in which the sentiment is not in favor of it. The election is authorized solely to afford a means whereby this sentiment may be conclusively determined, and it merely establishes the local status or condition. This is the gist of the decision in Ex parte Beck, 162 Cal. 701, 124 Pac. 543, holding that the act is not invald as a delegation of legislative power to the voters of the territory. This local status or condition, therefore, is not established by the law; it remains to be determined from time to time, as the electors desire. It is not a fact "established by law," within the meaning of subdivision 2 of section 1875 of the Code of Civil Procedure, and is not a subject of judicial notice under that section. It depends on the result of a local election, manifested by the local record. The law establishes a method whereby the condition necessary to its local operation may be brought into existence, but the condition so produced is not "established by law"; it is a simple fact to be established by evidence. The fact that it is produced by proceedings authorized by the law does not, of itself, require the court to take judicial notice of it. The case is not different from any other where, the law operating only upon certain things, the existence of the thing must be made to appear.

[2] The courts take judicial notice of the existence and bounds of a city (Stats. 1889, p. 372; Pasadena v. Stimson, 91 Cal. 256, 27 Pac. 604; People v. Potter, 35 Cal. 112), but not of the boundaries of supervisorial districts. Such districts are laid out by the supervisors of the particular county, and the proceedings of such county boards are governed by the same rule as those of a city council in this respect; their orders and ordinances are not subjects of judicial notice. 1 Greenl. on Ev. (16th Ed.) § 44; 4 Wigmore on Ev., § 2572, p. 3608; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 639; Lucas, Turner & Co. v. City of San Francisco, 7 Cal. 474; Carpenter v. Shinners, 108 Cal. 359, 41 Pac. 473. There is an exception, immaterial here, with regard to judicial notice of ordinances by local inferior courts established to enforce local ordinances. Ex parte Davis, 115 Cal. 445, 47 Pac. 258; Ex parte Hansen, 158 Cal. 497, 111 Pac. 528. But the precise fact of which it is here claimed that judicial notice must be taken is the result of the vote taken in the territory, pursuant to the act. This vote does not make the territory in which it is taken a political subdivision of the state constituted for the purpose of carrying on a part of the governmental functions of the state. It does not become a governmental agency similar to a municipal corporation, or a county, of which the courts, for that reason largely, are bound to take notice. The only effect of the election is to produce a status or condition upon which the law may operate. It does not give the territory any power, or erect it into a corporation or body politic. The holding of the election and the record of the result are matters in all essentials similar to the records of the votes and resolutions of city councils and county boards by which ordinances are adopted and passed. These, as we have seen, are not matters of judicial knowledge, but must be proven as other facts.

The act, itself, contains a strong implication that the character of the territory is not to be judicially noticed, but must be shown by evidence. The last clause of section 10 provides that in any prosecution under the act the record of the governing body of the city, town, or district, showing the number of votes cast at the election, or a duly certified copy thereof, shall be prima facie evidence that the territory in which the election was held is "no-license" territory. If the courts must take judicial notice of the fact, this provision would be wholly useless. The necessary inference is that the Legislature believed that proof would be required, as of ordinary matters in pais, and that this provision was intended to facilitate such proof.

Furthermore, it is to be observed that the condition of "no-license" territory, produced by an election under the act, is not intended to be stable or fixed; it remains only until at a subsequent election under the act a different result is produced, and this may occur every two years (sections 6 and 11). The election itself may be contested by any voter of the territory, and in such case the force and effect of the election is not changed until the contest is finally decided (section 9). Thus the character of the territory is subject to change at any time, if there is a contest. It is obvious that the "no-license" territory, so created, is not intended to be a permanently established institution, as in the case of a municipal corporation, and there is not the same reason for making it the subject of judicial notice.

Upon all these grounds our conclusion is that the courts do not take judicial notice that a given city, town, or district is "no-license territory" under this law, that it must be proven by evidence as provided in the act itself, or by other sufficient evidence, and that the court below erred in giving the instruction complained of.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. MUELLER. (Cr. 1858.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1914. Rehearing Denied Nov. 4, 1914.)

1. INTOXICATING LIQUORS (§ 216*)—PROSECUTION—INFORMATION—DESCRIPTION OF LIQUORS—"WINE"—"ALCOHOLIC LIQUORS."

In a prosecution for the sale of wine in no-license territory contrary to the Wyllie Act (St. 1911, p. 599), section 13 of which prohibits the sale of alcoholic liquors, and section 21 of which defines alcoholic liquors as including vinous liquors which contain more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, and which are not so mixed with other products as to prevent their use as a beverage, it is not necessary to aver that the wine contained more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, since the court can take judicial notice that wine is a drinkable vinous liquor containing more than 1 per cent. of alcohol.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 452*)—EVIDENCE—EXPERT TESTIMONY—CHARACTER OF LIQUORS.

A witness who testified that he knew the difference between the taste of whisky, wine, and brandy is qualified, if any qualifications as an expert are necessary, to testify that the liquor which the defendant was accused of selling was wine.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 543*)—EVIDENCE—FORMER TESTIMONY—FOUNDATION.

Evidence that subpœnas for a witness, whose testimony was taken at the preliminary examination, had been issued several weeks before the trial and sent to the sheriffs of five different counties, that all had been returned unserved, and that the sheriff of the county in which the trial was held had made search for the witness in several counties without success, is sufficient foundation to permit the introduction of the testimony given by the witness at the preliminary examination.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 543, 1153*)—REVIEW—DISCRETION OF TRIAL COURT—ADMISSION OF EVIDENCE.

The question whether sufficient diligence to procure the attendance of an absent witness had been shown to authorize the admission of his former testimony is largely within the discretion of the trial court, and its action will not be set aside unless an abuse of discretion is shown.

6. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 761*)—TRIAL—INSTRUCTIONS INVADING THE PROVINCE OF JURY—ADMITTED EVIDENCE.

In a prosecution for the unlawful sale of intoxicating liquor under the Wyllie act, where the court excluded testimony offered by the prosecution to the effect that the place of sale was no-license territory, because the court took judicial notice of that fact, but the result of the election was not disputed, and the defendant in his testimony stated that the town was dry, an instruction that the town was no-license territory was not erroneous, even though the court could not take judicial notice of that fact.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Tehama County; John F. Ellison, Judge.

Joseph Mueller was convicted of the unlawful sale of alcoholic liquors in no-license territory, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Jas. T. Matlock, Jr., of Red Bluff, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. The defendant was convicted of an unlawful sale of alcoholic liquors in a district which had been declared "no-license territory," under the provisions of the act generally known as the "Wyllie Law." Stats. 1911, p. 599. His appeal is from the judgment of conviction and from an order denying a new trial.

Specifically, the charge against him was that he "did willfully and unlawfully sell alcoholic liquor, to wit, wine, to one Sam Stephens, within no-license territory, to wit, in the city of Red Bluff, in said county (Tehama), said wine not having been manufactured on the premises where the same was sold," etc.

Section 13 of the act declares it to be unlawful for any person, "within the boundaries of any no-license territory to sell, furnish, distribute or give away any alcoholic liquors, except as provided in section 16" thereof. It is not claimed that the case comes within any of the exceptions mentioned in section 16, and they need not be considered.

[1] 1. It was not necessary to aver that the wine alleged to have been sold contained 1 per cent. or more, by volume, of alcohol. The act forbids the sale of "alcoholic liquors" within "no-license territory." Section 21 reads thus:

> "The term 'alcoholic liquors,' as used in this act, shall include spirituous, vinous and malt liquors, and any other liquor or mixture of liquors which contains one per cent. by volume, or more, of alcohol, and which is not so mixed with other drugs as to prevent its use as a beverage."

Wine is a well-known form of vinous liquor, and it is common knowledge that it contains alcohol. It is an alcoholic liquor of the class described in the act as "vinous liquor." Its character is so well known that the court takes judicial notice of these qualities, and also that it contains considerably more than 1 per cent. by volume, of alcohol, that it is intoxicating when taken into the stomach, and that it may be used as a beverage. Black on Intoxicating Liquors, § 5; 23 Cyc. 61. We are not aware of any case holding specifically that judicial notice will be taken of the fact that ordinary wine contains more than 1 per cent. of alcohol, but we do not doubt that it will. The fact itself may easily be ascertained by reference to any dictionary, or treatise on the subject. Cent. Dic.; Stand. Dic.; Webster's Dic.; Enc. Brit. vol. 29. The designation of the liquor as "wine," therefore, is equivalent to a statement that it was a drinkable vinous liquor containing more than 1 per cent., by volume, of alcohol, and no further or more specific allegation was required. If there is any liquor known as "wine," containing less than 1 per cent., by volume, of alcohol, it is a fact so unusual and exceptional that it need not be contradicted in the information. It is unnecessary to determine whether or not such fact would be a defense, if proven, for there is no claim that the wine sold by the defendant did not contain more than 1 per cent. of alcohol.

[2] 2. The witness, Montgomery, testified that he knew the difference between the taste of whisky, wine, and brandy. In effect, he said that he could distinguish the different kinds of alcoholic liquors by the taste. This was sufficient to qualify him as a witness to testify that he had tasted the liquor sold by the defendant, and that it was wine. We do not mean to say that it was matter requiring an expert, or that it was necessary to show his qualifications, but if it was, he was qualified, under the testimony he gave.

[3] 3. The testimony of Stephens, to whom the liquor was sold, was regularly taken at the preliminary examination. This testimony was read at the trial, after the taking of evidence to show that Stephens could not, with due diligence, be found within the state, as provided in section 686 of the Penal Code. The defendant contends that due diligence was not shown by the evidence taken. It appeared from the evidence that the sheriff of the county had had a subpœna issued to him for Stephens, several weeks before the trial, and had searched for him, but was unable to find him; that other subpœnas had been issued to the sheriffs of Shasta, Butte, and Glenn counties, respectively, and had been returned not served; that two other subpœnas had been issued to other counties and returned without service, and that the county sheriff had searched for him in other counties than his own, but that he was unable to find him, and that the returns of service on the subpœnas showed that no service had been made.

[4] The question whether or not sufficient diligence had been shown is a matter largely within the discretion of the trial court, and its action cannot be set aside unless an abuse of discretion is shown, that is, unless it appears that the evidence was insufficient to support the finding of due diligence. We are of the opinion that there was sufficient evidence in this case. People v. Lewandowski, 143 Cal. 576, 77 Pac. 467; People v. Grill, 151 Cal. 599, 91 Pac. 515; People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 578, 72 Pac. 177; People v. Reilly, 106 Cal. 650, 40 Pac. 13; Heintz v. Cooper, 104 Cal. 670, 38 Pac. 511.

[5] 4. Error is alleged with respect to the refusal of the court to give certain instructions asked by the defendant. The transcript certified to the court does not contain these alleged requests. Consequently we cannot take notice of the objection. Counsel claim that the omission to insert these in the transcript was inadvertent, and that the identical instructions are set forth in the transcript in a companion case, numbered 1859, entitled People of the State of California v. Joseph Mueller. Whether these instructions are the same or not, we are not justified in considering them as a part of the record in this case.

[6] 5. The appellant claims that the court erred in instructing the jury that the city of Red Bluff is no-license territory within the meaning of the Wyllie Law. It is not necessary to discuss this question here. For if it be admitted that the court cannot take judicial notice thereof, then the fact of its character as no-license territory is subject to proof by evidence, in the same manner as other facts of similar character. While the court excluded testimony on behalf of the prosecution on the subject because it ruled that it could take judicial notice of the fact, there was in truth no dispute on the subject during the trial, and the defendant himself testified, in effect, that Red Bluff was no-license territory. He did not declare this in technical language. He used the ordinary, but expressive, colloquial phrase that "the town was dry" at the time of the sale in question, and that he kept his wine there, "after the town went dry." But there was no uncertainty as to his meaning, there was no objection that such testimony was incompetent evidence of the fact, nor any motion to strike it out. His entire examination showed that the fact was well known both to him and to his counsel. Under these circumstances, the declaration of the court that it would take judicial notice thereof, and the instruction to the jury that it was no-license territory, could not have prejudiced the defendant in any substantial right, and does not constitute sufficient ground for reversal, even if it were erroneous. There are no other objections deserving notice.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

4. Officers (§ 74*)—Removal—Proceedings—Appellate Courts—Jurisdiction—Constitutional Amendment.

Const. art. 6, § 4, as amended in 1904, which provides that all statutes now in force regulating appeals to the Supreme Court shall apply to the District Courts of Appeal, does not make applicable to the courts of appeal Pen. Code, § 770, giving an appeal to the Supreme Court in summary proceedings under Pen. Code, § 772, for the removal of a public officer, since the section allowing such appeal was unconstitutional at the time of the adoption of the amendment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 101–103, 105, 106; Dec. Dig. § 74.*]

5. Officers (§ 74*)—Removal—Proceedings — Supreme Court — Jurisdiction — "Trial."

Const. art. 4, § 18, which provides that officers not subject to impeachment may be tried for misdemeanors in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide, did not authorize the enactment of Pen. Code, § 770, allowing appeals to the Supreme Court in summary proceedings under Pen. Code, § 772, for the removal of such officers, since the word "trial" ordinarily includes nothing beyond proceedings in the court in which the case originated, except where there is a trial de novo after appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Officers, Cent. Dig. §§ 101–103, 105, 106; Dec. Dig. § 74.*

6. Courts (§ 89*)—Rules of Decision—Decisions of Same Court.

Where the Supreme Court had in three cases, in which no question as to its jurisdiction was raised, entertained, under Pen. Code, § 770, an appeal in proceedings for the removal of public officers under Pen. Code, § 772, but in two cases had dismissed a similar appeal for want of jurisdiction, the right to appeal cannot be said to have become settled by a uniform course of decision so as not to be open to re-examination.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Kern County; G. W. Mahon, Judge.

Proceeding by the People of the State of California, on the relation of N. C. Dorris, against James McKamy, to procure the removal of the defendant from the office of City Marshal. From a judgment depriving the defendant of his office, and allowing a recovery of $500 in favor of the informer, defendant appeals. Appeal dismissed.

Matthew S. Platz, of Bakersfield, for appellant. Alfred Siemon, of Bakersfield, and Samuel T. Bush, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOSS, J. This is a proceeding brought under section 772 of the Penal Code, for the removal of the defendant from the office of city marshal of the city of Bakersfield. The court found against the accused, and rendered judgment depriving him of his office, and allowing a recovery of $500 in favor of the informer. The defendant appealed to this court from the judgment, and the respondent now moves to dismiss the appeal on the ground that, under the Constitution, there can be no appeal from such a judgment.

[1] Section 772 is a part of chapter 2 of title 2 of part 2 of the Penal Code. The chapter is entitled "Removal of Civil Officers Otherwise than by Impeachment." One of its sections (770) provides that:

> "From a judgment or decree of removal from office under any provision of this chapter, an appeal may be taken to the supreme court in the same manner as from a judgment in a civil action. * * *"

The respondent's contention is that this provision is nugatory as a legislative attempt to enlarge the constitutional jurisdiction of this court. That the Legislature has no power to confer upon the courts jurisdiction beyond that given or authorized to be given them by the Constitution has long been settled. Pac. T. & T. Co. v. Eshleman, 166 Cal. 640, 647, 690, 137 Pac. 1119, 50 L. R. A. (N. S.) 652, and cases cited. The proceeding, it is claimed, is a "criminal case"; and as it is neither a case "where judgment of death has been rendered," nor one "prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record," it is not within the appellate jurisdiction conferred upon the Supreme Court or the District Courts of Appeal by the Constitution. Article 6, § 4. If an appeal lies to either of these courts, a dismissal would not be ordered "for the reason only that the appeal was not taken to the proper court"; but the cause would be transferred to the proper court. Const. art. 6, § 4.

[2] That the proceeding is criminal can hardly be questioned. This was clearly decided in Re Curtis, 108 Cal. 661, 41 Pac. 793; the court saying:

> "The charge against the respondent is of a public offense—a neglect of official duty, or misdemeanor in office—and the proceeding against him is a criminal proceeding in the nature of an impeachment."

It was held further that the case, though criminal, was not one "prosecuted by indictment or information." These holdings were reaffirmed in Wheeler v. Donnell, 110 Cal. 655, 43 Pac. 1, the court citing section 15 and other sections of the Penal Code in support of the proposition that the proceeding is a criminal one, "and in its nature a prosecution for crime." See In re Burleigh, 145 Cal. 35, 78 Pac. 242. In each of these cases an appeal from the judgment was dismissed. It is true that the appeals there involved were sought to be maintained by the accuser after judgment in favor of the accused. The only appeal authorized by section 770 is one "from a judgment or decree of removal from office." But this was not made the ground of decision. The opinion in Wheeler v. Donnell states that the conclusion reached in the Curtis Case was "based upon the broad proposition that the proceeding is a criminal one, not prosecuted by information or indictment, and therefore without the appellate jurisdiction of this court." And this reasoning, says the court in the later case, is "entirely satisfactory." We find no specific reference to section 770 in either the Curtis Case or Wheeler v. Donnell. In the former the court makes the remark that "the Legislature has made no provision for a review of the action of the superior court." This observation is incorrect, if it was intended to apply to a judgment sustaining the charges and removing the officer. But if the court's general line of argument be sound, the provision of section 770 could not alter the result. If the case is not one of which this court has, under the Constitution, appellate jurisdiction, such jurisdiction cannot be exercised, regardless of whether the Legislature has or has not undertaken to confer it.

[3] The decisions in the two cases just discussed were rendered prior to the amendments of 1904 to article 6, § 4, of the Constitution, creating the District Courts of Appeal, and dividing between them and the Supreme Court the jurisdiction on appeal from the superior courts. We do not see that the question is affected by this change. The appellate jurisdiction in criminal cases is still limited to cases prosecuted by indictment or information in a court of record, those in which judgment of death has been rendered being committed to the Supreme Court, and all others to the courts of appeal. Except for cases transferred from a District Court of Appeal, the amended section gives to the Supreme Court no appellate jurisdiction which it did not have under the former provision. Some of the appellate jurisdiction which had before been vested in the Supreme Court is transferred to the new courts. They are given such jurisdiction, inter alia, in proceedings of "usurpation of office, contesting elections and eminent domain, and in such other special proceedings as may be provided by law (excepting cases in which appellate jurisdiction is given to the supreme court)." The appellant seeks to sustain this appeal as one in a "special proceeding." But the Constitution nowhere authorizes the Legislature to vest in the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction of any special proceedings other than those enumerated in the constitutional grant of jurisdiction to this court, as, for example, "such probate matters as may be provided by law." The clause above quoted does authorize the Legislature to confer upon the District Courts of Appeal appellate jurisdiction of special proceedings not falling within the excepted class of those "in which appellate jurisdiction is given to the Supreme Court." The exception, we think, must be read as excluding those special proceedings (e. g., matters of probate), which are, by the Constitution itself, committed to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court. The language of the constitutional provision, and its entire framework, are inconsistent with the idea, urged by appellant, that the exception embodies an implied grant of authority to the Legislature to give the Supreme Court appellate jurisdiction over any and every kind of special proceeding.

[4] Section 770 (which, on its face, gives an appeal to the supreme court alone) cannot be treated as applying to the District Court of Appeal by virtue of the paragraph of section 4 of article 6 of the Constitution, declaring that:

> "All statutes now in force allowing, providing for, or regulating appeals to the Supreme Court shall apply to appeals to the District Courts of Appeal so far as such statutes are not inconsistent with this article. * * *"

This provision was not intended to create a right of appeal where none existed before. Its purpose was to enable the newly organized courts of appeal to entertain and dispose of appeals which had been theretofore cognizable in the Supreme Court, but which fell within the appellate jurisdiction of the courts brought into existence by the amendment. The statutes made applicable to the District Courts of Appeal were "statutes now in force." If the views herein expressed be correct, section 770 was invalid (hence not in force), under the Constitution as it stood before the amendment of 1904. The section was not therefore brought to life or made applicable to the District Courts of Appeal by the provision quoted above.

We have assumed, for the purposes of this decision, that the proceeding may properly be classed as a "special proceeding," and that the term "special proceedings," as found in article 6, § 4, of the Constitution, includes proceedings of a criminal, as well as of a civil nature. We are not to be understood however, as deciding these questions.

[5] The appellant makes the further contention that the validity of section 770 may be sustained under section 18 of article 4 of the Constitution. That section, after designating certain officers who shall be liable to impeachment, goes on to provide that "all other civil officers shall be tried for misdemeanor in office in such manner as the Legislature may provide." We do not think this section should be interpreted as authorizing the Legislature to enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of the higher courts beyond the limits expressly laid down in another part of the Constitution. The Legislature is authorized to provide for the manner in which officers may be tried. Except where there is a trial de novo after appeal, as in certain appeals from justices' courts, the word "trial," as commonly understood in our practice, includes nothing beyond proceedings in the court in which the case originated. In criminal cases, it embraces steps tending to and culminating in a judgment of conviction or acquittal. An appeal is no part of a trial. It is a means for remedying errors which have occurred at a precedent trial. This section, then, does not authorize the Legislature to grant a right of appeal to this court in cases which the Constitution has not included within its appellate jurisdiction.

[6] The conclusion here reached has been suggested by the District Court of Appeal for the third appellate district in Larue v. Davies, 8 Cal. App. 750, 97 Pac. 903; but, as the point of jurisdiction had not been urged by the respondent, the court did not definitely decide it. Appeals from judgment of removal from office have been entertained by this court, both before and since the adoption of the Constitution of 1879; but in these cases no question of the right of appeal was raised. Triplett v. Munter, 50 Cal. 644; People v. Ward, 85 Cal. 585, 24 Pac. 785; Matter of Shepard, 161 Cal. 171, 118 Pac. 513. In view of the declarations of this court in Re Curtis and Wheeler v. Donnell, the doctrine that an appeal will lie certainly cannot be said to have become settled by a uniform course of decision (see Lord v. Dunster, 79 Cal. 477, 21 Pac. 865) so as to prevent the court from deciding the question when it is fairly presented, as it is here.

The appeal is dismissed.

GRANTS PASS LAND & WATER CO. v. BROWN. (L. A. 3282.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 2, 1914.)

1. Boundaries (§ 46*)—Evidence and Establishment—Agreements Between Parties.

Where owners, uncertain as to the surveyed boundary line, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the line, and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would result from a change, the line becomes in law the true line, regardless of the accuracy of its location as shown by subsequent measurements; but if such agreement is intended to take land from one owner and transfer it to the other, or is not intended to settle any uncertainty as to the true line or to fix the true line, it is invalid and does not change the legal boundary or affect the title of either party to land previously owned.

2. Frauds, Statute of (§ 70*)—Interest in Realty—Agreement as to Boundaries.

The apparent transfer of lands, where a boundary line agreed upon by the parties varies from the true line, does not violate the statute of frauds, since it merely serves to establish the location upon the ground of the line described.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Frauds, Statute of, Cent. Dig. § 112; Dec. Dig. § 70.*]

3. Boundaries (§ 37*) — Evidence — Agreement Between Parties.

Where a boundary line agreed upon by the parties varies from the true line and affects the ownership of land, the proof of such agreed location should be clear.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 184–194; Dec. Dig. § 37.*]

4. Boundaries (§ 46*) — Establishment — Agreement Between Parties.

The doctrine as to boundary lines by agreement between the parties applies only to lines so far as marked or actually located by the agreement, and an agreement as to a part only of a line cannot be extended by construction or implication, so as to embrace a part of the bounds which were not included in the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 212–226, 249–251; Dec. Dig. § 46.*]

5. Adverse Possession (§ 94*)—Payment of Taxes—Sufficiency.

In an action to quiet title to land part ot a grant, the defense of payment of taxes to boundary lines agreed to by the parties failed, where such lines did not wholly inclose the parcel in dispute within the bounds of the grant.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Adverse Possession, Cent. Dig. §§ 528, 529; Dec. Dig. § 94.*]

6. Appeal and Error (§ 1009*)—Findings—Conclusiveness.

In an action to quiet title, a finding on conflicting evidence in favor of defendant on the issue of estoppel by representation as to the boundary line, made by plaintiff's predecessor in title, was conclusive on appeal.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. §§ 3970–3978; Dec. Dig. § 1009.*]

7. Boundaries (§ 47*)—Agreement of Parties—Equitable Estoppel.

In an action to quiet title to a ranch, whose boundary lines had been surveyed by a government surveyor, a finding that plaintiff's predecessor in title had represented to defendant, when about to purchase adjoining land, that the lines in part agreed upon by the parties within the real bounds of the ranch were the true boundary lines established an estoppel to deny such agreed boundaries.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Boundaries, Cent. Dig. §§ 227–231; Dec. Dig. § 47.*]

8. Vendor and Purchaser (§ 232*)—Notice to Purchaser—Possession by Third Person.

In an action to quiet title, where defendant, upon representation by plaintiff's predecessor in title as to agreed boundary lines, immediately took possession of the land up to such boundary, the plaintiff was put upon notice of the facts, and charged with notice of the rights of defendant against his predecessor by reason of the estoppel to deny such agreed boundary lines.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by the Grants Pass Land & Water Company against John Brown. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

J. W. McKinley, of Los Angeles (W. R. Millar, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. J. B. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles (Earl Rogers, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. The plaintiff appealed from the judgment within 60 days after its entry, and brings up the evidence in a bill of exceptions.

The complaint states a cause of action against the defendant to quiet title to 1,198.67 acres of land, constituting a part of a large Mexican grant known as the Rancho Providencia. The defendant is the owner of land adjoining said ranch along a part of the easterly and southerly sides thereof. The dispute between the parties concerns the location of the boundary line between the two tracts. The plaintiff proved a record title from the government to the land it claims, extending to the easterly and southerly lines of the Providencia Rancho. The defendant established a title of record from Ramon Villa to the adjoining parcels of land described as the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter and lots 2, 3, 4, and 5 of section 26, township 1 north, range 14 west, San Bernardino base and meridian. Villa obtained title to all these parcels from the government under the homestead laws. The southeast quarter of the southeast quarter contains 40 acres. It does not adjoin the rancho, and its lines are not involved. According to the government survey and patent to Villa, lot 2 contains 25.43 acres, lot 3, 26.10 acres, lot 4, 34.65 acres, and lot 5, 19.83 acres, amounting in all to 106.01 acres. These fractional subdivisions of the section are caused by the irregular course of the rancho lines, which cut off the remaining portions of the sectional subdivisions indicated by the lot numbers.

The parcel of land in controversy lies wholly within the Providencia Rancho, according to the government surveys under which both parties derive title. If those surveys control, the land in dispute belongs to plaintiff.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

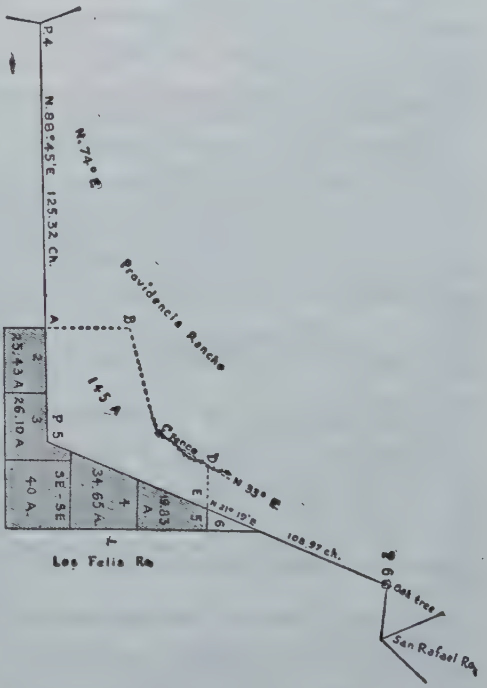
The defendant claims title to this parcel by virtue of an alleged agreement of the adjoining owners as to the location on the ground of the surveyed division lines, followed by possession up to the agreed line and acquiescence therein for many years. He also claims title by adverse possession and by virtue of an alleged estoppel against the plaintiff's predecessors in interest. The defendant never paid taxes, except upon assessments of the lands describing the same, as in the patent to Villa, and containing the number of acres of each lot according to the government survey. This acreage and description would not include the parcel in controversy. To meet this objection to his adverse possession, the defendant invokes the doctrine that, in a case where such agreed line varies from the true line as surveyed, a conveyance or payment of taxes, according to the original description, will be taken to extend to the agreed line, and to cover, or exclude, as the case may be, the intervening land. Price v. De Reyes, 161 Cal. 490, 119 Pac. 893; Young v. Blakeman, 153 Cal. 483, 95 Pac. 888. In virtue of this rule he argues that his tax payments covered the disputed parcel of which he claimed to have possession at the time. It will be seen, therefore, that the claim of adverse possession must fall, unless there was a line established by agreement, possession, and acquiescence, as alleged and sufficient to comply with the above-stated rule. The court found generally in favor of all the defenses asserted.

[1-3] The rule regarding agreed boundaries is stated in Young v. Blakeman, supra, as follows:

> "When such owners, being uncertain of the true position of the boundary so described, agree upon its true location, mark it upon the ground, or build up to it, occupy on each side up to the place thus fixed and acquiesce in such location for a period equal to the statute of limitations, or under such circumstances that substantial loss would be caused by a change of its position, such line becomes, in law, the true line called for by the respective descriptions, regardless of the accuracy of the agreed location, as it may appear by subsequent measurements."

The apparent transfer of land under this rule, if the agreed line varies from the true line, is held not to violate the statute of frauds; the reason given being that it is a fixing of the line and merely serves to establish the location upon the ground of the line described in the deeds. Sneed v. Osborn, 25 Cal. 630. But as it does in fact, so far as the agreed line varies from the true line, affect the ownership of land, it has been well said that the proof of such agreed location should be clear. McNamara v. Seaton, 82 Ill. 500. And if the line is located and agreed to, not for the purpose of settling an uncertainty in the minds of the parties as to the position of the true line upon the ground, but to take land from one owner and transfer it to the other, or without the intent to fix the true line, such agreement is invalid and does not change the legal boundary nor affect the title of either party to the land he previously owned. Lewis v. Ogram, 149 Cal. 505, 87 Pac. 60, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 610, 117 Am. St. Rep. 151. In such a case the title can be changed only by adverse possession for the period of limitation.

Applying these rules, the evidence does not support the finding that the division line was fixed as claimed. In the year 1877, David Burbank owned the Rancho Providencia, containing thousands of acres. Its lines and those of the government sections adjoining its southerly and easterly lines had been surveyed by William P. Reynolds, government surveyor. Villa in that year settled on the lots in section 26 as a homestead claim. We know of no case where a tract proportionally so large has been included by this means. The subjoined map shows the extraordinary character of the claim here made.



The shaded portions of the map represent the 146.01 acres of land embraced in Villa's homestead entry. The lines from the point marked "P4" to that marked "P5," and thence to "P6," at the oak tree, represent the lines of the government survey of the southerly and easterly lines of the rancho and the true division lines between the rancho and the homestead entry. The lines running from A, through B, C, and D, to E, represent the lines which it is claimed were agreed upon by Villa and Burbank as the division lines. The land included within the lines so extended is very rough, brushy, and mountainous. A small valley lies across it opening towards the northwest and extending from the westerly part of lot 4 across the so-called agreed line at the point marked "C." In this valley there are about 20 acres of comparatively level land. The mountains on each side near the point "C" are very steep and rough. A small stream runs down the valley at times, and a few rods northeast of "C" is a spring. The fence referred to in the testimony is indicated by the line interspersed with crosses, and it extends along that part of the line only and no farther, being only some 1,700 feet in length. The distance from the point "B" to "D," along the claimed line, is about 3,500 feet.

[4, 5] The most that can be said in favor of the defendant on the subject of the agreed line is that the evidence tends to show that an agreement was made about the year 1877 between Villa and Burbank, fixing the line for about half the distance from the point "B" to the point "D," across the said valley, that a brush fence was built across the valley which, with the adjacent steep mountain sides, served to turn stock, and that Villa and his successors thereafter occupied and claimed the land composing the valley and its slopes. No agreement was made as to the other parts of the boundaries.

It may be doubted whether in any case so large and irregular a parcel as that shown on the map, departing so far from the true line, could be acquired by an adjoining owner, under the law as to agreed boundaries placed or made with intent to mark or fix the true line. The map itself seems almost conclusive to the effect that they were not fixing a true line, but only placing a boundary for occupancy and not for title. But we need not decide the question. The doctrine applies only to lines so far as marked or fixed by the agreement. The actual location is the thing to which the parties must agree. Where such agreement extends to a part, only, of the line, it cannot be extended by construction or implication, so as to embrace a part of the bounds which were not considered or included in the agreement and as to which there was no agreement. The part of the line which was fixed does not inclose the parcel now claimed, but only runs along a part of one side thereof. This defense, therefore, must fail, and that based upon adverse possession also fails because of the failure to show payment of taxes by the defendant on the land within the real bounds of the Providencia Rancho.

[6, 7] By way of estoppel the defendant alleged, and the court found, that when he was about to purchase the land from Villa he inquired of the plaintiff's predecessor in interest, who was then the owner of the lands claimed by plaintiff, and was informed by said predecessor that the northern and western boundary lines as indicated by the fence, and certain monuments and trails extending in each direction therefrom, were the boundary lines between the premises then owned by Villa, which the defendant was then about to buy, and the lands then owned by said predecessor in interest; that, believing and relying upon said statements, the defendant bought the said lands from the said Villa and paid the purchase price thereof and entered into possession, and that he has ever since occupied and claimed the same up to the line said to be the true line by said predecessor, being induced to purchase by the said representations of the said predecessor.

The evidence was sufficient to show that these allegations were true. It appeared that Brown had visited the premises in company with Villa, before buying, and that they had gone over the agreed line as heretofore mentioned and as shown on the map, and had also examined the trails leading therefrom to the corners, as shown on the map at the points "B" and "C." Thereupon the defendant went to Pomeroy, the said predecessor, told him that he was about to buy the Villa lands, but was unwilling to do so without a survey, because he was not certain of the statements of Villa as to the true line, stating to him where Villa had represented the lines to be, whereupon Pomeroy informed him that no survey was necessary, that the lines shown to him by Villa were the true lines of the respective tracts, and that there would be no trouble if he should purchase the property, and that, in reliance upon this assurance, he bought and paid for the property and took possession thereof. It is true that Pomeroy denied these statements, and declared that this line was not the true line, and that he had never stated to any one that it was the real boundary; but this merely raises a conflict in the evidence as to which, whatever may be our opinion in regard to the truth, we are bound by the decision of the court below in favor of Brown. The lines thus admitted by Pomeroy extended to the corners and there intersected the projected end lines of the Villa homestead claim. Thus it would include the parcel now in dispute. Under these circumstances, we think the estoppel is established. Stanley v. Green, 12 Cal. 148.

[8] Inasmuch as Brown immediately took possession of the parcel and has remained in possession ever since his purchase, the plaintiff, claiming under Pomeroy, was put upon notice of the facts and must be held to be charged with notice of the rights of Brown against Pomeroy by reason of the estoppel.

The judgment is affirmed.

NICHOLS v. DAVIS. (S. F. 6347.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 6, 1914.)

1. APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 1024*)—REVIEW—QUESTIONS OF FACT.

The trial court's decision on a motion to dismiss attachments made upon conflicting affidavits will not be interfered with, even though the evidence leaves the facts in doubt.

2. ATTACHMENT (§ 113*)—AFFIDAVITS—SUFFICIENCY—NEGATIVING SECURITY FOR INDEBTEDNESS.

An attachment affidavit in an action on notes alleging that the notes were made and payable in the state, and that the payment of the same had not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property or pledge upon personal property, did not show affirmatively as claimed that there was any security for any of the notes.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 307–311; Dec. Dig. § 113.*]

3. ATTACHMENT (§ 122*)—AFFIDAVITS — BY WHOM MADE.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 538, authorizing the issuance of writs of attachment upon an affidavit by or on behalf of plaintiff, and section 558, providing, relative to applications to discharge attachments, that if it satisfactorily appears that the writ was improperly or irregularly issued, it must be discharged, but that the attachment shall not be discharged if, at or before the hearing of the application, the writ, affidavit, or undertaking shall be amended and made to conform to the provisions of that chapter, where the original affidavit was made by plaintiff it was not error to permit the filing of an amendatory affidavit signed by one of plaintiff's counsel.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 323–337; Dec. Dig. § 122.*]

4. ATTACHMENT (§ 249*)—MOTIONS TO DISMISS—EVIDENCE.

On a motion to dismiss attachments on the ground that the debt sued on was secured by assignments of certain contracts, it was not necessary for plaintiff to introduce the assignments for the purpose of showing that the debt was not thereby secured, where they would have proved nothing more than was admitted, and an officer of the assignee made affidavit stating in detail the purposes for which the assignments were made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Attachment, Cent. Dig. §§ 861–876; Dec. Dig. § 249.*]

5. ATTACHMENT (§ 249*)—MOTIONS TO DISMISS—EVIDENCE.

Assuming that, on a motion to dismiss an attachment, the mere denial by affidavit of the truth of the attachment affidavit shifts the burden of proof to the attaching creditor, this burden was sufficiently met as to the claim that the debt sued on was secured by assignments of contracts by an affidavit stating in detail the purposes for which the assignments were made, which was accepted by the trial court as true.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Action by Elmer E. Nichols against J. O. Davis. From an order denying a motion to dismiss certain attachments, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

J. E. Pemberton, of San Francisco, Keyes & Martin, of Berkeley, and J. O. Davis, of San Francisco, for appellant. J. A. Elston, of Berkeley, and George Clark, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from an order denying his motion to dismiss certain attachments.

[1] This appeal presents many of the same questions that were decided by the District Court of Appeal in Nichols v. Davis, 23 Cal. App. 68, 137 Pac. 41. The dispute here is between some of the same parties; the difference being that in the former case Rosina P. Davis was a codefendant with her husband, while in this action he is the sole defendant. Counsel for appellant call our attention to the fact that the notes on which that suit was based were signed only by the defendant and his wife, while those involved in the present action were executed by him jointly with the Keystone Construction Company, which latter circumstance, it is argued, lends additional and convincing weight to appellant's sworn allegations that he signed only as a surety, and that the indebtedness was secured by assignment to the bank (the real creditor) of certain paving contracts belonging to the corporation. The obvious answer to this contention is that, in the decision of the motion to dismiss the attachments in that case as in this, the court acted upon conflicting affidavits, and, while this case may have some elements in appellant's favor not appearing in the other one, we cannot say that the court erred in accepting the truth of the allegations of the affidavits filed on respondent's behalf. The affidavits with reference to the alleged security are in all essential particulars the same in both cases, except that different notes are involved in the two actions. The opinion of the District Court of Appeal is therefore applicable to both cases.

[2, 3] In this case, as in the other of the same title, the original affidavit of attachment was signed by the plaintiff. Later the court permitted counsel for plaintiff to file an amendatory affidavit signed by one of their number. The original affidavit contained the following language (referring to the promissory notes):

> "That such contracts were made and are payable in this state, and that the payments of the same have not been secured by any mortgage or lien upon real or personal property, or any pledge upon personal property."

The amended affidavit varies the above phraseology by inserting after the word "same" the words "or of any part of the same." A more specific description of the note was contained in counsel's affidavit than that which appeared in the one signed by plaintiff. Upon the authority of the opinion of the District Court of Appeal cited above, we conclude: (1) That the affidavits do not show affirmatively, as appellant asserts they do, that there was any security for the notes in the shape of a lien on personal property; (2) that it was proper to permit the filing of an amendatory affidavit; (3) that the court did not err in allowing the filing of the latter affidavit signed by counsel rather than by plaintiff; (4) that the amendments permitted were not to the substance, but merely to the form, of the affidavit; (5) that the affidavits were sufficiently certain as to the amounts claimed to be due.

[4, 5] The only other point made by appellant is that, as he traversed by affidavits the statement contained in the general affidavits of plaintiff on attachment, the burden of proof then shifted to plaintiff to show by detailed evidentiary facts that he was correct in the general conclusions drawn. He asserts that, under this rule, it was incumbent upon plaintiff to produce the best evidence—namely, the assignments of the contracts by the Keystone Construction Company—rather than the affidavit of Mr. Naylor containing the conclusion that the said assignments had no relevancy to the notes in suit. It is immaterial here upon whom the burden is cast in a motion to dissolve a writ of attachment. The issue was presented and the court decided it upon the conflicting evidence. Nor was it necessary for respondent to introduce the assignments of the contract. Such assignments would prove nothing more than that which was admitted. The important matter was the relation of these assigned contracts to the notes mentioned in the complaint and in the affidavit of attachment. Mr. Naylor, an officer of the bank, met the averment that there was security for the notes in the shape of assigned contracts by an affidavit declaring in detail the purposes for which the assignments were made. It was for the trial court to weigh this testimony and to determine the facts from it. Assuming, without deciding, therefore, that the burden of proof shifts to the attaching creditor upon a mere denial by affidavit of the truth of the affidavit on attachment, that burden was in this case met by the affidavit of Mr. Naylor, detailing the transaction between the bank and the Keystone Construction Company, which was evidently accepted by the trial court as the truth. Even where the evidence upon such a motion leaves the facts in doubt the court will not interfere. Note 4 Cyc. 797.

The opinion of the District Court of Appeal to which we have referred above is as follows:

"Defendants appeal from the order denying their motion to dismiss certain writs of attachment upon several grounds, of which only the following are urged in defendants' opening brief: That the affidavits used at the hearing 'show affirmatively that there was security in the shape of a lien on personal property'; that the affidavit originally filed was so defective as not to admit of amendment under section 558 of the Code of Civil Procedure as amended in 1909 (Stats. 1909, p. 253); that the amended affidavit is fatally uncertain.

"1. Plaintiff is the assignee of certain promissory notes assigned to him by the payee, the First National Bank of Berkeley. The pleadings in the action are not in the record, but we infer from what elsewhere appears that the notes in question were signed by both defendants. In his affidavit defendant, J. O. Davis, deposed that the 'said notes are in equity the obligations of the said Keystone Construction Company, and that plaintiff and the said First National Bank of Berkeley at the time of the filing of suit on said notes had full notice of such facts'; that, at the time of the execution of said notes, the said company was engaged in the performance of certain contracts with the city and county of San Francisco, involving a large amount of money—stating the particulars—and that said company, at the request of said bank, assigned to it the said contracts as security for the promissory notes of said company and other of its debts 'which debts the notes sued upon herein are in equity a part.' How this equity arises is not shown.

"Witness Naylor, vice president of the bank, testified that the Keystone Construction Company 'was never in any way connected with the transactions of the loaning of the money by said bank to J. O. Davis'; that 'it was never at any time intended by the parties to the said assignments (of the Keystone Company contracts) that the same should be deemed security for the payment of the promissory notes hereinbefore mentioned; that it was at all times understood between the said bank and the said company that the assignments should constitute merely authorities to collect such moneys as might be collected by the said bank from said city and county of San Francisco.' Other statements are made by the deponent further explaining the relation of the parties, all of which controvert the claim made by defendants that these Keystone Construction Company assignments were intended as security for the notes in suit.

"2. It is contended that the affidavit filed on the issuing of the writs was 'a worthless affidavit, one which was, in legal effect, only blank paper,' and would not, under section 558, Code of Civil Procedure, justify the filing of a new affidavit by another affiant in such a case as this—citing O'Connell v. Walker, 12 Cal. App. 694 [108 Pac. 668]. In that case the objection arose out of the statement as to security which was in the alternative. The indebtedness sued upon accrued, and the action was commenced, as we understood the case, before the amendment of section 558 in 1909, and, besides, the question of the right to amend did not arise in the case.

"The only cases we have found decided on appeal referring to the amendment of the statute are Jensen v. Dorr, 157 Cal. 437, 441 [108 Pac. 320], and Fairbanks, Morse & Co. v. Getchell, 13 Cal. App. 458 [110 Pac. 331]. In the latter case the notary who executed the jurat resided in, and was commissioned as a notary of, Kern county. The affiant was in the city of Los Angeles, and the notary called him up over the telephone and took his statement and admitted the oath while the affiant was in Los Angeles. The court, for reasons given, said: 'Inasmuch, however, as the act of Kaye (the notary) in administering the oath was a nullity, and the purported affidavit void, it follows that there was nothing to amend. The authorized amendment of the affiant contemplates the existence of an affidavit. There could be no irregularity in that which had no existence.' Upon the point that in the present case the amended affidavit was improperly made by the plaintiff's attorney, the case cited shows that an affidavit may be made by or on behalf of the plaintiff. Code Civ. Proc. § 538. We see no reason why an amended affidavit also may not be made on behalf of the plaintiff. Said section 558 reads as follows: 'If upon such application, it satisfactorily appears that the writ of attachment was improperly or irregularly issued, it must be discharged; provided that such attachment shall not be discharged if at or before the hearing of such application, the writ of attachment, or the affidavit, or undertaking upon which such attachment was based shall be amended and made to conform to the provisions of this chapter.' In construing this section in the case cited, Mr. Justice Shaw, speaking for the court, said: 'Under this proviso the attaching party may by amendment supply that which, by reason of inadvertence or oversight, was omitted from the affidavit, but the provision cannot be construed as authorizing the filing of an affidavit in support of a writ theretofore issued in the absence of that which constitutes the substance of the act required as a prerequisite to the issuance thereof.' In that case, there was, in effect, no affidavit at all, hence there was nothing to amend, and the statute gives authority only to amend what was in existence. That was as far as the case called for decision. We can conceive of an affidavit not absolutely void yet lacking in some substantive particular, but showing an honest attempt to follow the statute. It is not always easy to distinguish between matter of form merely and substance in dealing with statutory remedies and with statements required in affidavits. We should hesitate to differ from our learned brother, and it may be that his construction of the statute is a safe and sound one. In the case in hand, however, such construction may be accepted and the order appealed from, in our opinion, upheld.

"The original affidavit read: "That said attachment is not sought, and the said action is not prosecuted to hinder, delay, or defraud any creditor or creditors of the said defendant.' In its amended form it reads the same down to the word 'defendant,' which is put in the plural, 'defendants,' and the words 'or of either of them' added. This, we think, was allowable. The first affidavit read: 'Elmer E. Nichols being duly sworn says that he is the plaintiff in the above-entitled action; that said defendants in the said action are indebted to him in the sum of ten thousand ($10,000) dollars gold coin of the United States over and above all legal set-offs and counterclaims upon seven express contracts for the direct payment of money' with interest at 7 per cent. and payable in this state, and that payment of the same has not been secured, etc. In the amended affidavit these several seven promissory notes are described, and it is stated: 'For a more particular description reference is made to the verified complaint on file herein, which is referred to and made part of this affidavit;' and, 'that such contracts were made and are payable in this state and that the payment of the same and each of them and each part of them has not been secured,' etc.; that 'the plaintiff is absent from Alameda county, Cal. (where the action was being tried), and will not return for four days. Affiant makes this affidavit for and at the direction of plaintiff, and affiant is familiar with the facts.' This amended affidavit extends and elaborates and particularizes what was attempted, but was perhaps imperfectly stated in the original affidavit. There was not in that affidavit an entire 'absence of that which constitutes the substance of the act required as a prerequisite to the issuance' of the writ.

"3. We do not think the criticism is well founded that 'from aught that appeared from the affidavit the payment of some of the promissory notes had been secured.' It is urged that the phraseology with reference to the security is the 'negative pregnant found anywhere in the books.' Among the facts to be stated in the affidavit the statute reads: 'And that such contract was made payable in this state and that payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage,' etc. The language used in the affidavit is: 'That payment of the same (the contracts just previously mentioned) and of each of them and of each part of them has not been secured,' etc. Where there is a single contract or promissory note it would be sufficient to allege, in the language of the statute, 'that the payment of the same has not been secured,' etc., without adding, 'nor has any part thereof been secured.'

"It seems to us that where several contracts are the subject of the action it would be a sufficient compliance with the statute to allege 'that such contracts were payable in this state, and that the payment of the same has not been secured by any mortgage,' etc. Here the affiant has gone further and alleged 'that each of them and each part of them has not been secured,' etc. The rule with regard to a negative pregnant as also an affirmative pregnant has reference more particularly to a pleading which must not be ambiguous. An affidavit in an attachment is not strictly a pleading, but is more a matter of evidence and is to be given a fair and reasonable construction in arriving at its meaning. So construed, the affidavit plainly enough states that said contracts have not been secured, nor has either of them nor has any part thereof been secured. There is, in fact, no implication or admission that one or more of the contracts is not secured.

"In our opinion, the original affidavit was not a nullity; that it was capable of amendment, and, as amended, it was sufficient to justify the writ."

The order from which the appeal is taken is affirmed.

TOWNSEND v. BUTTERFIELD.
(L. A. 3330.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON STREETS—ACTIONS—PLEADING.

Where the complaint alleged that defendant unskillfully, carelessly, and negligently ran his automobile, which was driven wantonly and maliciously, at a speed in excess of 20 miles per hour, into plaintiff, the gravamen of plaintiff's case is unskillful driving, and not wantonness and malice due to driving in excess of 20 miles per hour.

2. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 706*)—INJURIES TO PERSONS ON STREETS—ACTIONS—EVIDENCE.

In an action by one run down by an automobile while he was driving along a street an unbroken horse whose movements were controlled by a long rope, the question whether he was negligent in so driving the horse held for the jury.

3. NEGLIGENCE (§ 141*) — ACTIONS — LAST CLEAR CHANCE DOCTRINE—INSTRUCTIONS.

An instruction that the party who has the last clear chance to avoid an accident, notwithstanding the previous negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible, while extremely terse, actually embraces all of the elements of the last clear chance doctrine.

4. NEGLIGENCE (§ 141*)—INSTRUCTIONS—LAST CLEAR CHANCE.

This instruction sufficiently informs the jury that defendant is not liable unless he discovered plaintiff's position of danger in time to have avoided injuring him by the use of ordinary care.

5. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—ERROR CURED BY OTHERS.

Where other intructions charged that the question of defendant's negligence should be judged by the conditions existing at the time of the accident, and if defendant's servant did what appeared to him best, and in doing so acted as a reasonably prudent man, his conduct was not negligent, and defendant was not liable, any failure of the instruction on last clear chance to submit to the jury the question whether defendant did exercise ordinary care after discovering plaintiff's peril, was cured.

6. TRIAL (§ 296*)—INSTRUCTIONS—CURE BY OTHERS.

Where other instructions charged that plaintiff could not recover if his own negligence contributed to the injury, the failure of an instruction on last clear chance to expressly declare that there could be no recovery if the accident was caused by the concurrent negligence of the parties was cured.

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Stanley A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Harry R. Townsend against F. D. Butterfield. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Anderson & Anderson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. Harriman, Ryckman & Tuttle, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial.

The plaintiff sued to recover damages arising from personal injuries alleged to have been caused by the defendant's negligence. The plaintiff was traveling on horseback eastward, leading and driving an unbroken horse by a 60-foot lariat fastened around the horse's neck. He kept the led horse ahead of him, using the lariat to stop him when he shied or attempted to run. An automobile belonging to the defendant, and driven by his chauffeur, was going westward on the same street. As plaintiff and the automobile approached each other, the unbroken horse became frightened by some act of a man at the side of the street and started running across the street toward the end of another street opening into it on the opposite side. Plaintiff drew the lariat tight, attempting to stop the horse, but the horse kept on in the direction it had started, thus keeping the lariat tight and obstructing the road. As he was doing this the automobile kept on its course and struck the plaintiff, breaking his right leg and throwing to the ground the horse he was riding. The automobile was brought to a stop some 15 feet beyond the place of the collision.

[1] The complaint alleges that the defendant "so unskillfully, carelessly and negligently and recklessly ran, propelled, and operated said automobile that said automobile was driven wantonly and maliciously, and at a rate of speed in excess of 20 miles per hour, upon, against, and over the plaintiff." We do not agree with the appellant in his claim that, under this allegation, the gravamen of the plaintiff's case is wantonness and malice due to driving at a speed exceeding 20 miles an hour. The essence of the charge above quoted is that the defendant so unskillfully and negligently ran the automobile that it was driven against the plaintiff. This charge could be established by proof of the collision, that it was caused by negligence of the defendant, without proof of malice, wantonness, or recklessness and without proving that the automobile was going 20 miles an hour.

[2] There was sufficient evidence of negligence on the part of the defendant's chauffeur, for the consequences of which, under the circumstances, the defendant was legally responsible. It is unnecessary to detail the evidence at length on this subject. There was little, if any, evidence of contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff. Defendant's only criticisms of the conduct of the plaintiff are: First, that when the led horse started to run across the street the plaintiff should have dropped the rope and let him run away; second, that after checking or stopping the led horse in the middle of the street, he should have tried to turn or pull him back to the side from whence he started, instead of trying, as he did, to get across the street with him before the automobile should reach the place. It is obvious that a horse controlled by a rope or lariat in the manner stated might become extremely difficult to manage when frightened, and that the jury would not be bound to find the driver or leader negligent, in such emergency, merely because he failed to act in a manner which a deliberate review of the case after the event might show to have been wiser or safer than the course he followed. It was not an inherently negligent act to take an unbroken horse along a street. Highways are made and maintained for the free passage of persons, and of their horses and cattle when properly controlled. There was no evidence that the method of controlling the unbroken horse by means of a rope or lariat fastened to his neck, while taking him along the highway, was an improper or careless method. The use of a rope for that purpose would seem to be a proper precaution and preferable to driving him along with no means of control or check. Under these circumstances it cannot be claimed that the question was not properly left to the jury.

[3, 4] It is further contended that the following instruction, given to the jury at the request of plaintiff, concerning what is known as the doctrine of "the last clear chance" is erroneous:

> "You are instructed that the party who has the last clear chance to avoid the accident, notwithstanding the previous negligence of his opponent, is considered solely responsible."

The instruction is taken almost literally from the opinion in Esrey v. S. P. Co., 103 Cal. 545, 37 Pac. 500. It may be admitted that it is extremely bare and terse as a statement of the doctrine. The trial judge might well have required the counsel to prepare a more complete statement on the subject. But, while it would have been better if it had been expressed so as to be more specifically applicable to the particular facts of the case and so that its full meaning and effect would have been more readily perceived, its terms, when given full force according to the meaning of the language, actually embraced all the elements of the doctrine. The appellant sums up his objections by the statement that this, in connection with the other instructions, fails to submit to the jury the following elements of the doctrine of the "last clear chance," namely:

(1) Whether or not the plaintiff's danger was perceived by defendant in time to enable him, by ordinary care, to have avoided injuring plaintiff.

(2) Whether, after discovering plaintiff's situation of peril, defendant did exercise ordinary care, or did neglect to do some act within his power which, if done, would have prevented the injury.

(3) Whether or not both parties were guilty of concurrent negligence continuing to the time of the accident and each contributing thereto.

(4) "Whether or not the defendant knew of the danger and could have avoided it against the plaintiff, who did not, in fact, knew thereof."

The first point is clearly covered by the statement in the instruction that the defendant must have had the "last clear chance to avoid the accident." He would not have had a clear chance to avoid the accident, unless he had seen the plaintiff's predicament in time to avoid it.

[5] If the point stated in the second objection is not embraced in the instruction itself, it is sufficiently covered by other instructions given, to the effect that the conduct of the defendant's chauffeur was not to be judged by the light of after-acquired knowledge, but by the conditions existing at the time of the accident, and that if he did that which appeared to him at the time best to do, and in so doing acted as a reasonably prudent man, his conduct could not be considered negligent, although in the light of subsequent events it might so appear. The conditions existing at the time of the accident, and which then appeared to him, included his knowledge, as well as the physical facts themselves. From these instructions the jury must have understood that in considering whether or not the defendant used ordinary care to avert the accident they must determine whether or not he perceived the perilous situation of the plaintiff at the time, and whether, after perceiving it, he brought on the injury by his own want of ordinary care.

[6] The objection relating to continuing concurrent negligence was covered by other instructions declaring that the plaintiff could not recover if his own negligence contributed, in whole or in part, directly or proximately, to the injury, "in no matter how slight a degree." It is also embraced in the instruction attacked, by the words "notwithstanding the previous negligence of his opponent," and by the statement that the chance of the defendant to avoid the injury must be the "last" chance. These phrases imply that the cases embraced in the instructiion are not those where the negligence of both parties continues and contributes up to the moment of the accident, but those only where the negligence of the party held liable is at the very time the sole producing cause. There are cases where the plaintiff's negligence continues and contributes at the time and the defendant is aware of the fact, as, for instance, where the defendant perceives that the plaintiff is absent-minded, or unaware of the predicament in which he has carelessly put himself, and, with that knowledge, fails to avert the accident when, with reasonable care, he might have done so. This case is not of that character, and the omission to advise the jury as to that class of cases did not prejudice the defendant.

We do not see wherein the fourth objection is not within the observations already made regarding the other three.

[7] If the defendant desired a fuller and more elaborate instruction on the doctrine of the last clear chance, it was his duty to prepare and present the same to the court, or in some way make known to the court the lack of a clearer instruction and his desire for a better definition of the rule. Having failed to do this, he cannot now complain of the meagerness of the instruction.

These comprise all the points presented in the argument. We find no substantial error in the record.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

RECLAMATION DIST. NO. 673, OF SACRAMENTO COUNTY v. DIEPENBROCK et al. (Sac. 2100.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 6, 1914. Rehearing Denied Nov. 5, 1914.)

1. PARTIES (§ 95*)—DEFECTS — AMENDMENT — NAME OF PLAINTIFF—CORPORATE NAME.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 473, allowing amendments by correcting the name of the party, a complaint which designated the plaintiff as "Swamp Land Reclamation District No. 673" may be amended by striking out the first two words so as to conform to the correct corporate name; such change not amounting to the substitution of another party who had no interest in the original cause of action.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Parties, Cent. Dig. §§ 160–166; Dec. Dig. § 95.*]

2. DRAINS (§ 82*)—ASSESSMENTS — PROCEEDINGS—CORRECTION OF LISTS.

Under Pol. Code, § 3460, authorizing the commissioners to amend the lists of the charges assessed for a drainage district, either before or after the lists have been filed with the county treasurer, such correction may be made after the list has been returned by the treasurer to the trustees of the district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 83–87; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

3. DRAINS (§ 82*) — ASSESSMENT — PROCEEDINGS—CORRECTION OF LISTS.

The fact that the correction was made during the pendency of an action to foreclose the lien of the assessment does not preclude recovery in that action, since such correction did not create the lien, but merely made the list conform to the existing facts.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 83–87; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

4. DRAINS (§ 78*) — ASSESSMENT — SEPARATE TRACTS.

The fact that a landowner occupied part of his land and leased the rest to other parties does not divide the land into separate tracts which must be separately assessed by a drainage district.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

5. DRAINS (§ 75*) — DISTRICTS — REPORT OF WORK DONE.

A report of the board of trustees of a drainage reclamation district which listed the outstanding warrants and stated the purpose for which they were issued, and estimated the amount of indebtedness not covered by warrants, and stated the purpose for which it was incurred, complies with the requirement of Pol. Code, § 3459, that the report contain a statement of the work done or to be done and its estimated cost.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 72; Dec. Dig. § 75.*]

6. DRAINS (§ 43*) — DISTRICTS — REPORT OF WORK DONE.

A report by the trustees of a drainage district, which stated that a break had occurred in a certain cross levee, and that it would be necessary to widen and strengthen the levee and raise it to a uniform height, giving the amount of earth which would have to be removed and the cost thereof, is sufficient under Pol. Code, § 3455, requiring the trustees to report the plan for new work; it not being necessary to separate the assessments for widening and strengthening the levee from those for raising it to a uniform height.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

7. DRAINS (§ 43*) — DISTRICTS — REPORT OF WORK DONE.

A report, stating that it would be necessary to replace the old boiler of a drainage district with a new one, and giving the cost of the new one, need not specify the plan for such work or state the capacity of the boiler, since the work is merely repair work and not new or additional work.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. § 55; Dec. Dig. § 43.*]

8. DRAINS (§ 82*)—ASSESSMENTS—APPORTIONMENT OF BENEFITS.

An assessment by the commissioners of a drainage district for outstanding indebtedness which was classed as incidentals against the land in proportion to acreage is not essentially unfair, and the burden is upon the landowner to show that such assessment was not in proportion to the benefits to the land, as it was required to be by Pol. Code, § 3456.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 83–87; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

9. DRAINS (§ 82*) — BENEFITS — APPORTIONMENT — REVIEW — FINDINGS BY LOWER COURT.

Where there was no essential unfairness in the method of apportioning the benefits among the landowners in a drainage district, the judgment of the lower court that the assessment was in proportion to the benefits will not be disturbed.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Cent. Dig. §§ 81, 83–87; Dec. Dig. § 82.*]

10. DRAINS (§ 78*) — ASSESSMENT — DESCRIPTION OF LAND.

A description in an assessment for a drainage district by reference to the lands of adjoining owners, which correctly and fully described one side thereof and partially described each of the other sides, is sufficient to identify the land and to sustain the assessment.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Drains, Dec. Dig. § 78.*]

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Reclamation District No. 673 of Sacramento County against M. H. Diepenbrock and others. Judgment for the plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

R. Platnauer, of Sacramento, for appellants. C. A. Elliott, of Sacramento, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. This is an action to foreclose a lien for an assessment for reclamation purposes on defendants' land. Judgment was in favor of the plaintiff, and from said judgment defendants appeal.

[1] The plaintiff in the complaint as originally filed was designated as "Swamp Land Reclamation District No. 673." It developed at the trial that the true name of the corporation was "Reclamation District No. 673," and on motion the court permitted the striking out of the first two words of the title of plaintiff as pleaded. This is assigned as error by appellants. In the answer defendants attacked the corporate existence of "Swamp Land Reclamation District No. 673," and the argument is that by plaintiff's admission that there was no such corporation as the one named, there was no plaintiff originally, and therefore nothing to amend. This theory would give the plaintiff power to make admissions but nothing else. It is true that where one party has brought suit, the court may not arbitrarily permit the substitution of another party who possessed no interest in the original cause of action and had acquired none by assignment. That is the rule expressed in Dubbers v. Goux, 51 Cal. 154, but the case at bar does not properly fall under the rule. In Merced Bank v. Price, 9 Cal. App. 189, 98 Pac. 383, emphasis is laid upon the fact that the substitution of Mrs. Dubbers for her husband in Dubbers v. Goux permitted her not to prosecute the same action as the one which he had begun, but "another and distinct cause of action in her separate right." That case is therefore not authority for the one before us, because in the first place there was in this case really no substitution of parties, but a mere correction of a misnomer, and in the second place the cause of action remained exactly the same. The correction made was fully justified under section 473 of the Code of Civil Procedure. In Nisbet v. Clio Mining Co., 2 Cal. App. 441, 83 Pac. 1077, the authorities are discussed and the rule approved which sanctions an amendment to correct a mistake in pleading the corporate name of a party to an action. With the conclusions reached by the District Court of Appeal in that case we fully agree, and we find no error in the action of the court in the case before us, permitting the amendment.

[2] The land described in the assessment list as the property of the defendant was designated by naming the owners of the surrounding lands. There were certain omissions to name tracts, the mention of which would add to the clearness of the description. What was done by the court when this fact became apparent is best demonstrated by a quotation from the findings:

> "That on the 28th day of June, 1911, when said case was on trial it was disclosed by the evidence that a mistake had been made by said commissioners in describing the said tract of land of said defendant Diepenbrock, in said assessment list. That thereupon said commissioners, who were all three present in court, corrected the description of said Diepenbrock's lands in said assessment list by adding to said description the particulars omitted therefrom, thereby making said description of said Diepenbrock's land read as it appears in said amended complaint.
> "That the description of said Diepenbrock's land in said assessment list, before correction, was sufficient to identify the tract of land sought to be assessed, and the errors in said description were not of a character to mislead defendant as regards said assessment, or the land sought to be impressed with the lien thereof."

Appellants insist that the commissioners had lost power to make the correction because the list had been returned by the county treasurer to the trustees of the district. Respondent's counsel call attention, however, to section 3460 of the Political Code which is as follows:

> "The commissioners appointed by the board of supervisors must make a list of the charges assessed against each tract of land; and if there be any error or mistake in the description of the land, or in the name of the owner, or if any land which should be assessed has been or shall be omitted from the list, or if there is any error or mistake in any other respect, the commissioners shall amend or correct the same at any time, either before or after the lists shall have been filed with the treasurer of the county."

Appellants interpret the language of the above quoted section as meaning that the power to amend lasts only during the time that the treasurer retains the list. The language of the section is very broad, and we cannot say that the legislative intent was to express the limitation for which appellants contend. The words "either before or after the lists shall have been filed with the treasurer of the county" are, taken by themselves, subject to no such limited interpretation. If the time for amendment were to be restricted to the period during which the lists should remain in the actual possession of the treasurer, it would have been easy to frame the statute in such way that the desired limitation should be expressed. Instead, the very broad language of the quoted section was used by the Legislature. We are of the opinion that the commissioners were acting within the authority vested in them by section 3460 of the Political Code.

[3] It is next contended that no recovery can be based upon the amended assessment because, as counsel phrases it, "the amended assessment list relied upon as creating a lien upon the land of the defendant first came into existence during the trial of the action." But the correction did not create the lien. It merely made the list conform to existing facts. The commissioners had performed their duties of viewing and assessing the land, but certain errors in the description had been made. It was thoroughly within the discretion of the court to permit such correction as would make the list conform to the facts, but no new assessment was thereby made—no new lien was created. It has been held by the court that where, by inadvertence, property has been placed by description in the wrong range, a new cause of action is not set up when the complaint is amended to conform to verity. Heilbron v. Heinlen, 72 Cal. 377, 14 Pac. 24. And, as is well said by counsel for respondent:

> "The power which section 473 gives to the court concerning the correction of pleadings is analogous to that given to the commissioners by section 3460, and their correction of the list did not substitute a new cause of action for the old."

[4] As part of the property of Mr. Diepenbrock was occupied by himself and farmed under his direction and part was held by other persons under lease, it is contended that this made the holding two separate tracts for the purposes of assessment. But the uses to which land is devoted do not necessarily divide it into tracts. This was one body of land and was properly assessable as such.

[5] The next assignment of error is that the report of the board of trustees fails to contain a statement of the work already done, and that the assessment is therefore void. In this behalf section 3459 of the Political Code and Swamp Land District v. Silver, 98 Cal. 51, 32 Pac. 866, are cited. Paragraph 6 of the report contains this language:

> "That the following is a statement of work done and which is unpaid for, and for which warrants of said district have been issued and are outstanding, and are due and unpaid."

This is followed by a list of the warrants and the purposes for which they were issued. Then follow statements that the board estimated the amount of outstanding debts against the district for which no warrants had been issued as $850, and that said indebtedness "accrued for fuel oil, lubricating oil, services of engineer to operate the pump, and incidentals pertaining to operating said pump." Section 3459 of the Political Code requires a statement in the report of the "work done or to be done and its estimated cost." Respondents are correct in the interpretation of this language as meaning "the work done and unpaid for," and as not requiring a detailed statement of all work performed under the expended assessment. Such data would be of no use to the commissioners in assessing the "estimated cost" upon the land of the work "done or to be done." Paragraphs 4 and 5 of the report state the general character of the work performed under the former assessment, and that the work already done and not paid for is evidenced by outstanding warrants (except an indebtedness of $850). In paragraph 6 the purposes for which warrants were issued and the rest of the debt incurred are sufficiently set forth. There is nothing in Swamp Land District v. Silver, supra, supporting the assertion that the statute was not complied with substantially.

[6] The appellants assert that the proceedings of the board of trustees were of no effect because there was a failure to report to the supervisors any plan for new work of widening and strengthening the cross levee, as required by the provisions of section 3455 of the Political Code. The portion of the report which is attacked is as follows:

> "That a break has occurred from the high water of the winter of 1907 and 1908, in the cross levee of said district, and portions thereof have been washed away, and it has been estimated by a competent engineer and the said board of trustees, estimated and determined that it will be necessary to widen and strengthen said cross levee, and to raise it to a uniform height, and that it will require the excavation and removal of four thousand cubic yards of sand and earth to make such repairs and improvements to said cross levee, and that it will cost twenty-five cents per cubic yard, making a total of $1,000.00 to do said work and make said repairs and improvements to said cross levee, and the said board of trustees did also approve and adopt said plan of repairing and improving said cross levee and the estimated cost thereof."

It is insisted that this is very far from being a report of any plan for the new work of widening and strengthening the cross levee, and Reclamation District v. Bonbini, 158 Cal. 202, 110 Pac. 579, is cited as supporting this position. But the facts of the two cases were entirely different. In the Bonbini Case it is held that the report must contain a statement of the new work to be done "as clear and definite as in the case of original plans." The opinion then proceeds as follows:

> "We may assume that the statement of the first item of proposed new work, viz., the extension of the head levee for about three-fourths miles and the raising of the present head levee on an average of two feet is sufficient, though probably not as clear and definite as it might be made. But we do not see how this can be held as to the item of raising the levees along the San Joaquin river and French Camp slough, which, including also the 'repair' of said levees, amounts to the large sum of $33,000, without any designation of the amount proposed to be used for raising the levees. There was absolutely nothing in the statement from which any one could draw an inference as to the extent to which the trustees were to raise these levees, if indeed they had come to any conclusion upon that point themselves, which does not appear. It does appear that the landowners, by resolution adopted May 4, 1907, had authorized and directed the trustees to formulate a plan for the reclamation and protection of the lands, including their drainage, and to employ necessary engineers and chainmen to furnish the proper plan and estimate of cost, but nothing appears to have been done by the trustees under this resolution other than the presentation of the statement under discussion. So far as the particular point we are discussing is concerned, we have the mere statement of the trustees that they proposed 'to * * * raise the levees,' and that the estimated cost thereof is some undesignated portion of $33,000. This, in our judgment, is utterly insufficient to give to the landowners the notice which the law contemplates they should have, and insufficient to serve as a basis for the assessment in so far as such proposed work is concerned."

It will appear at a glance that the criticized part of the report in the case at bar is more nearly analogous to the first item mentioned in the above quotation, which was declared to be sufficient, than to the second, which was held to be fundamentally defective. Assuming, but not deciding that the work described is, strictly speaking, new work and not repair or replacement of old work damaged by floods, the report is not vulnerable to the attack based upon the ruling in the Bonbini Case. The faulty specification of that case lacked two material elements of the one attacked here, namely: (1) The amount of earth required to make the improvements which had been found necessary; and (2) the cost per yard of such earth.

It is true that the amount necessary to repair the breaks and that required to widen and strengthen the levee and that to be devoted to raising it to a uniform height were not segregated, but there was sufficient statement of the bulk of material and cost per yard to enable the landowners to ascertain the specific purposes of the assessment, the real utility of the contemplated improvements, and the probable protection which the district was to receive from the work. The failure of segregation in the report before us of the exact amount of earth which was to be applied to each part of the general improvement of the cross levee was not so important as the lack of separation of the two elements of specification "a" in the Bonbini Case, i. e.: (1) The extension of the head levee for "about" three-fourths of a mile, and (2) the raising of said levee "on an average" of two feet. Yet that specification was held to be sufficient, and so must this be.

[7] The eighteenth paragraph of the report specified that the boiler then in use for making steam to run the pump was not only old and worn out, but inadequate to carry the amount of steam necessary for operating the engine used for driving the pump; that it would be necessary to replace the old boiler with a new one; and that the estimated cost of such new boiler would be $4,523. Appellant complains that the report fails to adopt a new plan for this contemplated improvement or to specify the capacity of the new boiler which is left to future determination by the trustees. But the replacing of an old boiler by a new one amounts to no more than the repair of old work. There is no change of plan involved but the substitution of a new and efficient piece of machinery for one that had become worn out and inadequate. The important information for the landowner was the cost of the new boiler and that was given.

[8, 9] It is asserted that the assessment was not made in proportion to the benefits which would result to each tract from the work of reclamation, because the board included the balance of all of the money which was to be raised to pay the outstanding indebtedness of the district under the head of "incidentals," and assessed it against each acre of land in the district equally. Appellants invoke section 3456 of the Political Code as forbidding such method. Unless there was something essentially unfair about this plan of apportioning the debt for "incidentals," we must uphold the judgment of the lower court, based upon its finding that the amounts charged against the various tracts of land in the district were proportionate to the respective benefits conferred by the improvements, because while undoubtedly the landowner may, in a case of this sort, question the fairness of the plan adopted by the commissioners (Reclamation District No. 531 v. Phillips, 108 Cal. 309, 39 Pac. 630, 41 Pac. 335; Reclamation District No. 537 v. Burger, 122 Cal. 444, 55 Pac. 156; Reclamation District No. 108 v. West, 129 Cal. 624, 62 Pac. 272), the burden of proof is upon him to overcome the presumption in favor of the validity of the assessment (Reclamation District No. 70 v. Sherman, 11 Cal App. 419, 105 Pac. 277). And appellant made no showing independent of the testimony and documentary evidence offered by the plaintiff. The testimony of Commissioner Kercheval was to the effect that, as there was nothing to show what the outstanding indebtedness was for, it was classed as a debt for "incidentals," and assessed equally upon all of the land of the district. We cannot see anything essentially unfair in such a plan, and therefore cannot disturb the finding of the trial court.

[10] We have carefully considered the contention that the original description of appellant's property to be assessed was not sufficient. The court found to the contrary. The method pursued, as we have indicated, was a description of the tract to be assessed by reference to lands of adjoining owners. This was a recognized form of description. Reclamation District v. Wilcox, 75 Cal. 450, 17 Pac. 24. The south boundary in the original and in the corrected assessment was described in the same way. The north boundary as set forth in the original description contained the designation of one more adjacent tract than the amended call and the east boundary one less, while three tracts were added to the description to make the western boundary complete. It thus appears that each exterior line was at least partially designated in the original description, and all of the southern boundary was therein correctly set forth. It is unnecessary to cite the many decisions of this court which approve a very liberal construction in dealing with descriptions of land. One of the best considered and most frequently cited of these is Best v. Wohlford, 144 Cal. 736, 78 Pac. 294, in which it is held that the designation of the land in a deed will be sufficient "if it afford the owner the means of identification, and does not positively mislead him, or is not calculated to mislead him" (quoting from Cooley on Taxation, p. 745). In Irrigation District v. De Lappe, 79 Cal. 355, 21 Pac. 825, the court by intendment extended a call of 540 feet to 5,400 feet, and one of 200 feet to 2,000 feet. Liberal construction has been extended even to tax deeds, although tax proceedings are in invitum, and in Bosworth v. Danzien, 25 Cal. 300, the court said:

> "The test, then, to which every false call occurring in the course of tax proceedings is to be subjected, is this: Has it probably had the effect to mislead the landowner in relation to the land assessed, advertised, and sold?"

Much more liberally should the court view an attempted description like that contained in the original assessment, in view of the power of correction vested in the commissioners by section 3460 of the Political Code. The court properly found that the original description was sufficient to apprise the owner of the land sought to be assessed.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HENSHAW, J.; LORIGAN, J.

MARIN WATER & POWER CO. v. TOWN OF SAUSALITO. (S. F. 6390.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 6, 1914.)

1. Waters and Water Courses (§§ 200, 203*)—Domestic Water Supply—Regulation of Rates.

Under Const. art. 14, § 1, providing that the use of all water appropriated for sale, rental, or distribution is a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, and that the rates or compensation to be collected for the use of water supplied to any city and county, or city or town, or the inhabitants thereof, shall be fixed annually by the board of supervisors, or other governing body of the city and county, or city or town, and shall continue in force for one year and no longer, the fixing of rates contemplated is a legislative function, and such section does not apply to the case of a municipal corporation owning its own water system and purchasing water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants, and hence a 10-year contract by such a municipal corporation for the purchase of water in bulk was not invalid as in violation of such section.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 274, 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. §§ 200, 203.*]

2. Waters and Water Courses (§ 203*)—Domestic Water Supply—Regulation of Rates.

The right to regulate rates to be paid for a service or commodity rests fundamentally upon the dedication to public use of the property of the person or corporation compelled to submit to the regulation, and hence a sale of water to a town owning its own water system was not subject to the rate-regulating power of the town conferred by Const. art. 14, § 1, unless it constituted a dedication of the water to public use.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

3. Municipal Corporations (§ 57*)—Legislative or Proprietary Capacity.

A municipal corporation in administering a public utility, such as a water system, even within its own limits, does not act in a legislative capacity, but in a proprietary and only quasi public capacity.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 144, 148; Dec. Dig. § 57.*]

4. Waters and Water Courses (§ 203*)—Domestic Water Supply—Regulation of Rates.

A sale and delivery of water in bulk to a town owning its own water system for sale by it to its inhabitants was not a dedication of the water to a public use, and hence was not subject to the power of the municipality to regulate rates conferred by Const. art. 14, § 1.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

5. Municipal Corporations (§ 226*)—Domestic Water Supply—Contracts of Municipality—"Municipal Purposes."

Under Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 269) § 862, subd. 3, authorizing trustees of cities of the sixth class to contract for supplying the city with water for municipal purposes, a municipal corporation of the sixth class owning its own water system had power to purchase water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants; the supplying of water to its inhabitants being a "municipal purpose."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 645–650; Dec. Dig. § 226.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Municipal Purposes.]

6. Municipal Corporations (§ 226*)—Domestic Water Supply—Contracts of Municipality.

When a municipal corporation possesses authority to contract for a supply of water for its own use and the use of its inhabitants, the terms and duration of the agreements rest within the sound discretion of the municipal authorities, and the contract may only be overthrown by the courts for fraud, abuse, excess of authority, or inequity in the terms of the agreements, and a 10-year contract by a town owning its own water system for the purchase of water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants, which provided that the maximum rate should be 30 cents per thousand gallons, when the water furnished did not exceed an average during the year of 200,000 gallons per day, with a reduction in rate if the amount exceeded 200,000 gallons, and that the town would pay for not less than 200,000 gallons a day, and further granting the seller of the water permission to use the streets of the town for water mains for the purpose of supplying water to points beyond the town, and providing that when the town ceased to take its entire water supply and that of its inhabitants, from such seller, the seller should be granted a franchise to occupy the streets of the town for the purpose of supplying the town and its inhabitants with water, was not vulnerable to any of the objections enumerated.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 645–650; Dec. Dig. § 226.*]

7. Waters and Water Courses (§ 200*)—Domestic Water Supply—Contracts of Municipal Corporations.

In a contract by a town owning its own water system for the purchase of water in bulk, there was no inconsistency between provisions fixing the maximum rate at 30 cents per thousand gallons when the water furnished did not exceed an average of 200,000 gallons per day, with a reduction in rate where the water furnished exceeded that amount, and a provision binding the town to pay for not less than 200,000 gallons a day, during the life of the agreement.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

8. Waters and Water Courses (§ 200*)—Domestic Water Supply—Contracts of Municipal Corporations.

A provision in a contract by a town owning its own water system for the purchase of water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants, binding the town to pay for not less than 150,000 gallons per day the first year, and 200,000 gallons thereafter, was valid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

9. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—MUTUALITY OF OBLIGATION.

A contract by a town for the purchase of water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants, which bound the town to pay for a specified minimum quantity, was not rendered unenforceable by provisions that the seller would use due diligence to maintain its pipes in good condition, and employ its best endeavors to cause an adequate supply of water to flow through its pipes, and that in case of a deficiency it would prorate the supply of water between the town and its other customers; this not, as claimed, entitling the seller to payment for the specified minimum quantity if it merely used its best endeavors to furnish water, but being the usual provision excusing a party to a contract from absolute performance because of an emergency, which does not render the contract void for lack of mutuality.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21–40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

10. CONTRACTS (§ 10*)—MUTUALITY OF OBLIGATION.

If as claimed, a contract between a town and a seller of water in bulk, lacked mutuality in that the seller was only required to use due diligence, and employ its best endeavors to furnish water, the contract was nevertheless enforceable where the seller was able and willing to perform and did perform all of its duties, including the supplying of an abundance of water, since unilateral contracts are sustained upon execution of the optional consideration.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Contracts, Cent. Dig. §§ 21–40; Dec. Dig. § 10.*]

11. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—CONTRACTS OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

A 10-year contract by a town of the sixth class for the purchase of water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants, which fixed the maximum rate at 30 cents per thousand gallons if the water furnished did not exceed an average of 200,000 gallons per day, and bound the town to pay for not less than 200,000 gallons per day after the first year, was not void as unreasonably binding the town to make payments which might possibly be raised by taxes to be paid by a decreased population.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

12. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 182*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—USE OF STREETS.

Civ. Code, § 548, providing that no corporation formed to supply any city, etc., with water, must do so unless previously authorized by an ordinance of the authorities thereof, or unless done in conformity with a contract between the city, etc., and the corporation, so far as it makes a street franchise necessary, was abrogated by the adoption of Const. art. 11, § 19, which in 1908, when a contract for a supply of water was made, provided that in any city where there were no public works owned and controlled by the municipality for supplying it with water, any individual or corporation should, under the direction of the superintendent of streets or other officer, and under such general regulations as the municipality might prescribe, have the privilege of using the public streets and of laying pipes and connections so far as necessary to introduce into and supply the city with water.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 267; Dec. Dig. § 182.*]

13. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—CONTRACTS OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Civ. Code, § 548, providing, relative to contracts between a city, etc., and a corporation formed to supply water, that no exclusive right shall be granted, if still in force, was not violated by a contract by a town owning its own water system, for the purchase of water for sale to its inhabitants, where the contract provided that whenever the town should cease to take its entire water supply and that of its inhabitants from the seller, the seller should be granted a franchise to occupy the streets of the town, thus contemplating the possibility of purchases of water from sources other than those owned by the seller.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

14. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—CONTRACTS OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

Pol. Code, § 4412, providing that the common council of a city may contract with gas and water companies for supplying the streets and public buildings with necessary gas and water, the rates to be paid to be fixed for a term not exceeding five years, and the city authorities to reserve the right to abrogate the contract, if still in force, applies only to the supplying of water to public buildings, and has no application to the purchase of water by a town for sale to its inhabitants.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

15. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—CONTRACTS OF MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS.

A city or town having power to buy water for its own distributing system may agree to purchase water up to a given quantity exclusively from one company, and such contract will be enforced though the city should conclude to procure a supply of water of its own in addition to its own works, since the power to contract for a reasonable length of time implies the power to forego other means of procuring water for a like period.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. § 274; Dec. Dig. § 200.*]

16. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 870*) — LOANING CREDIT—CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS.

A contract by a town to purchase water for sale to its inhabitants, which bound the town to pay for a specified minimum amount, did not violate Const. art. 4, § 31, providing that the Legislature shall have no power to give or lend, or authorize the giving or lending, of the credit of any city and county, city, etc., in aid of or to any person, association, or corporation, though to supply such water it was necessary for the seller to build a pipe line to the town from the nearest point reached by its system, and even though it would not have extended its system to such town if the contract had not been made.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. § 1817; Dec. Dig. § 870.*]

17. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 200*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—BREACH OF CONTRACT—MEASURE OF DAMAGES.

Notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 3311, providing that the detriment caused by the breach of a buyer's agreement to accept and pay for personal property, the title to which is not vested in him, is the excess of the amount due from the buyer over the value to the seller, together with the excess of the expenses properly incurred for carriage over those which would have been incurred if the buyer had accepted the property, where a contract by a town for the purchase of water for sale to its inhabitants bound it to pay for a specified minimum quantity, the agreed minimum rate was the measure of recovery, the amount of water delivered having been less than the specified minimum, since the promise to pay such minimum sum was a part of the direct obligation of the contract, and in no sense a covenant for liquidated damages in case of breach.

18. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 254*)—ACTIONS—DEFENSES—INADEQUACY OF FUNDS.

Under a contract by a town for the purchase of water for sale to its inhabitants, by which it agreed to create a fund to be called the water supply fund, and fix and establish water rates sufficient to pay for all water supplied by the seller, and if such fund in any month was insufficient to meet the payments then due, to cause to be transferred thereto from the general fund an amount sufficient to supply the deficiency, the depletion of such funds was not a defense to an action against the town for an amount due on the contract, and it was not necessary to allege that there was money in such fund from which the claim could be paid.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Municipal Corporations, Cent. Dig. §§ 696–700; Dec. Dig. § 254.*]

19. WATERS AND WATER COURSES (§ 203*)—DOMESTIC WATER SUPPLY—REGULATION OF RATES.

Const. art. 14, § 1, relative to the regulation of rates to be collected for water supplied to any city and county, city or town, or the inhabitants thereof, does not apply to the rates or compensation to be collected by a municipality itself for water furnished by it.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Waters and Water Courses, Cent. Dig. §§ 289, 290–299; Dec. Dig. § 203.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Marin County; E. T. Zook, Judge.

Action by the Marin Water & Power Company against the Town of Sausalito. From a judgment for defendant on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lilienthal, McKinstry & Raymond, of San Francisco, for appellant. O. F. Meldon, of Sausalito, and Thomas, Beedy & Lanagan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Plaintiff sued for the sum of $8,447.76 balance due for water furnished defendant under a contract for use in defendant's municipal water system. Defendant demurred generally, the demurrer was sustained without leave to amend, and from the judgment entered in accordance with said ruling the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The essential facts appearing from the pleading are as follows: Plaintiff is a Californian corporation, with power, among other things, to supply water to the incorporated towns in Marin county and to the inhabitants thereof, for domestic and other purposes and to carry on a general water business. Defendant is a municipal corporation of the sixth class. In 1908 the town of Sausalito incurred a bonded indebtedness of $100,000 for the construction of waterworks for the distribution of pure, fresh water to said town of Sausalito and the inhabitants thereof. Subsequently, pursuant to resolution regularly passed by the board of trustees of the town of Sausalito, the president of that board was empowered to execute a certain contract, set forth in full in the resolution and approved by the board, whereby the Marin Water & Power Company agreed to furnish, and the town of Sausalito obligated itself to take, a supply of water for distribution through its municipal water system. It was recited in the resolution, among other things, that:

> "Public interest and necessity require and demand that such supply be obtained from the Marin Water & Power Company, a corporation engaged in the business of developing and supplying water within the county of Marin, and said Marin Water & Power Company being the only person, firm, or corporation in the county of Marin presently able to contract for and furnish to the said town of Sausalito a supply of water sufficient and adequate for the needs of said town of Sausalito."

Acting under the power conferred by the resolution, the president of the board of trustees executed the agreement which is the basis of this action. In the preamble to this agreement the water company (the "second party") is mentioned as "willing to supply water to said town of Sausalito as a body politic, and not to inhabitants thereof otherwise than as [to] the same may be supplied to said inhabitants by said municipality through its own distributing system and under its own exclusive control." By the agreement said second party obligates itself to proceed diligently to lay its pipes, conduits, etc., from Corte Madera, to the town limits of Sausalito and to maintain said pipes, conduits, etc., in good condition during the life of the contract. The water company waives all rights which it might otherwise have of supplying water to any person within the town limits of Sausalito except the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company. The water company also agrees accurately to measure all of the water furnished. By the terms of the contract the Marin Water & Power Company is to "receive and accept as payment for all water furnished the maximum rate of thirty (30) cents per thousand gallons when the total amount of water furnished to first party shall not exceed an average during the respective year of two hundred thousand (200,000) gallons per day. And when such average amount of daily consumption shall exceed two hundred thousand (200,000) gallons the rate per thousand gallons for all water furnished shall diminish proportionately." Then follows a schedule prescribing a reduction in the rate where the amount used shall exceed 200,000 gallons a day. The seventh paragraph of the agreement is in the following language:

> "First party, in consideration of the foregoing agreements to be performed by second party, hereby agrees that it will, during the first year of the term hereof, pay for not less than one hundred and fifty thousand (150,000) gallons of water per day, and after said first year, for not less than two hundred thousand (200,000) gallons per day for every year during the life of this agreement."

Time of payment and method of calculating amounts due are the next subjects treated, and the "first party," the town of Sausalito, agrees to create by ordinance a fund to be called the "Water Supply Fund" and (to quote further):

> "First party agrees that it will fix and establish water rates to be paid by its customers in said municipality, which shall be sufficient to pay for all water supplied to it by second party, and will cause to be collected and paid into said fund all said water rates, and it agrees that said fund shall be subject to the payment to second party of amounts to become due to second party hereunder, and should said fund in any month be insufficient to meet the payments then due second party hereunder, first party will at once cause to be transferred to said fund, from the general fund of first party, an amount sufficient to supply such deficiency."

This is followed by a provision that nothing in the agreement shall be deemed as incurring any indebtedness by the party of the first part in violation of section 18 of article 11 of the Constitution of California. The second party is granted permission to use the streets of Sausalito for its water mains for the purpose of supplying water to points outside of and beyond said town. The first party further agrees that whenever it shall cease to take its entire water supply and that of its inhabitants from the second party (except when said second party is unable to furnish said supply) the second party shall then be granted a franchise to occupy the streets of Sausalito for the purpose of supplying said town and its inhabitants with water for domestic and all other purposes. The term of the agreement is 10 years from the 1st day of August, 1909, the town of Sausalito reserving an option for an extension of the contract for an additional period of ten years.

At the time of entering into the contract plaintiff owned a water system, the most southerly point of which was at Corte Madera, six miles from Sausalito. Immediately upon the execution of the contract plaintiff proceeded diligently to construct its pipes from Corte Madera to the town limits of Sausalito, at a cost of more than $111,000. Prior to August 1, 1909, defendant installed a water system within its corporate limits and since said date defendant has been continuously taking water from plaintiff, using part of said water for its own municipal needs and selling the remaining part to its inhabitants and to others at rates established by said municipal corporation. During the year ending July 31, 1911, defendant took from plaintiff under the contract something in excess of 42,000,000 gallons, an average of less than 200,000 gallons a day. Plaintiff does not know what amount of money was in defendant's water fund on September 1, 1911, but for water furnished during that year plaintiff has received $13,452.24. It asserts that the amount due under paragraph VII of the agreement was $21,900, and prays judgment for the balance of $8,447.76 alleged to be due.

[1-4] The order of the superior court sustaining the demurrer is based upon a written opinion by the learned judge of that court, and we will first discuss the point upon which that opinion rests, which is, in brief, that the contract, being for the supply of water for a period greater than one year, is void by reason of the limitations expressed in section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution of California as that article existed at the time the contract was made. Appellant's position is that the provisions of that section of the Constitution were never intended to apply and do not apply to a contract for the supply of water to a municipality in gross for use and sale by it through its own water system, but if intended to apply to such a transaction, they are void by reason of conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

The pertinent portion of article 14, § 1, as it existed when the contract was made, is as follows:

> "The use of all water now appropriated, or that may hereafter be appropriated, for sale, rental, or distribution, is hereby declared to be a public use, and subject to the regulation and control of the state, in the manner to be prescribed by law; provided, that the rates or compensation to be collected by any person, company, or corporation in this state for the use of water supplied to any city and county, or city, or town, or the inhabitants thereof, shall be fixed, annually, by the board of supervisors, or city and county, or city or town council, or other governing body of such city and county, or city or town, by ordinance or otherwise, in the manner that other ordinances or legislative acts or resolutions are passed by such body, and shall continue in force for one year and no longer."

Pursuant to this section the act of March 7, 1881 (Stats. 1881, p. 54) was passed. It provided in detail the steps to be taken by the legislative body of each municipality in fixing water rates annually. While the words of this section of the Constitution are very general and refer to the "rates or compensation" to be collected for the use of water supplied to a municipality "or the inhabitants thereof," it is clear from the context that the fixing of rates contemplated is a legislative function, and it seems equally plain that there was no intention of the framers of the Constitution to make the section in question apply to the case of a municipal corporation owning its water system and purchasing water in bulk for sale to its inhabitants. The right to regulate rates to be paid for a service or commodity rests fundamentally upon the dedication to public use of the property of the person or corporation compelled to submit to the regulation. Such was the doctrine of the case of Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 123, 24 L. Ed.

77, and such has been the principle followed for hundreds of years in all jurisdictions deriving their jurisprudence from the common law. In Munn v. Illinois, Mr. Chief Justice Waite quoted the language of Lord Chief Justice Hale, written more than 200 years before, that when private property is "affected with a public interest, it ceases to be juris privati only." Judge Dillon in his work on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed.) p. 2233 thus expresses the rule:

> "The regulation of rates is governmental in its nature, and the power is intended to be exercised for the benefit of the inhabitants of the municipality."

The same principle is expressed in Contra Costa Water Co. v. City of Oakland, 159 Cal. 333, 113 Pac. 668. But a city does not always act in a legislative capacity. It does not so act in administering a public utility such as a water system even within its own limits, but "in a proprietary and only quasi public capacity." South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land Co., 152 Cal. 593, 93 Pac. 490. In the case last cited this court was considering the status of a municipal corporation operating its own water system for the benefit of its own citizens and also selling water to a part of the inhabitants of another city, and it was made clear that such a corporation in its capacity as a vendor of water is upon practically the same plane as a water company engaged in the same business. In the earlier case of Davoust v. City of Alameda, 149 Cal. 70, 84 Pac. 760, 5 L. R. A. (N. S.) 536, 9 Ann. Cas. 847, it was held that a municipal corporation operating an electric light plant is liable for injuries caused by the negligence of its servants in the operation of such utility just as another corporation or person would be. In the opinion in that case, Western Saving Fund Society v. Philadelphia, 31 Pa. 183, 72 Am. Dec. 730, is approvingly quoted to the following effect:

> "The supply of gaslight is no more a duty of sovereignty than the supply of water. Both these objects may be accomplished through the agency of individuals or private corporations, and in very many instances they are accomplished by those means. If this power is granted to a borough or a city, it is a special private franchise. * * * The whole investment is the private property of the city, as much so as the lands and houses belonging to it. * * * It [the city] stands on the same footing as would any individual or body of persons, upon whom the like special franchises had been conferred."

The true scope of article 14 of the Constitution was under discussion in Thayer v. California Development Co., 164 Cal. 134, 128 Pac. 27. The court was there interested in determining what constitutes a dedication of water to public use, and the following language was employed:

> "According to the theory of the plaintiff in this case, whenever the owner of a water supply determines to and does sell it for a price agreed on between himself and the purchasers, it immediately becomes subject to public use, and any other person to whom it can be conveniently distributed in the same manner would have the right to a proportionate share of the water on the same terms as the purchasers, and, if the supply is limited, the first purchasers must divide with all others who may come in and claim a share. Under that theory, where a person having a surplus of water parts with a portion of it by sales to others, he thereby appropriates such portion to purposes of sale and dedicates it to public use. This application of the section would destroy private rights in water and convert every sale thereon into a dedication to public use. We do not believe that the Constitution was intended to have such effect, or that it should be so construed. Article 14 taken as a whole shows plainly that it was intended to regulate the use of water appropriated and dedicated generally for sale and distribution among an indefinite number of users. It could not have been intended to declare that a single sale of a part of his water by one having more than he needs would convert the use into a public use in which others could share. If a single sale could not do this, other sales of like character would not accomplish it. The section must be understood to apply to cases where one has appropriated water generally, for sale, rental, or distribution, and not to cases where sales are made to particular persons at a fixed price by ordinary contracts of purchase and sale."

If the sale of water under contract to the city was not a dedication of it to public use, it is clear that such sale was not subject to the rate-regulating power of the municipality conferred by the fourteenth article of the Constitution. We are of the opinion that such sale and delivery were no more a dedication of the water to a public use than would have been a similar transaction between the owner of surplus water and a corporation engaged in the distribution of water to a city. It has been held that the selling of water to a public service corporation does not make the persons using such water customers of the company that sold it, at an agreed price, to the distributing company. Garrison v. North Pasadena Land, etc., Co., 163 Cal. 239, 124 Pac. 1009. It is no doubt true that the plaintiff in this action is a public service corporation but it has not dedicated its water supply to the inhabitants of Sausalito nor to the city in the usual sense of the term. The relation of the plaintiff to the municipality as such is purely contractual, and it has no relation to the inhabitants or individual water users as such.

Respondent cites authorities to the effect that a board of supervisors or other governing body of a municipality may fix rates for water supplied to such city, city and county or town, but the cases involved facts differing greatly from those presented by this record. For example, it was held in Spring Valley Water Works v. San Francisco, 61 Cal. 18, that water supplied to the city and county "is as fully covered by the express language of the article" (article 14, subd. 1) "as is water supplied to the individual consumers," and that the supervisors had power to fix a rate for water sold to the city. But there the court was considering the sale of water to the city and county as a consumer, using, for various municipal purposes, water purchased from a company occupying its streets under a franchise to sell to individuals and to collect rates. Of course the municipality may, in its governmental capacity, regulate the rates at which water may be delivered to it by a public service corporation and received by the municipality in its role of consumer. Such was the ruling in Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 348, 4 Sup. Ct. 48, 28 L. Ed. 173. In the case of Home Telephone & Telegraph Co. v. Los Angeles, 211 U. S. 270, 29 Sup. Ct. 50, 53 L. Ed. 176, it was held that a city may not unless by law authorized thereto, surrender by contract a governmental power such as fixing rates, and that the city's position as a heavy rate payer did not disqualify the council from fixing telephone rates.

The case of Freeport Water Co. v. Freeport City, 180 U. S. 592, 21 Sup. Ct. 493, 45 L. Ed. 679, was one involving a contract whereby a city granted to a water company the exclusive right to supply the city with water for 30 years. Such contracts were permitted by the law of Illinois, but cities were given power to authorize a corporation to construct waterworks and to maintain them at such rates as may be fixed by ordinance and for a period not exceeding the 30 years. A bare majority of the Supreme Court of the United States held that the interpretation given to the statute by the Supreme Court of Illinois must prevail because the words "fixed by ordinance" might as well mean "fixed by ordinance from time to time," as the state court decided, or "fixed by ordinance for the whole period of thirty years." But in that case it was expressly held that a city may be invested with power to bind itself by an irrevocable contract not to regulate water rates, citing in support of that view several cases, among them being Los Angeles v. Los Angeles City Water Co., 177 U. S. 558, 20 Sup. Ct. 736, 44 L. Ed. 886. But we need not review in detail all of the authorities brought to our attention by respondent. No case has been presented holding that a municipal corporation may vary the terms of its own solemn contract, under the guise of rate regulation, when it has gone into the business of furnishing to its citizens a commodity which it purchases, under said contract at wholesale. Section 1 of article 14 is no bar to a city's entering into a contract such as the one before us and if the contract be void it must be for some other reason.

[5, 6] Section 862, subdivision 3, of the Municipal Corporation Act (St. 1883, p. 269) gives to trustees of cities of the sixth class power "to contract for supplying the city with water for municipal purposes." Appellant insists that under that grant of power the city had the right to enter into this agreement. That the supplying of water to its inhabitants is a municipal purpose there can be no doubt (City of South Pasadena v. Pasadena Land & Water Co., supra), and it is the general rule that when a municipal corporation possesses authority to enter into contracts for the supply of water for its own use and for the use of its inhabitants, the terms and duration of the agreements rest within the sound discretion of the municipal authorities, and such contracts may only be overthrown by courts in cases of fraud, abuse, or excess of authority, or inequity, in the terms of the agreements. Dillon, Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) § 1307. We are of the opinion that this contract is not, upon its face, vulnerable to any of the above enumerated objections.

[7, 8] Respondent insists, however, that the town has paid more than was due under the contract because the number of gallons of water admittedly furnished during the year would be worth, at 30 cents per thousand gallons, less than the amount admittedly paid to plaintiff. In support of this contention it is said that paragraphs VI and VII of the agreement are inconsistent, and that this inconsistency must be resolved in favor of the town. One of these paragraphs provides that the second party shall receive a maximum rate of 30 cents per thousand gallons when the total amount of water furnished shall not exceed an average of 200,000 gallons per day. The seventh paragraph, previously quoted herein, binds the town to pay for not less than 150,000 gallons the first year, and not less than 200,000 gallons for every other year during the life of the agreement. We fail to see any inconsistency in these two paragraphs. By the former paragraph, 200,000 gallons per day is fixed as the point beyond which the proportional diminution in the rate shall begin, while by the latter the town binds itself to pay for at least 200,000 gallons per day after the first year. Minimum payment clauses have been held valid in contracts between individuals. We see no reason to change the rule in the instance of a contract to which one of the parties is a town. In Beck v. Indianapolis Light & Power Co., 36 Ind. App. 600, 76 N. E. 313, the contract in suit bound the consumer to use enough electric current to make a monthly bill of $1 or pay the amount of said bill should sufficient current be not used. The court said:

> "This stipulation is a part of the direct obligation of the contract, and cannot be properly construed to be an agreement to pay damages for the breach thereof" (citing Johnston et al. v. Cowan, 59 Pa. 275).

[9, 10] Respondent also attacks the agreement on the ground that the town had no power to promise to pay the plaintiff $60 per day for "trying to furnish water." This position is taken in view of the language of the third paragraph in which the water company promises to "use due diligence to maintain its pipes" in good condition; to employ its "best endeavors" to cause an adequate supply of pure water to flow through its conduits, and in case of deficiency to prorate the supply between Sausalito and its other customers. This same contention is made in several forms in respondent's brief, but wherever made is without merit. It is said that all the company needed to do to entitle it to be paid for 200,000 gallons a day was to build a pipe line and then use its "best endeavors" to make enough water flow through it. The paragraph in question is not reasonably subject to such construction. It is the usual provision whereby a public service corporation protects itself from liability for failure to furnish its commodity because of strikes, accidents, and the like, against which it cannot reasonably provide. Where a party to a contract is excused from absolute performance because of an emergency the contract is not thereby void for lack of mutuality. Semon, Bache & Co. v. Coppes, Zook & Mutschler Co., 35 Ind. App. 351, 74 N. E. 43, 111 Am. St. Rep. 171. In Klosterman v. United Electric Light & Power Co., 101 Md. 33, 60 Atl. 252, the court was discussing a contract whereby certain subscribers agreed to pay a sum not less than a stated amount for electricity during the season "whether lamps burn or not." The agreement contained this language:

> "The electric company does not bind itself to furnish current at any particular time after the application has been accepted."

It was held that there was no lack of mutuality, the quoted language being intended to protect the defendant from unforeseen delays, such as strikes, but did not exempt it from complying literally with all of the terms of the contract, unless prevented from so doing by the exceptional occurrences against which it sought to provide. Generally a contract by which one party agrees to use his "best endeavors" to promote the sale of a commodity produced by the other party and to purchase from the producer all of such commodity as he may need and binding the producer absolutely to sell is valid and not wanting in mutuality. Spencer v. Taylor, 69 Kan. 493, 77 Pac. 276; Emerson v. Pacific Coast & Norway Packing Co., 96 Minn. 2, 104 N. W. 573, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 445, 113 Am. St. Rep. 603, 6 Ann. Cas. 973. Analogous to these are cases in which a vendee agrees merely to buy what he needs of a certain product and the vendor absolutely promises to sell. Such a contract imposes upon the vendee the duty of buying what he requires from the vendor and upon the latter the obligation to sell to him at the contract price. Manhattan Oil Co. v. Richardson Lubricating Co., 113 Fed. 923, 51 C. C. A. 553; Klipstein v. Allen (C. C.) 123 Fed. 992. And even contracts unilateral at first are sustained upon execution of the optional consideration. In this pleading it is alleged that at all times the plaintiff was ready, able, and willing to perform and did perform all of its duties arising under the agreement, including the supplying of an abundance of pure, fresh water; so that even if we should look upon the obligation of plaintiff to use its best endeavors as wanting the quality of mutuality at first, the perfect success of such endeavors, as pleaded, makes the agreement one capable of enforcement. Spires v. Urbahn, 124 Cal. 110, 56 Pac. 794; Gallagher v. Equitable Gaslight Co., 141 Cal. 707, 75 Pac. 329; Bell v. Southern Pacific R. R. Co., 144 Cal. 573, 77 Pac. 1124.

One of the cases upon which respondent lays great stress as bearing upon the alleged unfairness of the contract is Flynn v. Little Falls Electric & Water Co., 74 Minn. 183, 77 N. W. 38, 78 N. W. 106. The contract there discussed was one in which the city as a consumer was dealing with the water company. It was not acting as a water-selling corporation. The case is therefore not of any great value to us here. It was held by the Supreme Court of Minnesota that the long term of the contract, 30 years, the great number of hydrants to be paid for (35 or 40 per cent. more than the then present needs of the municipality), and the excessive price per hydrant (100 per cent. more than the real value) rendered the agreement void for unfairness. It was held, however, that the municipality had power to make reasonable contracts for the supply of water to it and its inhabitants.

[11] Nor is the contract void because it unreasonably binds Sausalito to make payments which may possibly be raised by taxes to be paid by a decreased population. Respondent cites, in the discussion of the possible decrease of the population and the bearing of such a phenomenon upon the agreement before us, the case of Westminster Water Co. v. Mayor & Common Council of Westminster, 98 Md. 552, 56 Atl. 990, 64 L. R. A. 630, 103 Am. St. Rep. 424. The citation is not apt. The contract there considered was one for the introduction of a supply of water into the city to be used in part for the suppression of fires and the sprinkling of streets. It was held ultra vires because it sought to bind the city perpetually, and unreasonable because it would deprive the council of legislative rights.

[12-14] Section 548 of the Civil Code is no bar to the purchase of water by a city under such a contract as this. That section was enacted in 1872, long before the adoption of section 19 of article 11 of the Constitution, and so far as it makes a street franchise necessary, was abrogated by that section, which at the time this contract was made gave to any corporation the right to occupy the streets of a city for the purpose of supplying water to the inhabitants or to the city itself. If we regard that part of section 548 of the Civil Code prohibiting the granting of an "exclusive right" as still in force, this agreement does not violate it because the contract does contemplate the possibility of the town's future purchase of water from sources other than those owned by plaintiff. Section 4412 of the Political Code, even if still in force, has reference to the supplying of water to public buildings and the term of contract for such service. Obviously it has no application to the facts of this case.

[15] It is contended that the contract disables the city from acquiring a municipal water supply of its own, and Long v. City of Duluth, 49 Minn. 285, 51 N. W. 913, 32 Am. St. Rep. 547, is cited. That case held that Duluth could not grant a monopoly and exclude itself from establishing a municipal water plant. Here Sausalito has established a municipal water system and formed a monopoly for itself by excluding the plaintiff and all others from serving its inhabitants. But we see no reason why a city or town clothed with power to buy water for its own distributing system may not agree to purchase water up to a given quantity exclusively from one company. Such a contract would be enforced even if the city should conclude to procure a supply of its own in addition to its own works. The power to contract for a reasonable length of time implies the power to forego other means of procuring water for a like period. Walla Walla v. Walla Walla Water Co., 172 U. S. 7, 19 Sup. Ct. 77, 43 L. Ed. 341.

[16] Does defendant's promise to pay for not less than 200,000 gallons of water a day amount to a loan of the credit of the town contrary to the provisions of section 31 of article 4 of the Constitution? Our answer to this question is in the negative. It is contended that the promise to pay for 200,000 gallons of water per day was based upon the covenants of the company to do certain things, among them to build a pipe line from Corte Madera, and that therefore the construction of the said pipe line was accomplished upon the loaned credit of the municipality. But we cannot accept that view. The obligation of the company was to be ready to deliver 200,000 gallons of water per day. The building of the pipe line without the delivery of the water, or the ability to deliver it, would have entitled the plaintiff to nothing at all. There is no parallel between this case and Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 524, 45 Pac. 824, 50 Pac. 670. In that case the rental which the town agreed to pay was based in part, at least, upon the consideration of the company's promise to build and operate a railroad outside of the city as the company's private enterprise. Here the company had a water supply distant from Sausalito, and the city contracted in view of that circumstance. The company's promise to extend its pipes at its own expense so that it might deliver water to the city was not at all analogous to the promise discussed in the Higgins Case. Of course, the contracting parties considered, as was proper, the reasonableness of the terms in view of the service to be rendered and the cost of performing such service, but we fail to see how the fact that part of the cost to the company was to be incurred after the signing of the contract converted any of the stipulations thereof into a loan of the town's credit. If the water company, at the date of the bargain with the city, had owned a pipe line capable to conveying sufficient water to the limits of the town, the trustees, in deciding whether or not the terms discussed were reasonable, would have taken into consideration the value of that pipe line as a part of the works of the water company. We fail to see how the situation was changed by the fact that conduits from Corte Madera to Sausalito were necessary before the Marin Water & Power Company could deliver water to the latter city. Neither does the fact, if it be a fact, that the water company would not have extended its system to Sausalito if this contract had not been made, in any way alter the situation. But it does not by any means appear that the extension of the water system of the plaintiff was induced solely by reason of the town's patronage. While the water company obligated itself to lay pipes from Corte Madera, it also secured the privilege of laying its mains through the streets of Sausalito for the purpose of delivering water to persons residing beyond and outside of that town.

Alter v. Cincinnati et al., 56 Ohio St. 59, 46 N. E. 69, 35 L. R. A. 737, declared unconstitutional an act which sought to permit cities to own waterworks in partnership with private proprietors. That authority is not at all in point here, and contains nothing in conflict with the views here expressed.

[17] Respondent assigns as a reason why its demurrer was properly sustained, the failure of the complaint to set forth the damage suffered by appellant which, according to respondent's theory, should be measured by the terms of section 3311 of the Civil Code as the difference between the contract price and the value to the water company of the water which the town of Sausalito did not take. The contract with which we are here concerned, however, is not the usual agreement to accept and pay for personal property. It is, as we have shown, one of that class of agreements in which one of the parties promises to pay a minimum sum for a commodity at a fixed rate, such amount to become due whether enough of the commodity to equal such minimum price at the agreed rate is required or not. Such agreements have been upheld, and the minimum rate has been sustained as the true measure of recovery; the promise to pay such sum being a part of the direct obligation of the contract and in no sense a covenant for liquidated damages in case of breach. Beck v. Indianapolis Light & Power Co., supra; Klosterman v. United Electric Light & Power Co., supra.

[18] The omission from the complaint of an allegation that there was money enough for the payment of plaintiff's claim in the "water supply fund" or in the "general fund" (to which plaintiff had promised to look for payment in case of deficiency in the former fund) was not a failure to state a cause of action. The condition of a particular fund would have nothing to do with the justness of a claim, and the depletion of such a fund is never a defense to an action against a municipality. The averment of the amount of money in a fund from which a given claim must be paid is therefore not necessary. Weaver v. San Francisco, 111 Cal. 327, 43 Pac. 972; Higgins v. San Diego Water Co., 118 Cal. 528, 45 Pac. 824, 50 Pac. 670; Doland v. Clark, 143 Cal. 179, 76 Pac. 958.

[19] Respondent asserts that the town by going into the business of furnishing its inhabitants with water itself becomes subject to the provisions of article 14, § 1, of the Constitution, and that it violates that section of the Constitution when it agrees to establish for a period of 10 years rates which will produce a sum sufficient to pay for all water furnished by the water company. In People v. Stephens, 62 Cal. 237, Mr. Justice Ross writing the opinion of the court, declared it too plain for argument that the rates or compensation required to be fixed by that section of the Constitution did not mean the rates or compensation to be collected by the municipality itself for water which it should furnish. Feil v. City of Cœur d'Alene, 23 Idaho, 63, 129 Pac. 643, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1095, was a case dealing with the bonds issued to pay for a municipal water system which was to be purchased. In the dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Stewart is a statement that the city may annually regulate rates in spite of an ordinance pledging it to keep in force prices sufficient to pay the expenses of operation and other charges in favor of the bonds. This is not authority on the point in support of which it is cited.

Respondent cites authorities to support the proposition that furnishing water to a town for distribution through its municipal system is a dedication of the water to a public use. He cites authority to the effect that water may be condemned as for a public use even where the distribution is to be made in part through the instrumentality of corporations other than the one seeking the condemnation. Undoubtedly that is the doctrine of such cases as State v. Superior Court of King County, 52 Wash. 199, 100 Pac. 317, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 448, the strongest authority on this point which is presented, but cases of eminent domain throw no light upon the main question in this case. While the water supplied by plaintiff to defendant is ultimately applied to public use, does the contract price therefor constitute the "rates" or the "compensation" subject to the "regulation" mentioned in section 1 of article 14 of the Constitution? We have been compelled to answer that question in the negative.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: LORIGAN, J; HENSHAW, J.

SHAW, J. (concurring). I concur in the judgment, but I do not think it is necessary to consider all the questions discussed in the opinion of Justice MELVIN. I base my concurrence upon the following propositions: I think it sufficiently appears that the Marin Water & Power Company was a public service corporation, engaged in selling water to the public. It does not follow, however, that all of the water it owned was actually applied to public use or ever had been so applied. The water which it agreed to sell and deliver to the town of Sausalito by the contract sued on was water which had not been previously used, either by the said company or by the public. If it had appeared that some rate-fixing authority having power in that behalf had fixed rates to be charged by the Marin Water & Power Company for sales of water by it to public use, it may be that a contract between the company and a purchaser for the sale of water at a different rate would be, to that extent, inoperative. But in this case no rate-fixing power having jurisdiction to fix rates for that company had ever exercised such power, and no rates at which that company should sell this water had been fixed. In this situation, the company clearly had the right to fix its own rates and make agreements with others for the sale of its water upon such rates, and such contracts would be binding upon both parties, at least until the proper authority had fixed a different rate. Fresno C. & I. Co. v. Park, 129 Cal. 437, 62 Pac. 87; Stanislaus Water Co. v. Bachman, 152 Cal. 730, 93 Pac. 858, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 359. This being an action to recover the amount due on such a contract for the sale of the water at a rate fixed by the parties, and no governmental authority having fixed a different rate, there can be no legal objection to the validity of the agreement, which is available as a defense to the claim for payment of the price agreed upon. Of course, if the Marin Water & Power Company was not a public service corporation, or had not dedicated the water which was the subject of this particular sale to any public use, there can be no question but that the contract under consideration would be valid and enforceable. In either case, therefore, I think the contract was valid and that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the amount due under it.

What the effect would be if a rate were fixed by competent authority for the government of said company in its supply to consumers is a question not here involved. Nor does the question arise whether the town of Sausalito could, by ordinance, fix rates for the Marin Water & Power Company different from those fixed by this contract. It has not fixed such rates. It is not seriously disputed that the town may control the rates to be charged by it to its inhabitants for this water so long as it does not thereby prevent the enforcement of this contract. What would be the result if such rates were too small to enable it to pay the sums due the company is another question not here involved. The possibility that it may do this is no defense to an action for water already furnished, nor does it make the contract invalid as against public policy. In my opinion none of these questions need be decided in this case. The case, as presented, is the very simple and ordinary case of an action to recover a sum due upon a contract as the purchase price of property sold and delivered in pursuance thereof.

For these reasons I think the plaintiff was entitled to recover, and that the judgment should be reversed.

SCHMIDT et ux. v. UNION OIL CO.
(Sac. 2110.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 8, 1914.)

APPEAL AND ERROR (§ 827*)—HEARING—SETTING ASIDE SUBMISSION—PLACING CASE ON WRONG CALENDAR.

Where the clerk of the Supreme Court inadvertently numbered a case as among those to be placed upon the calendar for the Sacramento district, though the appeal was from a county in the San Francisco district, and it was argued at Sacramento without any one appearing for the appellant, who had no notice of the setting of the case, the submission would be vacated and the cause placed upon the San Francisco calendar, since while counsel may not be entitled to specific notice that a case is set on one of the calendars for hearing, they are entitled to assume that it will not be put upon the calendar of a district to which the case does not belong.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Appeal and Error, Cent. Dig. § 3208; Dec. Dig. § 827.*]

In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. L. Short, Judge.

Action by C. H. Schmidt and wife against the Union Oil Company. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendant appeals. Submission of the cause vacated, and cause restored to the calendar.

Sutherland & Barbour, of Fresno, Thomas O. Toland, of Los Angeles, and W. A. Sutherland, of Fresno, for appellant. Joel H. Smith, of Selma, Geo. Cosgrave and M. K. Harris, both of Fresno, and Harris & Hayhurst, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. This is an appeal from a judgment of the superior court of Fresno county. The trial was had before Hon. M. L. Short, judge of the superior court of the county of Kings, sitting in Fresno county. In the division of counties of the state into districts for the hearing of appeals in this court, Fresno county is placed in the district of San Francisco and Kings county in the district of Sacramento. When the transcript on appeal was filed the clerk of this court assumed from the name of the judge that the appeal was from the county of Kings, and inadvertently numbered the case as among those to be placed upon the calendar for the Sacramento district. The appeal was subsequently assigned to department 1 and was placed upon the calendar of that department for argument at Sacramento on May 6, 1914. When the case was called for hearing there was no appearance for the appellant, counsel for respondent alone appearing and arguing, and the cause was submitted.

The appellant now calls our attention to the fact that the appeal was set for hearing in the wrong district, and that the appellant did not, nor did its attorneys, have any notice of the setting of the case. It is also stated that said attorneys desired and now desire to make an oral argument in support of the appeal.

Under these circumstances it is plain that the hearing and submission of the cause were irregular. The appeal should have been treated as one belonging to the San Francisco district, in which event it would have taken its proper place upon the San Francisco calendar. While counsel may not be entitled to any specific notice that a case is set on one of our calendars for hearing, they are entitled to assume that it will not be put upon the calendar of a district to which the case does not belong.

It is therefore ordered that the submission be vacated, and that the cause take its place among those to be set on the San Francisco calendar. The clerk is further directed to notify the attorneys for the respective parties of this order.

WARDEN et al. v. CITY OF SOUTH PASADENA. (L. A. 3354.)

1. MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS (§ 827*)—TORTS—DEFECTS IN DRAINS.

Where a city laid a drain pipe of sufficient size and proper construction to carry the water of a natural gully under a street, to which drain the owner of the land on the lower side of the street connected a smaller drain of inferior construction to carry the water through his land, the city is not liable to a grantee of the owner for damages caused by the flooding of the premises, due to the inferior construction of the drain through the land, and the cracking of the drain under the street because of pressure caused by the smaller connection.

2. EVIDENCE (§ 245*) — ADMISSIONS — PUBLIC OFFICERS.

John E. Carson, of Los Angeles, for appellant. John F. Poole, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The cause of action sued on arose, originally, in favor of Mrs. T. P. Jackson. The complaint alleges that it was assigned by Mrs. Jackson to the plaintiffs. The evidence shows that it was assigned to the plaintiff Julia P. Warden, and neither the complaint, the findings, nor the evidence show that the two plaintiffs sustained the relation of husband and wife, nor that the cause of action was the separate property of Julia P. Warden. No objection is made on this account by the defendant, and therefore, for purposes of this decision, we will assume that, if the plaintiffs are husband and wife, the subject of this litigation became the separate property of Julia P. Warden, and that C. D. Warden is a nominal party only.

The complaint alleges that Mrs. Jackson was the owner of a lot in the city of South Pasadena, situated at the southwest corner of Foothill street and Fair Oaks avenue, on which she had erected a dwelling house in which she resided; that prior to her purchase of the lot the city constructed and placed a drain pipe across Foothill street, in front of said lot, and across the said lot; that said drain pipe was defectively constructed; and that, during a heavy rain storm, the drain pipe broke where it crossed Foothill street and thereby the said lot and residence were flooded with the water from the drain pipe and greatly damaged.

The answer admitted that the city had constructed and placed a drain pipe across Foothill street, but denied that it had constructed or placed any pipe across the said lot, or that the drain pipe across Foothill street broke, or that it was defectively constructed.

The evidence showed that, before Mrs. Jackson acquired the lot, one Hardison owned the land on both sides of Foothill street, including this and other lots; that a gully or depression some 8 or 10 feet deep, formed by storm water, extended through this land and the lot in question, crossing said street at the place where the drain pipe was afterwards placed; that the city at one time placed a wooden box or culvert across the street to carry the water of the gully under the street; and that, during Hardison's ownership, the city, being about to grade and improve the street, took out the wooden culvert and laid in its place a 16-inch vitrified iron drain pipe, composed of joints 2½ feet long, being the pipe in question. This pipe was put there solely for the purpose of carrying under the street the water naturally flowing in the gully. It was well laid, properly connected, and of sufficient size to carry the water and withstand all pressure that would be put upon it from storm waters flowing therein under the natural conditions existing at the time it was laid. After laying this pipe the street was by the city graded and filled in across the depression, so that its surface was 10 feet above the pipe. After this was done, Hardison, the owner, began the improvement of his land. He put in a 12-inch drain pipe in the gully above Foothill street for a distance of over 400 feet, connecting it at the street with the upper end of the 16-inch pipe. Below the street the gully ran through the lot afterwards sold to Mrs. Jackson. In this part of the gully Hardison also laid a 12-inch pipe extending from the street line into the lot beyond the place where the house was afterwards erected. This pipe he connected with the lower end of the 16-inch pipe, at the street line, by inserting the 12-inch pipe into the 16-inch pipe and cementing around the connection. He did this without the consent of the city and over the protest of its street superintendent, who also, at the time, warned him that he should not connect a 12-inch pipe with a 16-inch pipe. The city had no connection whatever with the laying of the pipe in the land of Hardison. Hardison used inferior pipe. Some of it was broken, and he patched it with other pieces of pipe and cement. After laying this drain pipe in his land, Hardison filled in the gully to a level with the surface of the street, covering the pipe and leveling his ground so as to make it suitable for building lots, and thereupon he sold the lot in question to Mrs. Jackson.

She knew that the lot had been filled and leveled and that the 12-inch pipe had been laid in it, and, with that knowledge, she built the house and occupied it.

There was evidence that the kind of pipe used by the city and by Hardison is not designed to stand pressure, and that it will not stand a pressure of a head of water exceeding 8 or 10 feet, but that it is well adapted for drainage purposes if properly laid; also that when a 12-inch pipe is used as an outlet for a 16-inch pipe it tends to cause an obstruction at the junction when there is a flood of water; that this would cause the water to back up in the pipe to its head; and that the resulting pressure would be the greatest upon the 16-inch pipe just above the junction. The head of the pipe at the upper end above the street crossing was some 20 feet higher than its elevation at the crossing. There was also evidence that the 12-inch pipe leaked freely below the junction, and that around the house the lot in question had settled very much prior to the excessive flood complained of. An examination of the 16-inch pipe the day after the flood showed that it had not broken, but that there was a small crack in the top of one joint, barely wide enough to admit a case knife blade, through which some water had flowed, but that not enough could have come through this crack to have caused any damage to Mrs. Jackson's property.

[1] There is no tenable theory on which the city can be held liable for this damage. The case is unlike the case of Kramer v. Los Angeles, 147 Cal. 668, 82 Pac. 334, on which the plaintiffs rely. In the city of Los Angeles there was once a natural gully or arroyo, extending through a considerable portion of the city over private property, which carried much water in times of flood. The city, with the consent of the lot owners, had built therein, and was maintaining, a public storm drain, which, from its imperfect construction, burst and flooded Kramer's premises. The decision was that the city, having built this drain, was bound to use due care in its construction and in maintaining it, and that it was liable for the damage caused by its defective construction. In the case at bar the city of South Pasadena had done nothing more than simply to place a drain or culvert under the street to carry water from the upper to the lower side thereof. It is not claimed that this pipe was not of ample size and sufficiently strong for that purpose, if the land above and below had been left in its natural condition, or if extensions connecting with it had been of the same size and properly constructed. The evidence was to the effect that the small crack in the city pipe was caused by too much pressure of water and that this pressure was due to the negligence of Hardison, the plaintiff's predecessor in interest, in connecting a 12-inch pipe as an outlet to a 16-inch pipe. There was no drainage system built or maintained by the city which included the pipes under Mrs. Jackson's lot. The city had not undertaken to maintain these pipes, and it was under no obligation to do so. The fault was that of Hardison, for whose acts the city was not responsible. His successors, so far as this matter is concerned, stand in his shoes, and must suffer the consequences of his negligence. They have no recourse on the city.

[2] There was some testimony given by Mrs. Jackson, for the plaintiff, to the effect that on the day after the injury the defendant's street superintendent and city engineer had informed her that the city had put in the pipe extending under the lot. Neither of them were at that time acting in behalf of the city, nor speaking for it, and the statements so made, even if they made them, would not bind the city nor constitute evidence against it. The street superintendent testified that he did not make the statement and it appeared that the statements of the engineer on their face purported to be a mere narration of information, and not a statement of fact. The evidence showed without conflict that Hardison had laid the pipe as above related. The city engineer did not hold that office at the time the pipes were laid, and whatever he may have said on the subject was mere hearsay. There was no substantial conflict in the evidence on the material facts in the case. The court erred in holding the city liable for the damage.

The judgment and order are reversed.

HUMBLE v. GAY. (L. A. 3306.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1914.)

1. Gifts (§ 34*)—Inter Vivos—Condition.

Where a man had offered to give his collection of rugs to a woman at the same time that he proposed marriage to her, but she did not then accept either the rugs or the proposal, a subsequent letter, in which he stated that the rugs were at her disposal, manifested an intention that the rugs were to be given to her only on condition of marriage.

2. Gifts (§ 49*)—Inter Vivos.

When the claim of a gift is not asserted until after the death of the alleged donor, it must be sustained by clear and satisfactory evidence of every element necessary to such a gift.

A love letter written by a man to a woman to whom he had proposed marriage, in which he stated that certain rugs were at her disposal, was manifestly not intended to be used by her as evidence of her right to the rugs, and therefore was not a valid gift to her, under Civ. Code, § 1147, providing that a gift is not valid unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolic delivery of the thing given.

Hon. Victor E. Shaw of that court and concurred in by Mr. Justice James, is adopted as the opinion and judgment of this court:

Action in claim and delivery to obtain possession of 119 Indian blankets and rugs held by defendant as executor of the estate of Frank P. Sauerwein, deceased, which blankets and rugs plaintiff claims were the subject of a gift inter vivos made to her by Sauerwein. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

The only evidence touching the question in issue was that given by plaintiff, from which it appears that plaintiff, whose home was at Decatur, Ill., came to California in 1909, where, in February, 1910, she met Sauerwein, who at the time was the owner of the blankets and rugs in question, having them stored at the house of Mrs. Gay. During plaintiff's stay in California, which ended in April, 1910, she and Sauerwein saw much of each other. The acquaintance on his part developed to the extent that he sought an engagement of marriage with her, at which time, while discussing the rugs and a picture of his house at Taos, he said to her:

"They are yours; you may have those. I will give those to you."

"The day," says plaintiff, "that he said that I might have the rugs was the same day that he proposed to me. I did not accept him then or afterwards. I did not accept the rugs, and I did not accept his offer of marriage. We were never really engaged. * * * There was something probably as binding as that, or more binding. We were very close to each other."

On her way home, and while at the Grand Canyon, plaintiff wrote Sauerwein, who was in Los Angeles, in which letter she referred to the beauty of the rugs which she had seen at the Hopi House and expressed a desire to see his collection of rugs. In response to this letter Sauerwein, on April 9, 1910, wrote her as follows:

"My Dear Girl:

"Although I failed to find your letter, as I hoped, at the Art School, it came later to the house, where I found it on returning from my second daily visit at the doctor's office. It was a good letter. You believed that you wrote it under two different moods, because it was written at different times, but it really was much the same in spirit throughout. Possibly there was some slight expression born of the night, the absence of the sun's light; but it was you from first to last. You said much in a few brief pages. Especially welcome was the spirit in your words: 'When I see you we will talk about it in detail.' No matter what 'it' might be we were to talk about (it was the G. Cañon), the way you wrote the sentence appealed to me. I have wished much for you; awakening with a gray dawn this morning, the desire was almost oppressive.

"So, Miss Humble, you liked the old rugs at the Hopi House, and really have a desire to see my collection. I think you are very lacking in both enthusiasm and appreciation. Now why did you not say something to the effect that you had not before understood my liberality and princely generosity when I told you that you might have them; merely because I made no blatant boast, you did not give my collection a second thought. O you!! Well, you perverse person, I still have what I assure you is a very rare accumulation of Indian textiles, and—now mark my prodigal—what? selfishness—they are (I make a low salaam) at your disposal. There!

"I am very glad you liked Mr. Brant. You say that he is a very fine nature. I must not write more now, for a Mr. Maxwell is about due here to look at my work. Not to buy. He is the one writing the art papers for Chicago magazines. The day is gray and chill; yesterday was like it. I wish you had taken me to the desert. * * * [Signed] Francis."

The remainder of the letter refers to medical treatment being administered to him and negotiations for the sale of pictures. In reply to this letter plaintiff testified that she wrote Sauerwein saying:

"Mr. Sauerwein, I will accept the rugs, meaning I will surprise you by saying I will take the rugs, because he had offered them to me before and I wrote, sort of feeling he would be surprised about it; that I would now take the rugs since he had offered them to me before."

Plaintiff's contention that Sauerwein gave her the rugs, in the absence of any delivery thereof, is based upon the paragraph of this letter commencing with the sentence:

"So, Miss Humble, you liked the old rugs at the Hopi House, and really have a desire to see my collection."

While other letters passed between Sauerwein and plaintiff, no further reference by either of them appears to have been made to the rugs, or the alleged gift thereof. On April 19th Sauerwein left California for Stamford, Conn., where he died June 14, 1910. After the death of Sauerwein, plaintiff, in August, 1910, received a copy of his will, and on two occasions saw defendant in Chicago, where she talked to him about Sauerwein's estate; he telling her that Sauerwein had left everything to her. She did not tell defendant that Sauerwein had in his lifetime given her the rugs, though she told him that he had offered her everything he had. Plaintiff knew the rugs were packed and left by Sauerwein at Mrs. Gay's, and although she returned to California in March, 1912, and called at Mrs. Gay's, she made no claim to the rugs, nor referred to the fact that Sauerwein had given them to her; nor did she, until some two years after the death of Sauerwein and immediately before instituting this suit, disclose to any one connected with Sauerwein's estate the fact that she claimed the rugs as a gift.

Section 1146, Civil Code, defines a gift as "a transfer of personal property, made voluntarily, and without consideration." It may be made verbally, in which case it "is not valid, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the thing are given, nor, if it is capable of delivery, unless there is an actual or symbolical delivery of the thing to the donee" (section 1147); or by an instrument in writing, sufficient in form and words used to transfer title, duly executed and delivered by the donor to the donee, with a purpose of transferring title and constituting means whereby the person to whom the gift is made may obtain actual possession thereof, in which case delivery of the property is not a necessary prerequisite to the validity of the gift. Estate of Hall, 154 Cal. 531, 98 Pac. 269.

[1, 2] Plaintiff relies upon the letter from Sauerwein, dated April 9, 1910, as such duly executed instrument in writing, sufficient in form and substance to transfer the title to the rugs. The claim of gift was not asserted by plaintiff until long after the donor's death. "When the claim of a gift is not asserted until after the death of the alleged donor, it should be sustained by clear and satisfactory evidence of every element which is requisite to constitute a gift." Denigan v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389. "Gifts first asserted after the death of the alleged donor are always regarded with suspicion by the courts." Matter of Manhardt, 17 App. Div. 1, 44 N. Y. Supp. 836. See, also, In re O'Connell, 33 App. Div. 483, 53 N. Y. Supp. 748; De Puy v. Stevens, 37 App. Div. 291, 55 N. Y. Supp. 810. According to plaintiff's testimony the relation of Sauerwein to her was and had been that of a man addressing the woman whom he sought to make his wife. In view of this relation and the fact that he had on a former occasion, coupled with a proposal of marriage, which plaintiff did not accept, offered to give her the rugs and the house at Taos, it is but fair to assume that the statement contained in the letter, "they are at your disposal," was likewise intended to be coupled with the condition that plaintiff should agree to marry him. This conclusion is borne out by the fact that in the letter he speaks of the occasion "when I told you that you might have them," which refers to the time of his proposal. Hence, if the statement in the letter be deemed sufficient to transfer the title, it was without consideration, but on condition that plaintiff accept his proposal of marriage, which she says she never did. Whether the transaction be deemed a gift or a contract, performance of the condition was a necessary prerequisite to the passing of title.

[3] Not only are the words used in the letter, "they are at your disposal," inapt and inappropriate words of transfer, especially when inserted in a document which did not purport to be a conveyance (Davis v. McGrew, 82 Cal. 135, 23 Pac. 41), and therefore insufficient to transfer the rugs to plaintiff, but, in our opinion, it is manifest that Sauerwein never intended that this love letter should constitute the means whereby plaintiff should obtain from Mrs. Gay possession of the rugs. Says the Supreme Court, in Knight v. Tripp, 121 Cal. 674, 54 Pac. 267:

> "There must be both a purpose to give and the execution of this purpose. The purpose must be expressed—either orally or in writing—and it must be executed by the actual delivery to the donee of the thing given, or of the means of getting possession and enjoyment thereof. A written instrument may be available for designating the property intended to be given, as well as to show the intention of the donor, but by itself it no more establishes the gift than would the same words orally delivered by the donor. * * * It is the fact of delivery that converts the unexecuted and revocable purpose into an executed and complete gift."

See, also, Allen-West Comm. Co. v. Grumbles, 129 Fed. 289, 63 C. C. A. 401. If it was not intended that the letter should divest Sauerwein of all dominion over the rugs and constitute the sole and only evidence of plaintiff's title as a means of enabling her to obtain possession thereof, then clearly some further act on the part of Sauerwein was contemplated as necessary in order for plaintiff to obtain possession thereof, in which case the letter was merely an expression of intention to make a gift.

The judgment is reversed.

WILMARTH v. PACIFIC MUT. LIFE INS. CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (Sac. 2070.)

(Supreme Court of California. Oct. 5, 1914. Rehearing Denied Nov. 4, 1914.)

1. Insurance (§ 527*) — Risks Insured against — Death while in "Passenger Elevator."

Under an accident insurance policy providing for double indemnity for any bodily injury sustained by insured while in a passenger elevator, the term "passenger elevator" did not refer to a definite type of elevator, but included any elevator ordinarily or customarily used for conveying passengers, though also used for conveying freight, and though not of any particular form, made in any particular way or with any particular kind of gates or safety contrivances.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1312, 1313; Dec. Dig. § 527.*]

2. Carriers (§ 280*)—Liability for Injuries—Owner of Elevators.

The liability of the owner of an elevator for injury to a passenger is analogous to that of a common carrier.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Carriers, Cent. Dig. §§ 1085–1092, 1098–1103, 1105, 1106, 1109, 1117; Dec. Dig. § 280.*]

3. Evidence (§ 455*)—Parol Evidence—Construction of Contract.

In an action on an insurance policy providing for double indemnity for injuries sustained while in a passenger elevator, evidence as to a conversation between insured and the person who secured the insurance and delivered the policy relative to the meaning of the double indemnity clause was properly excluded, the words of the policy not being ambiguous, and it not appearing that such person had authority to amplify or extend the meaning of the language of the contract.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Evidence, Cent. Dig. § 2104; Dec. Dig. § 455.*]

4. Evidence (§ 455*)—Parol Evidence—Construction of Contract.

In an action on an insurance policy providing for double indemnity for injuries sustained while in a passenger elevator, evidence that among those engaged in the manufacture of elevators, the term "passenger elevator" had a definite meaning, and that the elevator in question, though used for the carriage of both passengers and freight, was not a passenger elevator, was properly excluded, as those words used in a policy of insurance are to be construed in their ordinary and popular sense.

6. EVIDENCE (§ 474*)—OPINION EVIDENCE—NONEXPERT WITNESSES.

In an action on an insurance policy providing for double indemnity for injuries sustained in a passenger elevator, witnesses who had opportunities for observing the elevator in question and the frequency of its use were properly admitted to testify that it was used for passengers during a certain percentage of the trips, this being the sort of opinion evidence that nonexperts may give when they have opportunity of observation, ordinary attention, and intelligence and veracity, and the fact that they took no accurate or systematic data with reference to the trips of the elevator going to the weight rather than to the admissibility of the testimony.

7. INSURANCE (§ 527*) — RISKS INSURED AGAINST—DEATH WHILE IN PASSENGER ELEVATOR.

Under an insurance policy providing for double indemnity for injuries sustained while "in" a passenger elevator, the insurer was liable for the double indemnity, where insured sustained injuries from which he died while alighting from a moving elevator.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Insurance, Cent. Dig. §§ 1312, 1313; Dec. Dig. § 527.*]

8. INSURANCE (§ 527*) — RISKS INSURED AGAINST—DEATH WHILE IN PASSENGER ELEVATOR.

Under an insurance policy providing for double indemnity for injuries sustained while in a passenger elevator, where insured stepped or fell from a moving elevator and then fell down the elevator shaft, if the moving cause of the killing originated in the elevator, the insurer was liable even though death was produced by the fall down the shaft, and hence an instruction that the double indemnity could not be recovered unless the injury was sustained while in a passenger elevator was properly modified by inserting after the word "injury" the phrase "or the proximate cause thereof."

9. TRIAL (§ 266*)—INSTRUCTIONS—REFERENCE TO AUTHORSHIP OF INSTRUCTIONS.

It was not error for the court to preface the instructions requested by each party with a statement as to the party that had requested such instructions, as the jurors must have known that when adopted the instructions became those of the court without regard to authorship.

Department 2. Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; C. N. Post, Judge.

Action by Glenna Wilmarth against the Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California. From a judgment for plaintiff and an order denying a new trial, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. H. Davis, of Los Angeles, and A. M. Seymour and Archibald Yell, both of Sacramento, for appellant. Devlin & Devlin, of Sacramento, for respondent.

MELVIN, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment and from an order denying its motion for a new trial.

The suit was upon a policy of accident insurance issued to Charles B. Wilmarth, husband of the plaintiff. Mr. Wilmarth was killed by a fall from an elevator, and the defendant acknowledged liability under the policy for the sum of $5,500, which was paid into court. The policy provided that the indemnity therein specified should be doubled if the bodily injury should be sustained by the insured "while in a passenger elevator (excluding elevators in mines)." Judgment was given for the amount of double indemnity, and appellant's principal objections thereto are based upon the alleged errors of the court in giving instructions relative to the meaning of the expression "passenger elevator."

The elevator in question was in the Studebaker building in the city of Sacramento. The building was five stories in height and was occupied by the Studebaker Company in the conduct of its business of selling automobiles, wagons, and other vehicles and farming implements. The record contains a photograph of the elevator, as well as a description of its dimensions. The floor of the elevator was 9 feet 2 inches wide and 19 feet 6 inches long. The long sides were protected by substantial wire nettings but the ends were open. At the entrances to the shaft on the floors of the building there were gates which moved in grooves in upright posts set at the corners of the shaft. These gates moved up and down and were balanced by weights attached to pulleys, much in the same manner that windows are commonly provided with counterweights.

The accident which resulted in Mr. Wilmarth's death occurred at a time when a salesman of the Studebaker Company, Mr. Halsey Smith, was in charge of the elevator. Mr. Shearer, an employé of a contractor who was doing some electrical work in the building, and Mr. Wilmarth, who was secretary of the association giving the Citrus Fair, got into the elevator at the ground floor. Mr. Wilmarth took a position near the operator and gave him a cigar, and in response to an inquiry by the latter said that he wanted to get off at the third floor. No attempt was made to stop the elevator at the second floor but Mr. Shearer stepped off there, the gate to the elevator shaft being raised. Mr. Wilmarth dashed past Smith as the elevator approached the second floor. The latter hearing a noise looked around and saw Mr. Wilmarth with his feet upon the floor of the building and the elevator just scraping his shoulders. Mr. Shearer who had stepped off the elevator at the second floor and had advanced 8 or 10 feet, heard an unusual noise and turning saw Mr. Wilmarth with his shoulders against the edge of the platform and his feet on the second floor. No part of his body was in the elevator. "I tried to catch him," said Mr. Shearer in his testimony. "The elevator was off the floor about 2½ or 3 feet, and he just tipped right back and went down the shaft and his feet dragged over. The elevator was going up all the time." The distance from the second floor of the building to the bottom of the raised gate was 6½ feet.

The evidence shows that the elevator had long been used for conveying both freight and passengers. It had a guaranteed capacity for 8,000 pounds which had probably been exceeded on at least one occasion. The Studebaker Company maintained an electric garage on the second floor, and eight or nine electric automobiles were daily taken up and down in the elevator. The third floor was not occupied by merchandise, but was being reserved for a Citrus Fair, which was to be given, and which was given, at a time commencing two days after the accident. About a week previous to Mr. Wilmarth's death a ball had been given on the floor assigned to the Citrus Fair by the management of that enterprise. The elevator was used in conveying the guests who attended the ball in large numbers. On that occasion the manager of the Studebaker Company put an extra man on the elevator to attend to opening and closing the gates and to prevent overcrowding. During the progress of the fair gates were placed inside the elevator, and ingress and egress were permitted only through one of these gates. The elevator was commonly used by the employés of the Studebaker Company in passing between the various floors of the building and in conveying customers. It was also used in moving all of the automobiles and other merchandise belonging to the corporation.

[1] Appellant's first point of attack is upon the following instructions given by the court:

"The court instructs the jury in this case that a passenger elevator, within the meaning of the terms of the policy of the insured, is one in which passengers are ordinarily carried. If you find from the evidence that the elevator referred to in the evidence was one in which passengers were, on and prior to February 11, 1911, carried up and down at various times, it was a passenger elevator within the meaning of the policy, at the time of the injuries received by Wilmarth, although it may have been used for purposes of carrying freight.

"The court instructs you that a passenger elevator need not be of any particular form, or made in any particular way, or with any particular contrivance or device. It does not mean that it must be used exclusively for the carriage of passengers. If it is customarily used for the carriage of passengers, this is sufficient to constitute it a passenger elevator within the meaning of the policy. If the jury believe that a large number of persons have been carried at various times in this elevator, as passengers, and has been used daily for the carriage of persons, it then is a passenger elevator.

"The court instructs the jury that a passenger elevator need not be of any particular form or size or have any particular kind of gate or safety contrivance. If an elevator is customarily used for the purposes of carrying human beings as passengers from one floor of a building to another floor in the same building, it is to be considered a passenger elevator."

The court refused the following proposed instructions of the defendant:

"I instruct you that if said elevator was designed and constructed for the carriage of freight and was prior to and up to the time of the injury to the insured used for the carriage of freight, then said elevator is not a passenger elevator within the terms of the policy of insurance issued by the defendant to said insured.

"I instruct you that an elevator designed and constructed for the purpose of carrying freight and used in the carriage of freight, although the same may at times be used for the carriage of passengers, is not a passenger elevator within the meaning of the policy of insurance referred to in the pleadings and evidence in this case."

Appellant contends that the purpose which the insurer had in mind was to offer double indemnity for accidents suffered in elevators devoted to the carriage of passengers exclusively, because such elevators are commonly more carefully safeguarded than those used for the moving of freight, and that the chances of accidents from their operation are very slight. The answer to this position of appellant is that if the insurer had intended such a limitation upon the term "passenger elevator" it would have been very easy to express the exact meaning desired. But, counsel for defendant assert there is a complete analogy between the terms "freight car" and "passenger car" and the expressions "freight elevator" and "passenger elevator," and the ordinary man when he uses the term "freight car" or "passenger car" immediately pictures in his mind a type of construction. So also (they argue), the terms "freight elevator" and "passenger elevator" convey definite pictures of types of elevators. There are two objections to this argument. One is that types of elevators are not crystallized in the mind like types of cars, and the other is that the only reason for associating the terms "freight car" and "passenger car" with definite forms of construction is that customarily the types named are devoted to the one or the other purpose of carrying merchandise or persons so that after all it is the customary use of the car which gives each term definite outline in the mind. While there are many elevators devoted exclusively to the carriage of passengers and many to the moving of merchandise only, there are very many used for both purposes. For illustration: In the building in which this opinion is being prepared there are three elevators. Two of them are used for the carrying of people only. The third, which is very large conveys merchandise and heavy articles of various kinds, but it is often used to carry passengers and is constructed with all of the same sort of safety appliances as those which are in use upon the other elevators. The only apparent difference between them is that one is larger and stronger than the other. Most of us are familiar with the "two-story" type of elevator, formerly much in vogue in rural hotels, having a compartment for passengers and beneath it one for carrying trunks. The analogy between elevators and cars therefore is not complete. But even if we were to accept an analogy between elevators and trains, such an elevator as we are here discussing would be quite similar to a "mixed train" which is recognized as a "passenger train." Chicago Great Western Ry. Co. v. St. Paul Union Depot Co., 68 Minn. 224, 71 N. W. 23.

[2] In determining the liability of the owner of an elevator for injury to a passenger this court has long been committed to the doctrine that the responsibility is analogous to that of a common carrier. Treadwell v. Whittier, 80 Cal. 576. At page 585, 22 Pac. 266, at page 269 (5 L. R. A. 498, 13 Am. St. Rep. 175), the report of the opinion in that case contains the following language:

> "The defendants used their elevator in lifting persons vertically to the height of 40 feet. That they were carriers of passengers, and should be treated as such, we have no doubt. The same responsibilities as to care and diligence rested on them as on the carriers of passengers by stagecoach or railway."

In that case, as in this, the elevator was used for moving merchandise and for transporting customers from floor to floor of the building. In Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 121 Cal. 459, 53 Pac. 919, 41 L. R. A. 467, 66 Am. St. Rep. 49, the court was discussing a policy of insurance which promised double indemnity if the injuries should be received while the person insured should be "riding as a passenger in any passenger conveyance using steam." He was killed while riding, by invitation of the superintendent, on the engine of a passenger train. It was contended that the engine was not a conveyance provided for the transportation of passengers. After citing the well-recognized rule that policies of insurance are to be liberally construed in favor of the assured, the court held that the locomotive was a part of the "conveyance" provided for the transportation of passengers. The court said, among other things:

> "If it had been intended to restrict the insured to any particular part of the conveyance, apt words to express such intention could have been readily found and used."

Speaking of the meaning of the word "passenger" as employed in that policy and applying to Mr. Berliner, the court further said:

> "Though upon the engine, he was a passenger. That he did not lose his character as a passenger by going upon the engine at the request of an officer of the road, see Lake Shore, etc., R. R. Co. v. Brown, 123 Ill. 186, 14 N. E. 197, 5 Am. St. Rep. 510; McGee v. Missouri Pac. Ry. Co., 92 Mo. 208, 4 S. W. 739, 1 Am. St. Rep. 706; Nashville, etc., R. R. Co. v. Erwin, 3 Am. & Eng. R. R. Cas. 465. These were cases that involved the liability of the railroad company for injury to its passengers while rightfully upon the engine, and were not cases of accident insurance; but the word 'passenger' as here used is evidently intended to designate the character or relation the insured sustained to the proprietor of the conveyance, and are therefore in point."

If the word "passenger" in a policy as applied to the individual must be measured by the relation of the carrier to the person injured, must not the word when used adjectively and applied to the conveyance or vehicle be similarly construed? We see no escape from such a conclusion.

In Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Austin, 116 Ga. 264, 42 S. E. 522, 59 L. R. A. 107, 94 Am. St. Rep. 125, the policy under review was one in which the beneficiary was guaranteed double indemnity if the insured were injured "while riding as a passenger and being actually in or upon a railway passenger car." Mr. Austin who was a paymaster of the railroad company was killed while traveling in his "pay car." It was held that he was not in contemplation of the contract a "passenger" and that his car, although it was capable of being used as a vehicle for the transportation of passengers and had formerly been so used, was not a "passenger car" within the meaning of the words of the policy. Special stress was laid in that case upon the fact that the assured, was an employé, and the court reviewed and carefully differentiated the facts from those of the Berliner Case, saying:

> "That case, however, cannot properly be compared to the one now under consideration, because the relationship of the insured to the railroad company in the two cases was widely different."

The authority is directly in point on the theory of respondent that the use to which a vehicle is put is the criterion.

In Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Frierson, 114 Fed. 66, 51 C. C. A. 434, Mr. Justice Lurton, then a circuit judge, was examining a case involving a provision exactly similar to the one in the policy in the Berliner Case. Frierson had met his death while on a steamer in which he and his companions were being taken up an Alaskan river. One man on the boat was a passenger who had paid his fare. Others of the party were navigating the steamer, and all except the passenger nam ed above were to pay for their food and transportation with one-half of their earnings during the first two years in Alaska. It was held that Frierson was a passenger on a passenger conveyance and the learned judge said:

> "That the Jessie was not 'a public conveyance in the usual lines of travel as a common carrier of passengers' may be true. But, if the insurance company intended to limit the benefits of its contract to passengers who travel 'in conveyances operated in the usual lines of travel as common carriers,' it should have so stipulated. This it did not do."

Under the authorities above cited we are satisfied that the instructions given by the court were correct, and that those refused were properly rejected.

Appellant has cited numerous cases to the effect that one who rides in a freight elevator is not entitled to demand the same appliances for safety as are requisite to a passenger elevator, and that such a person assumes the greater risk incurred by intrusting himself to the less carefully safeguarded elevator, just as one who accepts carriage on a freight train does so at the peril of incurring the dangers incident to that mode of travel but absent from transportation on a passenger train. Such is the doctrine of Kappes v. Brown Shoe Co., 116 Mo. App. 154, 90 S. W. 1158, cited by appellant. That was a case in which the elevator had been used for freight and for carrying employés of the defendant. The shaft was protected by gates similar to the ones in the Studebaker building. At closing time a number of workmen on the sixth floor crowded against the gate and the operator of the elevator refused to open it, proceeding on his way to the seventh floor. Some of the people in the front of the crowd raised the door and were pushed into the shaft by the pressure of their fellow workmen behind them. It was held that the gate was properly constructed, and that the negligence of the persons who raised it contributed to the accident. There was no question of injury to a passenger, and the case is only valuable as holding that an elevator not used exclusively for passengers, but mainly for freight, need not have the same safety devices as one dedicated exclusively to the carrying of passengers. So in Hall v. Murdock, 114 Mich. 233, 72 N. W. 150, the rule announced was that when a man is invited to ride upon a freight elevator—that is "one designed for freight alone"—he must be held to know that it is not equipped with the same regard to safety as a passenger elevator. Sievers v. Peters Box & Lumber Co., 151 Ind. 642, 50 N. E. 877, 52 N. E. 399, dealt with an accident in which the person injured who was in the employ of the defendant, rode on a freight elevator on the first day of its operation by invitation of a fellow servant, but without the knowledge or consent of the employer. The case involved no determination with reference to an elevator held out by its owner to the use of passengers. Hoehmann v. Moss Engraving Co., 4 Misc. Rep. 160, 23 N. Y. Supp. 787, also involved the riding of a servant in a freight elevator without consent of his employer. Steele v. Southern Railway, 55 S. C. 389, 33 S. E. 509, 74 Am. St. Rep. 756; Chicago & Alton R. R. Co. v. Arnol, 144 Ill. 261, 33 N. E. 204, 19 L. R. A. 313; Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co. v. Bisch, 120 Ind. 549, 22 N. E. 662; McGee v. Missouri Pacific Ry. Co., 92 Mo. 209, 4 S. W. 739, 1 Am. St. Rep. 706, cited by appellant, are all "freight train" cases announcing the well-known doctrine that where a passenger is received by a company on its freight train the same degree of care is due him that the road owes to its passengers on its regular trains, except that in going on a freight train he acquiesces in the usual incidents and conduct of a freight train managed by competent and prudent men. Not one of these cited cases detracts from the doctrine that a passenger elevator is one in which passengers are ordinarily carried.

[3] Mr. Peck who secured the insurance for Mr. Wilmarth and delivered the policy to him was interrogated with reference to a conversation held with the assured in which the meaning of the double indemnity clause was discussed. Objections to these questions were sustained upon the ground that defendant was seeking to vary the terms of a written contract by parol. These rulings are attacked upon the ground that it was permissible to show the peculiar and special sense in which the parties to the contract understood its terms of doubtful meaning. In this behalf Wigmore on Evidence is cited (sections 2465 and 2461). We have no dissent to offer to the doctrines there laid down but they do not apply to the rulings which we are now considering for the reasons (1) that the words of the agreement are not ambiguous, and (2) it was not shown that the witness had authority to amplify or explain the meaning of any words in the contract to which he was not a party.

[4] Mr. Van Emon, a veteran manufacturer of elevators, was asked a number of questions for the purpose of establishing the facts that the term "passenger elevator" had attained a definite meaning generally, and that the elevator used by the Studebaker Company was not a "passenger elevator." The objections to such questions were properly sustained. The contract was not one requiring expert testimony for its interpretation. Whatever the terms "passenger elevator" and "freight elevator" may mean technically to those engaged in the manufacture of lifts, these expressions in a policy of insurance are to be construed in their ordinary and popular sense.

[5] Over the objection of defendant plaintiff was permitted to introduce evidence to the effect that after the accident the elevator was used for carrying passengers. In any view of the evidence defendant was not harmed by the rulings as the evidence established, without contradiction, the manner in which and the purposes for which the elevator had been used prior to the accident, and the subsequent use was not different.

[6] Witnesses Richards and Smith were allowed to testify that the elevator was used for passengers during a certain percentage of the trips. Both were employés of the Studebaker Company who had opportunities for observing the elevator and the frequency of its use. This was the sort of opinion evidence that persons not experts may give, when they have "opportunity of observation, ordinary attention, and intelligence and veracity." Lewis, Authority on Matter of Opinion, c. 2, § 5. The objection that they had taken no accurate or systematic data with reference to the trips of the elevator went rather to the weight than to the admissibility of their testimony.

[7] Defendant moved for a nonsuit for alleged insufficiency of the evidence. The first ground of the motion was that the elevator was not a passenger elevator. This ground has been sufficiently discussed and determined adversely to appellant's contention. The second ground is that the injury sustained by decedent was not received while he was in an elevator. It is the theory of defendant that riding in an elevator is accompanied by very slight risk, while jumping on or from a moving elevator is decidedly dangerous, and that in promising double indemnity for injuries received in passenger elevators the insurer was purposely limiting the locus of the accident.

Three cases are cited in support of appellant's position. These are Anable v. Fidelity & Casualty Co., 73 N. J. Law, 320, 63 Atl. 92, Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Vandecar, 86 Fed. 283, 30 C. C. A. 48, and Van Bokkelen v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 34 App. Div. 399, 54 N. Y. Supp. 307.

In the first case cited the facts were in brief these: The contract of insurance provided double indemnity for injury received while riding as a passenger "in or on a public conveyance propelled by steam." The assured left a train on which he was a passenger and went to a news stand while the train was stationary. The train started on time and the assured ran across the platform and attempted to get on board the moving train, with the result that he was thrown under the wheels and killed. It was held that he was not in or on the car at the time of the accident, and that the insurance company was not required to pay double indemnity.

The clause of indemnity considered in Ætna Life Ins. Co. v. Vandecar, supra, was the same as that before the court in the Anable Case. The assured testified that while standing on the platform as the train approached a station he had his valise in one hand and his other hand was in his overcoat pocket. A sudden lurch of the train threw a fellow passenger against him and he was precipitated to the ground. It was held that while riding on the platform the assured was not a passenger in a passenger conveyance using steam. It will be seen at once that this case is in absolute conflict with Californian authority. Berliner v. Travelers' Ins. Co., supra. Judge Thayer wrote a powerful dissenting opinion, in which he said among other things:

> "The defendant company intended to offer travelers special inducements to become insured against the risk of injury incurred while traveling, by promising them a double indemnity for that class of injuries, and a technical construction ought not to be placed on the policy to shield it from liability for a loss that is fairly within the terms of its contract. It must be borne in mind that the rule is to construe an insurance policy most strongly against the company, because such contracts are invariably drawn by the insurer, and reasonable doubts arising from the language which it has employed should be resolved against it. It cannot be said that the use of the word 'in' in the policy in suit so clearly evidences an intention to pay a double indemnity only in those cases where the insured is injured while traveling on the inside of a railway or street car as to put the case at bar beyond the reach of that rule of construction. In my judgment, the rule in question should, in itself, have led to a different interpretation of the clause relating to double indemnity than the one which has been adopted by the majority of the court."

This is quite in accord with the decisions in California, and we cannot consider the majority opinion as expressing the rule for us to follow.

The identical clause which was before the court in the other two cases came up for interpretation in the Van Bokkelen Case and the court gave strict interpretation to the language, holding that one injured by falling from an open platform of a car was not within the terms of the agreement for double indemnity. We are of the opinion, however, that even conceding the injuries to have followed Mr. Wilmarth's act of leaving the elevator the language of the policy is broad enough to cover such a case. It has been held by the Supreme Court of Georgia that the assured is entitled to recover the augmented indemnity, although he was injured in attempting to alight from a moving car. King v. Travelers' Ins. Co., 101 Ga. 64, 28 S. E. 661, 65 Am. St. Rep. 288.

"Actually traveling in a public conveyance" were the words construed in Tooley v. Assurance Co., Fed. Cas. No. 14,098. The assured was hurt while trying to get on board of the moving train which he had left temporarily at the station while it was at a standstill.

A man is "traveling by public conveyance" who attempts to board a moving omnibus. Champlin v. Railway P. Ins. Co., 6 Lans. (N. Y.) 71. The same language was held to apply to a person who was making a journey by connecting steamship and railway lines and fell upon a slippery sidewalk while walking from the steamboat landing to the railway station. Northrup v. Railway, etc., Assurance Co., 43 N. Y. 516, 3 Am. Rep. 724.

Theobold v. Assurance Co., 10 Exch. 45, was a case in which the policy referred to a "railway accident" which might be suffered by the assured while traveling "in any class of carriage." The assured was injured after the train reached its destination. He slipped on the step while descending from the carriage to the platform. He recovered damages. "A person may be said to be traveling in a public conveyance until he has alighted therefrom and completely disconnected himself therefrom and landed." May on Insurance, § 524.

In Depue v. Travelers' Ins. Co. (C. C.) 166 Fed. 183, the decisions were reviewed and the court expressed the opinion that they could not be fully reconciled.

> "The disposition of the courts to construe accident policies against the companies remains, even where the clause under consideration provides for double indemnity. But in that event it is ordinarily presumed that the parties had a special risk in view, and the construction will endeavor to carry out their intention. If the language, however, is fairly capable of a construction favorable to the insured, this will be given, although the clause provides for double indemnity. Thus, in Preferred Accident Ins. Co. v. Muir, 126 Fed. 926, 61 C. C. A. 456, a case decided in this circuit, the insured was fatally injured by being thrown from the platform of a rapidly moving car, but it was held by the Court of Appeals that double indemnity could be recovered under a clause providing therefor if the insured should be injured while riding as a passenger in 'or on' a public conveyance, the ground for the decision being that the court was not at liberty to say that, when the stipulation reads in 'or on' a public conveyance, this means inside a railroad car. On the whole, therefore, it seems to me that, since the question of double indemnity is not presented by the present controversy, I am at liberty to adopt what appears to be a reasonable construction of the language used by the policy in suit, and to hold that a flexible and not a rigid meaning should be attached to the words, 'while in a passenger elevator.'"

We fully agree with this interpretation which is in accord with the weight of authority.

[8] Appellant complains of the court's modifications of certain instructions. The purport of these instructions was that the plaintiff could not recover a double amount of insurance unless the bodily injury which resulted in Mr. Wilmarth's death "was sustained by him while in a passenger elevator." The court in each instance inserted the words "or the proximate cause thereof" after the word "injury." This was proper. If the moving cause of the killing of Mr. Wilmarth originated in the elevator, that was sufficient even though death was produced by the fall to the basement. In such cases the courts look to the proximate cause of the injury. Travelers' Ins. Co. v. Murray, 16 Colo. 296, 26 Pac. 774, 25 Am. St. Rep. 267.

[9] The court prefaced each group of instructions by saying: "The following are the plaintiff's requested instructions," or, "The following * * * are given you as instructions requested by the defendant." The revealing of the sources of the instructions is assigned as error. We see no reason (and no authority is given) why the court may not thus indicate the authorship of any given instructions. The jurors must have known that when adopted the instructions became those of the court without regard to authorship. Therefore there was no error committed.

Judgment and order affirmed.

1. Taxation (§ 144*)—Assessment of Corporate Property—Property Used in Business.

A steamboat in operation being a single indivisible fabric, where it is not used exclusively in the business of a railroad company, a part thereof cannot be so exclusively used within Const. art. 13, § 14, imposing a tax based on gross revenue on certain enumerated properties of railroad companies and on other property or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business.

2. Taxation (§ 144*)—Assessment of Corporate Property—Property Used in Business.

Under Const. art. 13, § 14, imposing a tax on any property or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of a railroad company's business, only property used exclusively or a severable part of property so exclusively used in the operation of the business can be taxed, and where property is partly used for railroad purposes the gross returns from the partial use are not an element in assessing the tax.

3. Taxation (§ 144*)—Assessment of Corporate Property—Property Used in Business.

That the operation of steamboats by a railroad company stimulates and increases its rail receipts and induces travel over its rails does not render the steamers taxable as property used exclusively in the operation of the railroad business within Const. art. 13, § 14.

Steamers operated by a railroad company on Lake Tahoe which carry goods and passengers between California points, Nevada points and interstate points are not "ferryboats" within Pol. In Bank. Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Lake Tahoe Railway & Transportation Company against E. D. Roberts, as State Treasurer of the State of California. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, for appellant. Pillsbury, Madison & Sutro and Alfred Sutro, all of San Francisco (A. D. Plaw, of San Francisco, of counsel), for respondent.

HENSHAW, J. This action was brought to recover taxes paid by plaintiff under protest as having been illegally exacted. Judgment passed for plaintiff, and the defendant as state treasurer appeals.

Plaintiff is a California corporation and owns a railroad running from the town of Truckee to the town of Tahoe in the state of California. At Truckee its railroad connects with the Southern Pacific Railroad. It also owns four steamers which are operated on Lake Tahoe and which carry goods and passengers between California points on the lake, between Nevada points on the lake, and between interstate points on the lake. It has a traffic arrangement with the Southern Pacific Company by which rail passengers of the latter may be conveyed over the railroad of the plaintiff and upon its steamers to designated points on Lake Tahoe in either California or Nevada. It therefore publishes and files, as required by law, with the railroad commission of the state of California and with the interstate commerce commission, official tariff sheets indicating these facts and specifying its charges for transportation. The steamers are not only owned by but operated by the corporation plaintiff. Forty-five per cent. of the gross receipts from the operation of the steamers is obtained from purely local traffic. In the winter months the railroad entirely suspends operations, but the steamers continue in business carrying passengers, mail, freight, and express. No part of the receipts of the steamer transportation is received as compensation for railroad service, and, conversely, no part of the receipts from the railroad transportation is received as compensation for steamer service.

As required by law the plaintiff filed with the state board of equalization its report of the matters and things required for purposes of taxation for the year 1912. Subsequently, pursuant to a request of the board and under protest, it furnished a statement of its gross receipts from the operation of its steamers. This consisted of the total amount of receipts from the business of the steamers beginning and ending within the state of California, and a proportion of the interstate business based upon the relation of the mileage of such business conducted within the state and the entire mileage of the interstate business as provided in section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution. The board of equalization levied a tax amounting to $908.68 against plaintiff upon the steamer earnings. Plaintiff paid this tax under protest and subsequently brought its action for the recovery thereof. The court found that the steamers were not used exclusively in the operation of the railroad business of the plaintiff, in whole or in part, and they were not and are not properly, reasonably, or at all necessary for the use by plaintiff exclusively in the operation of its railroad business. The court therefore concluded that the steamers were not subject to taxation under the gross revenue system but were subject at the hands of local assessors to ad valorem taxes which they had paid.

[1, 2] The question thus presented is an extremely simple one, resting as it does solely upon the meaning of the language of section 14, art. 13, of the Constitution, which declares that, based upon gross revenue, railroad companies shall pay a tax to the state upon certain enumerated properties "and other property, or any part thereof used exclusively in the operation of their business in this state." The brief statement of facts above set forth shows conclusively that the steamboats of the plaintiff were not used exclusively in their railroad business, and with equal conclusiveness it shows that no severable part of the steamers is used exclusively in the operation of the business, for manifestly a steamer in operation being a single, indivisible fabric, while it may be said that it is partly used for a given purpose, it cannot be said, as the Constitution declares, that "any part thereof" is so used.

But appellant argues that the tax commission which framed this constitutional provision, and the Legislature which proposed it, were composed of men of experience and knowledge "who ought not to be charged even by inference with having intended when indicating the character of the property to be taxed in the manner proposed, to have deliberately used language with a view to the result that would necessarily follow" from the most natural construction of that language above indicated. Therefore appellant argues that the language does not mean what it says, but does mean that, if any property is "partly" used for railroad purposes, that "partial" use to the extent of its value estimated upon the business' gross returns is subject to be thus taxed. To the inference of the experience and intelligence of the tax commission and of the Legislature we may give ready assent; but it is precisely for this reason, and because these constitutional provisions were thus prepared with care by men understanding the plain use of plain language, that the construction for which appellant contends may not be sustained. Appellant, while arguing for the intelligence of the framers of this constitutional provision, asks us to declare that their language does not mean what it says, but something radically and essentially different from what it says. Thus, if the framers of this provision had meant that any piece of property partially used in the railroad business should be partially taxed they would have said so. But what they have said is that only property exclusively used, or only some part of it exclusively used, should be so taxed, with the result that when not so exclusively used the old form of local taxation should still obtain. If confirmation of this meaning of plain language were required it will be found in the practical difficulties which would arise from the construction contended for by appellant, difficulties which, if that construction was ever contemplated by the framers of the constitutional provision, they would have removed by provisions of law. To illustrate, if this substituted percentage tax based on revenue is to apply to a single piece of property partly used for railroad purposes, that indivisible portion of it not so partly used must be subject to local taxation by local assessors under the strict ad valorem tax, or it escapes taxation altogether. How shall a local assessor assess a portion of a steamboat? What portion shall he assess and what shall be the ad valorem value placed upon the portion which he does assess? All these would be practical questions under appellant's contention and would require answer at the hands of the law. The fact that these manifest contingencies have not been provided for by law is additional evidence that the framers of the Constitution meant what they said, namely, that only property used exclusively, or only a severable part of property used exclusively in the operation of the business of the company, should be included in the list of property whose sole and only tax is covered by the gross revenue percentage, and that the earnings of other properties not so exclusively used in whole or in part are not an element in the admeasurement of this tax.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

The cases uniformly so hold. Thus, in C., B. & Q. R. Co. v. Rhein, 135 Iowa, 404, 112 N. W. 823, the statute declared that the railway property taxed should include all property "real or personal, exclusively used in the operation of such railway." The Supreme Court held that the telegraph lines of the railroad which were used in the ordinary transaction of its railroad business, but which were also leased to the Western Union Telegraph Company, were not exclusively used in the railroad business, and therefore were not within the purview of the statute. In Herter v. C., M. & St. P. Ry. Co., 114 Iowa, 330, 86 N. W. 266, it was decided that while grain elevators, operated by a railroad, were necessary and proper in the conduct of the road, they were not exclusively used in such conduct within the taxing statute if they were used by others. And to like effect is the decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois in Illinois Central R. Co. v. People, 119 Ill. 137, 6 N. E. 451.

[3] Further, it is argued that the steamboats are a necessary part of plaintiff's business and "to say that they are not a necessary part is to say that plaintiff would carry as many passengers over its rails to Tahoe if no way existed for those passengers to reach other points on the lake besides Tahoe. We doubt if any one would deny that the operation of the steamboats on the lake stimulates and increases plaintiff's rail receipts and induces travel over its rails that would not be gained if Tahoe was the only destination." All this may be conceded, but it is in no sense determinative of the question here, which is one of exclusive use. Thus, in Illinois Central R. Co. v. Irvin, 72 Ill. 452, where the precise question was whether a steamboat owned by a railroad was railroad property, it was said that "the only purpose and use of the steamboat is to facilitate and extend appellant's business as a common carrier to and from points south of Cairo," and the court declared that the boat was not railroad property and that the fact that the use of it added greatly to the revenue of the company was not relevant to prove that the boat was railroad property. In the same way the Supreme Court of Minnesota, in State v. St. P., M. & M. Ry. Co., 42 Minn. 238, 44 N. W. 63, decided that a hotel owned by the railroad company on the shores of Lake Minnetonka, over 90 per cent. of the guests of which came over defendant's railroad and which thus largely contributed to its business and income, bore no other relation to the operation of the railroad than did any other enterprise which might tend to improve the latter's business. And to the same effect is Milwaukee & St. P. Ry. Co. v. Bd. of Supervisors, 29 Wis. 116.

[4] We need not be at pains to discuss the proviso in the act of the Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, c. 335, § 8), which defines operative property. If the definition is in harmony with the language of the Constitution, it does not affect the discussion hereinbefore had. If the definition does violence to the language of the Constitution, to that extent it cannot be upheld, for the definition of the Constitution itself must prevail. San Diego Ry. Co. v. State Board of Equalization, 165 Cal. 564, 132 Pac. 1044.

[5] That these steamers may not be classed as ferryboats under section 3643 of the Political Code is manifest from a reading of the section, as well as from the authority of Illinois Central Ry. Co. v. Irvin, supra.

For these reasons the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

Appeal and Error (§ 783*)—Dismissal—Grounds—Motion for New Trial.

Irregularity of proceedings occurring prior to an order denying a new trial, as failure, under conditions not authorized by Code Civ. Proc. § 653, to have the statement on motion for new trial settled by the judge who tried the case, even if it be cause for affirmance of the order, is not ground for dismissal of the appeal therefrom.

Action by Grant Lincoln against D. W. Sibeck. From an adverse judgment and order, defendant appeals. Motion to dismiss appeals denied.

James R. Choate, E. O. Leake, and Edgar F. Hughes, all of Los Angeles, for appellant. Robert T. Linney and Ralph W. Schoonover, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. Motion to dismiss appeals from a judgment and from an order denying a motion for a new trial. The grounds of motion are: That the appeals were not taken within the time limited by law; that the statement on motion for a new trial was not settled and allowed as required by law.

The motion, in so far as it concerns the appeal taken from the judgment, is not pressed, and it appears that this appeal was regularly taken. The chief complaint as to the statement on motion for a new trial not having been regularly settled rests upon the fact that the superior judge of Alpine county, who heard the cause at the trial, did not settle the statement, notwithstanding that he was not shown to have been without the state, or otherwise conditioned as is specified in the cases mentioned in section 653, Code of Civil Procedure.

It is not contended as a ground for dismissal that the judge who passed upon the motion for a new trial was without jurisdiction so to do. It has been held that the matter of the irregularity of proceedings occurring prior to the making of an order such as that here appealed from cannot be considered on a motion to dismiss, although the same may constitute sufficient cause for affirming or reversing the order. In re Ryer, 110 Cal. 559, 42 Pac. 1082; Fish v. Benson, 71 Cal. 428, 12 Pac. 454.

Upon the authority of these decisions, the motion to dismiss the appeal from the order denying the motion for a new trial is denied. For the reason first stated, the motion as directed to the appeal from the judgment should also be denied; and it is so ordered.

[1] As to the sufficiency of the evidence, we need do no more than to call attention to the testimony of Frank Brooks, the prosecuting witness, in connection with a few admitted facts: Defendant and his codefendant, M. Osaki, conducted a small restaurant in the city of Stockton. On December 27, 1913, Brooks went into said restaurant, between 8 and 9 o'clock, to get something to drink—"some ginger and hot water, maybe a little whisky." As he started to go, the defendant caught him by the coat in the door, and "he says, 'You can't go out until you pay for it.' I says, 'I am just going to step to the door here, coming right back.' So I went back and paid it, then went out and got my drink, and came back, and my coffee, I thought, was not quite hot enough for me." Then, after a dispute as to whether a nickel was due from Brooks, he laid it on the counter and said, "There is your nickel," and started to go out, when appellant's codefendant threw a sugar bowl at Brooks, and, obviously, referring to appellant himself, the witness proceeded:

> "And that one there, whatever his name is, came running around the counter and jumped onto me on this side, and both of them bent me over this way and went through my pockets. One of them went in here and tore a button off my vest here, went in my shirt pocket there and got a roll of bills."

And furthermore:

> "They took $3 in silver out of my pants pocket there, my knife out of this one, and I had a key and a small silver watch chain out of the hip pocket here."

The jury undoubtedly believed the witness, and the only conclusion, therefore, possible was a verdict of guilty. We cannot say that credit should not have been given to the testimony, and we are therefore bound by it.

[2, 3] The other point is worthy of no more extended consideration. It relates to an objection to the following question asked of Brooks:

> "After you came in from getting your drink of ginger, what, if anything, was done with regard to this pack of bills by you?"

The point of the objection was that it was not shown that the defendant was present at the time. As to this, while the witness at that particular moment did not see defendant, the latter was undoubtedly near, and it was for the jury to say whether he saw what was done with the bills. Aside from that, it was a material circumstance in the case tending to show that the witness had the bills on his person; and it may be said, also, that, if the evidence was erroneously admitted, it could not possibly have affected the result, in view of the statements of the witness as to the actual commission of the robbery.

There is no reason for interfering with the verdict, and the judgment and the order denying the motion for a new trial are affirmed.

LARCENY (§ 66*)—PROSECUTION—EVIDENCE—SUFFICIENCY.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Robert Gilmore was convicted of an attempt to commit the crime of grand larceny, and from the judgment of conviction and an order denying new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant was charged with the crime of grand larceny, and, upon trial, was convicted of an attempt to commit the offense with which he was charged. He appeals from the judgment and an order of court denying his motion for a new trial.

The only ground upon which a reversal is asked is that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. A brief statement of the case shows appellant's contention to be wholly without merit. No evidence was offered on behalf of defendant. That offered on behalf of the people shows that during the noon hour on December 18, 1913, defendant with a companion named Isenberg, entered the jewelry store of O. L. Wuerker, in Los Angeles, stating to Mr. Willard, manager of the store, that they desired to look at some diamond rings. Mr. Willard then took from the showcase a tray of diamond rings and exhibited them to defendant and Isenberg, who, after looking them over, indicated that none of them was satisfactory, defendant suggesting that they be shown a tray of rings which were in the show window. Mr. Willard replaced the tray of rings taken from the showcase and brought out the tray from the window. From this tray Isenberg selected a ring priced at $90, saying he would make a deposit of $2 upon it. Defendant meanwhile was looking at a ring from the tray priced at $285. As Willard reached for an envelope wherein to place the $90 ring selected by Isenberg, and while defendant was looking at the $285 ring, he (Willard) saw in the tray containing the rings an imitation diamond ring in size similar to the $285 ring, the latter not being in the tray. Willard picked up the tray and, as he returned it to the showcase, took therefrom the bogus diamond and said:

> "'I don't want this ring; come on, give me the good ring, and do it quick. You can't do that to me here. * * * I don't want your $2.' * * * I shoved the $2 back to him, and I took the $90 ring. He says: 'What do you mean by that?' I says: 'I mean you got to pay for that ring or give it to me quick.' As I said that, why Mr. Gilmore starts and turned around and run, and Mr. Isenberg. So I went out after them just as hard as I could go."

At the door defendant and Isenberg separated, one going north and one south. Willard followed Isenberg, and a gentleman who was entering the store followed defendant, who ran north to Second and Spring streets, thence to Broadway, thence south to the middle of the block, where he was caught and turned over to an officer. Willard further testified that, in place of the good ring, defendant placed in the tray a bogus ring of the same size. Both defendant and Isenberg were taken back to the store by officers, and, upon being searched, the imitation ring was taken from Gilmore's pocket, and later two other imitation diamond rings were found under the showcase near where Isenberg and defendant had been standing. When Willard ran out of the store to intercept defendant and Isenberg, another employé of the store, whose attention was attracted by the trouble, went to that part of the store where Willard had been exhibiting the rings and, reaching for the pad used in exhibiting diamonds, discovered the ring which is alleged to be the subject of the larceny. He stated that owing to the fact that a customer was standing against the showcase where this pad was, he was unable to say whether the ring was on top of the pad or underneath it. From this statement of facts disclosed by the evidence, and other circumstances indicative of guilt, it is impossible to perceive how the jury could have reached any other conclusion than that an attempt, as defined in section 664, Penal Code, and People v. Mann, 113 Cal. 79, 45 Pac. 182, was made to steal the ring. Defendant's failure to accomplish his intended purpose was clearly due to Willard's discovery of the bogus diamond placed in the tray as a substitute for the genuine one which defendant at the time had in his possession. Having been detected in the act, he abandoned his unlawful purpose and sought safety by fleeing.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Alonzo Isenberg was convicted of an attempt to commit grand larceny, and appeals. Affirmed.

Frank A. McDonald, of Los Angeles, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and George Beebe, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

JAMES, J. Defendant was charged jointly with one Robert Gilmore with having committed the crime of grand larceny; the property alleged to have been stolen being a diamond ring of the alleged value of $200. The defendants demanded, and were accorded, separate trials. The jury in the case of appellant returned a verdict finding the defendant guilty of an attempt to commit the crime of grand larceny. From the judgment as entered upon that verdict, and from an order denying a motion for a new trial, this appeal was taken.

[1] The testimony as given at the trial presented in the main an undisputed statement as to the facts of the occurrence at which it was contended appellant participated in the theft of a diamond ring. Appellant and Gilmore together, in the daytime, entered a jewelry store in the city of Los Angeles, and, after some preliminary talk, asked to be shown diamond rings. The salesman took out a tray and exhibited the rings to them, and one of the two men proposed that he make a $2 deposit on a $90 ring. While this negotiation was going on the salesman discovered that an imitation diamond ring had been placed in the tray instead of the ring containing a genuine stone, and immediately demanded that his ring be returned. Upon this the appellant and Gilmore started out of the store and the salesman pursued them. Upon reaching the sidewalk Gilmore went in one direction and Isenberg in another, each traveling very swiftly. They were pursued and captured, and when brought back to the store an imitation diamond ring was found in the pocket of Gilmore, and later at the police station another ring of the same kind was found in the pocket of appellant. The ring which it was charged that the men had stolen was found either upon or under a small rubber mat lying on the showcase, where it seems to have been placed or dropped by appellant or his companion at the time they left the store. After his arrest appellant was interrogated by the police officers, and finally made a statement in which, it was testified, he told a complete story of how he and Gilmore had purchased the imitation diamond rings for a few cents, with the purpose of perpetrating the swindle which they attempted. Appellant denied that he had made this statement, when he testified at the trial, but all the other facts adverted to remain proven beyond dispute and without contradiction. Upon this state of the record it is contended that the evidence was insufficient to justify the conviction of appellant, and further that the court improperly allowed proof to be made of the alleged confession. The evidence was abundantly sufficient to justify the verdict of guilty; indeed, it would be hard to conceive how any jury of reasonable men could have reached any other determination upon the case. It is a matter for further remark that appellant appears to have been quite leniently dealt with, inasmuch as the evidence tended most strongly to show that not only was there an attempt to commit the crime of grand larceny, but that the crime charged had been completely consummated.

[2] The ruling of the court permitting evidence to be offered showing the making of the alleged confession was without error. No such a case is presented as that considered in People v. Quan Gim Gow, 23 Cal. App. 507, 138 Pac. 918, decided in this court, and which is cited by appellant. Here it was made to appear by satisfactory evidence that appellant was not coerced by the use of any improper importunities or inducements to make the statement of which evidence was given at the trial. There are no other alleged errors urged in the briefs of counsel for appellant which require consideration. The record shows that appellant was accorded a fair trial and that his conviction was based upon evidence of clear and convincing character.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

Petition by Harry G. Johnson for a writ of mandate against Lewis R. Works, Judge of the Superior Court for the County of Los Angeles. Peremptory writ issued.

L. B. Stanton, of Los Angeles, for petitioner. J. W. Hart, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The petitioner, Harry G. Johnson, is the plaintiff in a certain action against one M. A. Copps in the superior court of Los Angeles county, in which action the plaintiff seeks to recover a share of commissions alleged to have been earned by plaintiff and defendant on account of services in selling certain real property. Upon issues presented by the pleadings that action was tried before the respondent herein as judge of said superior court, and judgment was entered in favor of the defendant. The plaintiff duly served and filed a notice of intention to move for a new trial, upon the ground that the evidence was insufficient to justify the decision, and upon other grounds stated. Within due time the plaintiff served and presented for settlement a proposed statement on the motion for a new trial, and the said proposed statement, with the defendant's proposed amendments thereto, came before the respondent for settlement. The proposed statement purports to set forth all of the evidence and proceedings at the trial. By his proposed amendments defendant asks that portions of the proposed statement be stricken out and other testimony substituted therefor.

The proceedings at the trial were taken down by an official reporter, but no transcript thereof has been made. The petitioner alleges that, when the statement and amendments came before the respondent for settlement, respondent refused to make any settlement thereof. Respondent, in his return to the alternative writ issued herein, sets forth facts showing that the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant failed to agree with respect to said proposed amendments, or, in other words, that the plaintiff refused to accept said amendments. Respondent says that neither the statement as proposed by plaintiff, nor the proposed amendments, nor the two taken together, contain a true or fair statement of the evidence necessary to explain plaintiff's specifications attached to his notice of intention to move for a new trial; that there was other competent and relevant evidence upon said matters. Respondent denies that he has refused to settle the statement of the case, but in substance declines to do so unless a transcript is furnished to him of so much of the testimony of the witnesses as is necessary to explain the specifications attached to plaintiff's motion for a new trial, where the proposed statement of plaintiff conflicts with the proposed amendments of the defendant.

[1, 2] It is the duty of respondent to settle the statement by determining what it shall contain. The law will not require of him that which is impossible of performance. If his memory is not sufficient to enable him to determine what the statement of facts shall be upon any issue presented, there are presumptions upon which he may act, taking into consideration the condition of the record and the duty of the party moving for a new trial to present a reasonably clear and accurate statement upon which the judge may act. It is not our duty at this time to say how the respondent shall settle the statement on motion for new trial under the peculiar circumstances of this case, nor in what form he shall make a statement showing that there is evidence (as he says that there is) supporting the findings of the court, and that such evidence is in addition to that contained in plaintiff's proposed statement. It is sufficient at this time to say that in some form, and to the best of his ability to remember what occurred at the trial, it is the duty of the judge to settle the statement. In view of the fact that petitioner has not furnished respondent with a transcript of the testimony, and in view of the delay which occurred between the time of the trial and the time of attempted settlement of the statement, the petitioner cannot justly complain of the action of the court, if the statement as approved by the respondent shall be in more general terms with respect to the evidence contained therein than it would be if the exact terms of the testimony were embodied in a transcript. Vatcher v. Wilbur, 144 Cal. 536, 541, 78 Pac. 14.

We are of the opinion that a peremptory writ should issue, requiring respondent to settle said statement; and it is so ordered.

We concur: JAMES, J.; SHAW, J.

PEOPLE v. WEST et al. (Cr. 256.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 4, 1914.)

1. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 625*)—TRIAL OF ISSUE OF INSANITY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

On a trial for homicide committed November 28, 1913, it was error to deny a motion to submit the question of defendants' present sanity to a jury, under Pen. Code, § 1368, providing that, if at any time during the pendency of an action a doubt arises as to the sanity of the defendant, the court must order the question as to his sanity to be submitted to a jury, where the motion was supported by the affidavit of one of defendant's counsel stating that defendants were confined in a hospital for insane persons at the time of the homicide and had not been discharged as cured, or at all, that one of them was committed to the hospital on October 24, 1913, and the other on November 10, 1913, that counsel had made efforts to secure from them some statement concerning the crime, but that they refused to say anything about it, and acted as though suffering from delusions, and that in the opinion of the affiant they were insane, and not mentally competent to make a just and rational defense.

2. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 625*)—TRIAL OF ISSUE OF "INSANITY"—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

On the trial of the question as to the present sanity of a person charged with crime, under Pen. Code, § 1368, the inquiry is not whether defendant knows the difference between right and wrong, and can distinguish the quality and consequence of his act, but whether he is mentally competent to make a rational defense.

3. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 625*)—TRIAL OF ISSUE OF INSANITY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

Under Pen. Code, § 1368, the question of a defendant's present sanity should be submitted to a jury whenever a doubt arises as to his sanity, and ordinarily the statements under oath of a credible person or persons that he is insane raise such a doubt.

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 625*)—TRIAL OF ISSUE OF INSANITY—STATUTORY PROVISIONS.

If information comes through a proper source and proper channels that a person accused of crime is insane, or if through observation and personal inspection such information is disclosed to the court, a jury should be impaneled, under Pen. Code, § 1368, to pass upon accused's mental condition.

Appeal from Superior Court, Mendocino County; J. Q. White, Judge.

Willie Deen West and another were convicted of murder in the second degree, and they appeal. On rehearing. Reversed.

Theodore Hale, of Ukiah, for appellants. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

PER CURIAM. A rehearing in these cases was granted by this court, and upon further consideration we have concluded that the judgment should be reversed and a new trial granted.

[1] The defendants were convicted in the superior court of the crime of murder in the second degree and sentenced to the penitentiary for life. At the time of the homicide, November 28, 1913, they were inmates and patients at the Mendocino state hospital for the insane, and deceased, at the time of his death, was also an inmate and patient of said institution. Before the trial the defendants regularly moved the court that the question of their present sanity be submitted to a jury as provided by section 1368 of the Penal Code. The court denied the motion, and in this we think prejudicial error was committed.

In support of said motion the defendants introduced and read the affidavit of one of their counsel, Mr. Hale McCowen, Jr. From this affidavit it appeared that, at the time of the homicide, the defendants were confined in the hospital as insane persons, and were being treated as such, and that neither had been discharged as cured or at all; that the defendant Peoples had been sent to the hospital upon the certificates of two surgeons of the United States Navy at Puget Sound, Wash., dated October 24, 1913. West was committed from the penitentiary at San Quentin upon the certification of the warden, the resident physician and surgeon, and the captain of the yard, that West was insane. The commitment was dated November 10, 1913. It is thus to be noticed how closely their commitment was followed by the homicide, and, it may be stated, the trial occurred soon thereafter. Mr. McCowen further set out in his affidavit that both he and his associate—

> "have each made efforts to secure from the said defendants some statement concerning the crime charged in the information; that said defendants refuse to say anything about the facts or circumstances of the offense and act as though suffering from delusions of some character; that affiant therefore alleges that it is his opinion that both of these defendants are mentally insane; and that neither of them is mentally competent to make a just and rational defense to the charge made against them."

It must be admitted that there was thus presented a very strong showing of present insanity. It is asserted by appellants' counsel that the facts—

> "constitute the strongest showing of present insanity which has ever been brought to the attention of a court in any case which has been appealed. We have examined the cases found in the reports, yet have found no case where an alleged crime was committed by insane men, who were being confined in a public hospital for the insane, and had never been cured, nor ordered discharged, and who continued in such a state of mental derangement that attorneys appointed by the court to defend them could obtain no assistance from the defendants in the conduct of their case."

We have not examined all the cases to verify the said assertion, but we are satisfied that upon the showing made the trial judge should have arrested the proceedings to have the sanity of the defendants determined by a jury. Upon mature consideration we do not think the counter showing made by respondent was sufficient to justify the court in its denial of the motion. It may be added that the conduct and statements of the defendants during the progress of the trial furnished additional evidence that they were incapable of making their defense, but we forbear any recital in detail of these circumstances.

We do not mean, of course, to decide that the defendants were insane at the time of the homicide, or that at the time of the trial they were incapable of making their defense; but our decision goes only to the extent that the court should have submitted the last question to a jury prior to any trial for the offense charged. The principle involved has been stated no more aptly, probably, than in the familiar quotation from Blackstone:

> "Also, if a man in his sound memory commits a capital offense, and before arraignment for it he becomes mad, he ought not to be arraigned for it, because he is not able to plead to it with that advice and caution that he ought. And if, after he had pleaded, the prisoner becomes mad, he shall not be tried—for how can he make his defense? If after he be tried and found guilty, he loses his senses before judgment, judgment shall not be pronounced; and if after judgment he becomes of nonsane memory execution shall be stayed, for, peradventure, says the humanity of English law, had the prisoner been of sound memory he might have alleged something in stay of judgment and execution."

[2] It cannot be too strongly emphasized that the question presented to the court was different from that involved in the consideration whether the defendants were responsible for the alleged homicide. As to their responsibility for the crime charged, the inquiry must be whether they knew the difference between right and wrong and could distinguish the quality and consequence of their act; but here the question was whether they were mentally competent to make a rational defense.

In Re Buchanan, 129 Cal. 330, 61 Pac. 1120, 50 L. R. A. 378, the Supreme Court held that there is a difference between the medical view of insanity and the view upon which the statute is founded, and that the question must be determined with reference to the latter, and, after making the foregoing quotation from Blackstone, the opinion by Chief Justice Beatty proceeds:

> "This short quotation shows what all the books and treatises and decisions on the subject show, that the true and only reason why an insane person should not be tried is 'that he is disabled by the act of God to make a just defense, if he have one.'"

We need not attempt a more accurate discrimination between the insanity that excuses crime and the insanity that arrests the trial, although the distinction has been the subject of learned discussion in some of the decisions. Of course, a person may be sane enough to be responsible for crime, and yet incapable of making his defense; and, on the other hand, he may have mental capacity to be placed on trial, and yet be insane within the contemplation of the law as to responsibility for a criminal act.

[3, 4] And finally, as to the showing required to make it the duty of the court to submit the question of sanity to a jury, there is no discretion left in the court when a doubt arises as to the sanity of the defendant. And ordinarily, at least, if there are statements under oath of a credible person or persons that the defendant is insane, a doubt is or should be raised as to the defendant's sanity, and the question must be submitted to a jury. The only contingency is: Does a doubt arise? If information comes, through a proper source and through proper channels, that the defendant is insane, or if, through observation and personal inspection, the information is disclosed to the court, a jury must be impaneled to pass upon the mental condition of the accused. Marshall v. Territory (1909) 2 Okl. Cr. 136, 101 Pac. 139; People v. Ah Ying, 42 Cal. 18; Freeman v. People, 4 Denio (N. Y.) 9, 47 Am. Dec. 216.

We do not mean to say that the weight of the evidence and the credibility of the witnesses are not within the peculiar province of the trial judge, but we think that the circumstances here were such that it should be held as a matter of law that a doubt was or should have been created, and that it was the court's duty to submit the question as provided in section 1368 of the Penal Code.

We deem it unnecessary to notice specifically the cases cited by counsel, or to discuss other points made by appellants, as they will probably not arise again.

The judgment and order are reversed.

PEOPLE v. AKIN. (Cr. 261.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 4, 1914.)

1. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 189*)—CONVICTION OF OFFENSE INCLUDED IN CHARGE—ASSAULT WITH INTENT TO COMMIT RAPE.

A verdict of guilty of assault with intent to commit rape was not within the scope of an information charging that defendant did "accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with a female of the age of 11 years"; "assault" not being essential to the crime of carnal intercourse with a child of such age.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 582–595; Dec. Dig. § 189.*]

2. INDICTMENT AND INFORMATION (§ 189*)—CONVICTION OF OFFENSE INCLUDED IN CHARGE—"ASSAULT"—"ATTEMPT."

An "assault" with intent to commit a crime necessarily embraces an "attempt" to commit the crime, but such "attempt" does not necessarily include an "assault."

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Indictment and Information, Cent. Dig. §§ 582–595; Dec. Dig. § 189.*

For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Attempt, Assault.]

3. RAPE (§ 59*)—INSTRUCTIONS.

In a prosecution for feloniously accomplishing an act of sexual intercourse with a female 11 years old, it was error to instruct that if defendant attempted the rape, but did not succeed, he was guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Rape, Cent. Dig. §§ 88–100; Dec. Dig. § 59.*]

4. CRIMINAL LAW (§ 393*)—PHYSICAL EXAMINATION OF DEFENDANT.

A defendant charged with rape cannot be compelled, against his consent, to submit to an examination by a physician.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Criminal Law, Cent. Dig. §§ 871–874; Dec. Dig. § 393.*]

5. CRIMINAL LAW (§§ 634, 636*)—JURY—VIEW OF PREMISES.

Where the jury, in a rape case, are sent to view the premises where the crime was committed, they should be accompanied by the judge and by the defendant, if he desires to go.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Jack Akin was convicted of assault with intent to commit rape, and appeals. Reversed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Oroville, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Charles Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was charged with having had carnal intercourse with a female under the age of consent, and he was convicted of "assault with intent to commit rape." Several reasons are urged by appellant for reversal, but the most serious question, which is not discussed or suggested at all, is whether the verdict is within the scope of the information; in other words, whether the defendant was convicted of a different crime from that charged against him.

[1] The charging part of the information is that:

> "The said Jack Akin did on or about the 12th day of May, A. D. 1913, at Butte county and state of California, and before the filing of this information, wrongfully, unlawfully, willfully, and feloniously accomplish an act of sexual intercourse with one Nora Heckart, the said Nora Heckart being then and there a female under the age of 16 years to wit, of the age of 11 years, and not being then and there the wife of the said Jack Akin."

It is thus to be seen that the element of force is not charged, as indeed it is not required to constitute the offense of rape on the person of a female under the age of consent. The crime of assault with intent to commit rape necessarily implies, however, the use of force and violence, and negatives the idea of consent upon the part of the victim. Of course, if the defendant had been charged with rape on the person of an adult, the element of force would have been included in the charge, and thus the information would have comprehended the crime of which he was convicted. Or, if the defendant had been convicted of an "attempt to commit rape," we could say that it was covered by the charge, because every crime includes an attempt to commit said crime. But "an assault implies repulsion, or at least want of consent on the part of the person assaulted." People v. Dong Pok Yip, 164 Cal. 146, 127 Pac. 1032.

[2] An "assault" with intent to commit a crime necessarily embraces an "attempt" to commit said crime, but said "attempt" does not necessarily include an "assault."

[3] This distinction was overlooked by the court in giving the following instruction:

> "You are instructed that if you believe to a moral certainty and beyond all reasonable doubt that Jack Akin attempted to rape Nora Heckart, but did not succeed in accomplishing sexual penetration, then you may find him guilty of an assault with intent to commit rape."

The instruction was given upon the supposed authority of People v. Gardner, 98 Cal. 127, 32 Pac. 880, but in that case, as is stated by the Supreme Court:

> "The defendant was convicted of an attempt to commit rape, and not of the offense of an assault with intent to commit rape, for which provision is made by section 220 of the Penal Code. There is a distinction between these offenses, and the facts required to prove an attempt are not necessarily sufficient to prove an assault with intent."

A case directly in point is State v. Pickett, 11 Nev. 255, 21 Am. Rep. 754. In the opinion, written by the late Chief Justice Beatty of this state, who was then an associate justice of the Supreme Court of Nevada, it is said:

> "The common-law definition of 'rape' is 'the carnal knowledge of a woman forcibly and against her will.' 4 Blacks. Com. 210. The same definition is adopted by our statute. Comp. Laws, § 2350. Under this definition, an assault is a necessary ingredient of every rape, or attempted rape. But it is not a necessary ingredient of the crime of carnally knowing a child under the age of 12 years, with or without her consent, which is defined in the latter part of the section, and which is called 'rape.' It is obvious that here are two crimes differing essentially in their nature, though called by the same name. To one force and resistance are essential ingredients, while to the other they are not essential; they may be present or absent without affecting the criminality of the fact of carnal knowledge. * * * By virtue of the provisions of sections 2464 and 2037, this defendant might have been convicted of an 'attempt to commit rape,' even if the child consented to all he did; but it was error to instruct the jury that he could be convicted of 'assault with intent,' etc., in that case. There can be no assault upon a consenting female, although there may be what the statute designates a rape."

The case was reversed for the error of the court in giving an instruction similar to the one given herein as above set out.

The same criticism might be made of the instruction given here, but in addition we think the verdict does not respond to the averments of the information. This is not a technical objection, but it goes to the fundamental right of the defendant to be formally charged with the crime of which he may be convicted.

[4, 5] In the event of a new trial, the alleged errors discussed by counsel will probably not appear again. However, it may be stated that the defendant cannot be required, against his consent, to submit to an examination by a physician, and, if the jury should be sent to view the premises, they should be accompanied by the judge and the defendant, if he desires to go.

For the reason stated, we think the judgment and order should be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: HART, J.; CHIPMAN, P. J.

CONTRACTS (§ 348*)—ACTION—PLEADING COMPLIANCE WITH LAW—OCCUPATION TAXES—PRESUMPTIONS.

One suing upon an express contract for services rendered as an architect need not prove compliance with Act March 23, 1901 (St. 1901, p. 644) § 5, making it a misdemeanor for any person to practice architecture without a certificate, and defendant, to defeat recovery on the ground of noncompliance, must show it.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Benjamin F. Bledsoe, Judge.

Action by Fred T. Harris against Joseph Bucher. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ralph E. Swing, of San Bernardino, for appellant. Curtis & McNabb, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

SHAW, J. Action to recover a balance alleged to be due from defendant to plaintiff upon an express contract for services rendered by the latter in preparing plans and specifications for and superintending the construction of a building. Judgment went for plaintiff, from which defendant appeals upon a bill of exceptions.

The services rendered pursuant to the contract, as shown by the complaint, were those of an architect. Section 5 of "An act to regulate the practice of architecture," approved March 23, 1901 (Stats. 1901, p. 641), provides that:

> "* * * It shall be unlawful, and it shall be a misdemeanor, * * * for any person to practice architecture without a certificate in this state, or to advertise, or put out any sign or card, or other device which might indicate to the public that he was an architect: Provided, that nothing in this act shall prevent any person from making plans for his own buildings, nor furnishing plans or other data for buildings for other persons, provided the person so furnishing such plans or data shall fully inform the person for whom such plans or data are furnished, that he, the person furnishing such plans, is not a certificated architect."

The complaint, as to which no attack was made in the court below, did not allege any facts showing compliance on the part of plaintiff with the provisions of said statute; nor did the answer contain any allegations negativing such compliance on his part. In the absence of such issue being tendered by the pleadings, no evidence was offered touching the question. Appellant for the first time and in this court now insists that, in the absence of allegations bringing plaintiff within the terms of said provision of law, the complaint fails to state a cause of action. Whether it was necessary to allege and prove that plaintiff was a duly certified architect is the point decisive of the appeal.

While it is generally conceded that noncompliance with such provisions of law will be a bar to recovery for services rendered (Gardner v. Tatum, 81 Cal. 370, 22 Pac. 880), there seems to be a conflict of authority as to whether plaintiff must allege and, if denied, prove his compliance with the law, or whether the burden rests upon defendant, as a matter of defense, to show plaintiff's neglect and failure to comply therewith. Appellant insists the burden rests upon plaintiff, who, in the absence of such fact being established, is not entitled to recover. In support of such contention he cites a number of cases, some of which fully support his position. See Wooley v. Bell, 33 Tex. Civ. App. 399, 76 S. W. 797; Bower v. Smith, 8 Ga. 74; Murray v. Williams, 121 Ga. 63, 48 S. E. 686; Cooper v. Griffin, 13 Ind. App. 212, 40 N. E. 710; Westbrook v. Nelson, 64 Kan. 436, 67 Pac. 884; Lanzer v. Unterberg, 9 Misc. Rep. 210, 29 N. Y. Supp. 683. These cases, where directly in point, proceed upon the theory that, since the statute makes it a misdemeanor to practice the calling without first procuring the required license or certificate, it devolves upon plaintiff to show, before he can recover, that he has complied with the provisions thereof. In some of them, however, the facts are distinguishable from those in the case at bar in that the statute in express terms prohibited any recovery, unless the required certificate had been obtained. While in this case the statute makes it unlawful to practice architecture without a certificate, it does not in terms require the issuance thereof as a condition of recovery. Since the statute declares the practice of architecture without the issuance of the required certificate to be a misdemeanor, we must, in order to sustain appellant's contention, assume that plaintiff is guilty of the commission of a crime. On the contrary, we are of the opinion that a presumption of innocence arises; hence, where noncompliance with the statute would constitute a criminal offense, we must, unless the contrary be shown, indulge in the presumption that plaintiff has complied therewith. In the case of Chicago v. Wood, 24 Ill. App. 40, the court, in discussing a like question, said:

> "The reason why the license will be presumed where there is no evidence to the contrary rests upon the principle that when an act is required, by positive law, to be done, the omission of which would be a misdemeanor, the law presumes that it has been done, and therefore the party relying on the omission must make some proof of it, though it be a negative."

To the same effect are Williams v. People, 20 Ill. App. 92; McPherson v. Cheadell, 24 Wend. (N. Y.) 15; Jo Daviess County v. Staples, 108 Ill. App. 539; Lacy v. Kossuth County, 106 Iowa, 16, 75 N. W. 689; Lyford v. Martin, 79 Minn. 243, 82 N. W. 479; Webster v. Lamb, 15 S. D. 292, 89 N. W. 473; Acme Mercantile Agency v. Rochford, 10 S. D. 203, 72 N. W. 466, 66 Am. St. Rep. 714. The statute does not make the obtaining of the certificate a condition precedent to the right of recovery, and we cannot assent to the proposition that, in order to maintain the action, plaintiff must first allege and prove that he is not guilty of the commission of a crime. We are therefore of the opinion that, in an action brought by one practicing architecture to recover for services rendered, it is not necessary to allege and prove compliance with the act regulating the practice of architecture, but that noncompliance therewith is a matter of defense to be pleaded and proved by defendant in the action.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

Appellant also insists that the action was prematurely brought. No such issue was raised by the pleadings, nor can we say, upon the vague and uncertain testimony of defendant, that there was any proof justifying the contention. The point is without merit.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. PERRY. (Cr. 250.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. Sept. 2, 1914.)

1. Criminal Law (§ 1166½*) — Appeal — Harmless Error — Examination of Jurors.

The exclusion of questions asked a juror on his voir dire examination, if error, was not prejudicial, where accused accepted such juror, though he had not exhausted his peremptory challenges.

2. Criminal Law (§ 1169*)—Error—Cure by Instructions to Disregard.

On a trial for selling intoxicating liquor in no-license territory, where the testimony in support of the charge well justified a verdict of guilty, the error, if any, in admitting evidence of other sales was cured by striking it out and instructing the jury to disregard it.

3. Intoxicating Liquors (§ 205*) — Indictment and Information—Description of No-License Territory.

Though where infractions of the local option law are charged it would be better to describe the unit within which they have occurred by name or number, an information charging a sale of intoxicating liquor "in no-license territory, to wit, in K. township," was sufficient, and the allegation that K. township was in a particular supervisorial district might be treated as surplusage.

[Ed. Note.—For other cases, see Intoxicating Liquors, Cent. Dig. § 225; Dec. Dig. § 205.*]

4. Indictment and Information (§ 161*) — Amendment.

Under Pen. Code, § 1008, as amended by St. 1911, p. 436, providing that an indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court before the defendant pleads, and thereafter, in the discretion of the court, where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant, but that an indictment cannot be amended to change the offense charged nor an information to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination, it was not error to permit the district attorney at the trial to amend an information charging a sale of intoxicating liquor in K. township, situated in the third supervisorial district, to allege that such township was situated in the Fifth supervisorial district, even if an allegation as to the district was proper or necessary; as such description was not an essential constituent of the crime, the gist or gravamen of which is the selling of liquor within the limits of no-license territory.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

H. N. Perry was convicted of selling intoxicating liquor in no-license territory, and he appeals. Affirmed.

W. K. Hays, of Chico, for appellant. U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

HART, J. Convicted of the crime of selling intoxicating liquor in the fifth supervisorial district of Butte county, said district having been at a date prior to that of the commission of the alleged crime made by the electors thereof no-license territory under the local option law, the defendant brings this appeal to this court from the judgment, claiming to be entitled to a reversal on the grounds: (1) That the court erred in its rulings disallowing answers to certain questions propounded by counsel for the defendant to certain jurors on their voir dire examination; (2) that the court erred in allowing testimony of sales of intoxicating liquor by the defendant, other than that alleged in the information; (3) that error was committed by permitting the district attorney to amend the information in a certain respect, to be hereafter more particularly explained.

[1] 1. It is wholly unnecessary to reproduce here the questions to which answers by the jurors were interdicted under the rulings of the court, as it is clear that the action of the court in that regard was without prejudice, even if it may well be conceded that to some of said questions answers could have with legal propriety been allowed. The only record here upon this point applies solely to the case of Juror George A. Martin. It shows that the defendant exhausted but seven of the peremptory challenges to which he was entitled (section 1070, Pen. Code), and it further shows, at least presumptively, that Juror Martin was satisfactory to the defendant, as he was accepted and constituted one of the panel which tried the cause. People v. Schafer, 161 Cal. 573, 576, 119 Pac. 920, 921; Scragg v. Sallee, 140 Pac. 706.

[2] 2. The charge in the information is that the defendant did, on the 25th day of September, 1913, "sell intoxicating liquor, to wit, whisky, a spirituous liquor, to H. A. Breedlove, in no-license territory, to wit, in Kimshew township, county of Butte," etc. The court, over objection by the defendant, permitted the district attorney to prove by other witnesses than Breedlove that they had, at various times prior to the date of the commission of the offense stated in the information, purchased intoxicating liquor from the defendant. Thereafter the attorney for the defendant moved to strike out that testimony. The court granted the motion, and instructed the jury to entirely disregard it in considering the question of the guilt or innocence of the defendant.

We are not prepared, nor is it necessary, to pass upon the question whether this is of that class of cases of which the case of the People v. Whalen, 154 Cal. 476, 38 Pac. 194, is an example, and in which proof of other similar acts by the defendant is admissible for the purpose of showing that the specific act charged was not the result of mere accident or a mere adventitious circumstance, and that it was done deliberately and with the intent to violate the law; for we think that, inasmuch as the testimony produced by the people in support of the charge well justified the verdict, the action of the court in striking from the record the testimony referred to and in instructing the jury to wholly disregard it in their consideration of the case, cured the error, if error it was, in admitting it. The jury are to be presumed to have heeded and obeyed that, as well as the other instructions of the court.

[3, 4] 3. The information, in its original draft, alleged that the defendant sold the liquor named therein "in no-license territory, to wit, in Kimshew township, county of Butte, state of California, said Kimshew township being situate in the Third supervisorial district of said county." Before the prosecution had finished its case in chief, and therefore before the defendant had opened his defense, the evidence introduced by the people disclosed that Kimshew township is situated in the Fifth, instead of the Third, supervisorial district of said county, as alleged, and, upon this fact being thus developed, the district attorney moved the court for permission to amend the information in that regard, and the motion was granted.

It would, no doubt, be the better practice, where infractions of the local option law are charged, to describe the unit within which they have occurred by name or number, as the case may be, so as to particularly identify it, but we think that where the information, merely following the language of the act, charges that the illicit sale was made in "no-license territory," that ought to be a sufficient statement of the offense to inform the defendant of the particular offense against which he is thus required to defend.

The general rule in criminal pleading is that the charge sought to be laid therein is sufficiently set forth if it be alleged in the language of the statute defining the crime. There are, of course, some qualifications or exceptions to that rule. Still, in this case, we can conceive of no sound reason why the general rule above stated would not be applicable. If, for example, an information should state that the illicit sale of intoxicants had taken place "in the town of A. which said town is situated within no-license territory," it would seem that such statement of the offense would not only be substantially in the language of the statute, but sufficient to apprise the defendant of all that it would be essential for him to be informed of in order to enable him to prepare himself to defend against the charge; viz., the fact of the sale and the fact that such sale took place within the boundary lines of a dry unit.

We conclude, therefore, that in this case the information, having declared that the act charged was committed in "no-license territory," and then designated by name the particular township of said territory where said act took place, was sufficient in all respects to inform the defendant of the particular offense for which he was to be put upon his trial, which is all that is required in any criminal pleading, and that therefore the mere matter of the description of the "no-license" territory may be treated as surplusage. The question, then, so far as the character of the alleged "no-license territory" is concerned—that is, whether it is or is not in point of fact, a dry unit—resolves itself into one of proof, the burden of which rests, of course, upon the people.

In principle, the proposition thus declared is cogently analogous to that stated in the case of Ex parte Anixter, 166 Cal. 762, 765, 138 Pac. 353, where, first declaring that neither the soliciting of orders nor the making of agreements within no-license territory for the sale of intoxicants to be delivered outside such territory was an act falling within the inhibitions of the local option law, the court held that the fact that the liquors to which such solicitations or agreements related were to be delivered within a dry unit need not be alleged in the complaint or the information, inasmuch as it would be incumbent upon the people to prove that fact and that their failure to do so would completely exonerate the defendant.

But, in any event, it cannot be perceived how the substantial rights of the defendant could have been prejudiced by the amendment of the information as shown.

Amendments of criminal pleadings, to a certain extent, are authorized by section 1008 of the Penal Code, as amended by the Legislature of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 436), which, in part, provides:

> "An indictment or information may be amended by the district attorney without leave of court, at any time before the defendant pleads. Such amendment may be made at any time thereafter, in the discretion of the court where it can be done without prejudice to the substantial rights of the defendant. An indictment cannot be amended so as to change the offense charged, nor an information so as to charge an offense not shown by the evidence taken at the preliminary examination."

As shown, the information charges that the act of selling the intoxicants was committed "in no-license territory, to wit, Kimshew township, county of Butte," etc. These allegations were, of course, essential to the statement of the offense. Now, then, if it be proper or necessary for the information to specifically describe by name or otherwise the particular "no-license territory," can it be said that for that reason such description becomes an essential constituent of the crime? Clearly not. While it might be important to specifically designate or describe the particular dry unit within which the act of selling was committed, it cannot, manifestly, be said that such designation or description is any part or element of the crime or is essential to the statement of the gist or gravamen of the charge, which is, obviously, the act of selling within the limits of no-license territory.

Clearly, the mere making of a correction in the description or in the name of the no-license territory cannot have the effect of charging an offense different from that originally charged, or of inserting in the information any new or additional allegations of fact requiring the defendant to prepare for any further or different defense against the charge than that required of him before such amendment or correction was made.

The defendant at the trial had the full benefit of his plea of not guilty to the information and as ample opportunity to meet the charge after the amendment as he could have had prior thereto. His substantial rights could not have been affected or impaired in the slightest measure by an amendment of the information which could not and did not change the nature of the charge against him.

We have discovered no substantial reason calling for a reversal of the judgment, and it is, therefore, affirmed.

MIDWAY FIVE OIL CO. v. CITIZENS' NAT. BANK OF LOS ANGELES.

(Civ. 1573.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 4, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 2, 1914.)

1. GARNISHMENT (§ 88*) — ACTION AGAINST GARNISHEE—PLEADING.

Where a complaint against a garnishee alleged that the summons and writ of attachment were duly issued, that thereafter on a specified date plaintiff caused the writ of attachment to be served, and that the writ was on that day duly served on defendant corporation, such averment sufficiently alleged the facts as to the service of the writ; defendant's answer merely denying that at the time of the service of the writ of attachment on it, mentioned in the complaint, it had in its possession moneys subject to check by it or the order of the debtor.

2. GARNISHMENT (§ 54*)—CERTIFIED CHECK—ESTOPPEL OF BANK.

Where a bank intrusted with the collection of a note accepted in payment a certified check from the maker instead of cash, it was estopped, as against the claim of the debtor, to deny that it had collected a debt for his credit, and, having been served with garnishment process, was chargeable for the amount of the collection less the debtor's indebtedness to it.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank G. Finlayson, Judge.

Action by the Midway Five Oil Company against the Citizens' National Bank of Los Angeles. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Horace S. Wilson and W. W. Middlecoff, both of Los Angeles, for appellant. S. E. Vermilyea and S. L. Carpenter, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. This appeal is taken from a judgment entered in favor of the defendant and respondent, and is presented on the judgment roll alone.

From the facts found by the trial judge, it appears that one Henningsen was indebted to plaintiff in the sum of $1,595.49; that in September, 1911, an action was commenced by the appellant herein against the said Henningsen to secure a judgment on account of that indebtedness, and that on the 4th day of January, 1913, judgment was duly entered for the amount stated, and thereafter execution was regularly issued; that after the commencement of the action referred to, and before the entry of judgment, a writ of attachment was regularly issued and served upon the respondent herein; that respondent made answer to the garnishment, returning to the sheriff that it was not indebted to, nor was it holding any properties or moneys of, the said Henningsen. From the facts further found it appears that in August, 1911, Henningsen had owing to him from one Martin a sum of money amounting to $3,700, evidenced by a promissory note; that this note was then in possession of respondent, and Henningsen instructed respondent to collect the amount due from Martin on the note and deliver certain certificates of stock to Martin in connection with the same transaction; that respondent did deliver the stock to Martin and accepted in payment a certified check drawn upon the First National Bank of Pasadena payable to the order of Martin; that the said check was collected by respondent bank in the due course of business from the First National Bank of Pasadena. It was while this certified check was in the hands of respondent bank that the garnishment process was served. After collecting the amount represented by the certified check, respondent applied of the proceeds thereof the sum of $2,146.34 immediately in extinguishment of an indebtedness owing by Henningsen to it, and thereafter it honored an overdraft drawn by Henningsen in the sum of $1,000 and charged the same against the balance of the credit made in Henningsen's favor upon the collection of the certified check, leaving on open account a credit balance of $553.66, which was afterwards paid over to Henningsen.

[1] It is contended that the complaint did not state facts sufficient to state a cause of action, in that the allegation showing the facts as to the service of the writ of attachment was not complete. We think the complaint did, in the absence of a special demurrer, state sufficient facts to sustain a cause of action on behalf of appellant. It was alleged: "That summons and writ of attachment were duly issued; that thereafter, on the said date, the plaintiff caused the said writ of attachment to be served, and said writ of attachment was on said date duly served upon said defendant banking corporation." In the answer of respondent there was no denial of this allegation; that portion of the answer referring thereto being worded as follows:

> "Defendant denies that at the time of the service upon it of the writ of attachment in the complaint mentioned it had in its hands, or in its possession, moneys subject to check by or order of R. M. Henningsen. * * *"

[2] The chief point relied upon by respondent to sustain the judgment of the court as entered is that it did not appear from the findings of the court that at the time of the service of the process of garnishment respondent had in its hands or under its control any money or property belonging to Henningsen, or that it was indebted to him in any amount. This contention, we think, cannot be sustained. It appears from the facts as found that Henningsen directed the respondent bank to deliver the certificates of stock and satisfy a debt owing to him by Martin when it should receive the amount of money represented in Martin's promissory note. The bank then, when it accepted the certified check, accepted the same as cash, and it would have been estopped, as against the claim of Henningsen, to deny that it had collected the debt for his credit. It seems to be the rule that where, under circumstances otherwise as represented by the facts here presented, an agent or trustee receives an evidence of indebtedness on account of its principal instead of money by the express authority of its principal, then it might properly answer, as did this bank, that it was not indebted to the principal in any amount. In this case, however, as has been pointed out, respondent at its own risk accepted as cash the certified check, and it must be held to have immediately become indebted to Henningsen in the amount which that check represented. As sustaining this view are the cases of Hancock v. Colyer, 99 Mass. 187, 96 Am. Dec. 730; Knight v. Bowley, 117 Mass. 551. There is no contention but that the bank had the right to offset against the proceeds of the certified check any matured indebtedness owing to it by Henningsen, but it appears that the last amount of overdraft—to wit, the sum of $1,000—had not accrued at the time of the service of the garnishment. Its liability to appellant was therefore the sum of $1,553.66.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to enter, upon its findings of fact as made, judgment in favor of appellant in the sum of $1,553.66, and that appellant have its costs incurred upon this appeal.

NOURSE v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al.

(Civ. 1575.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, California. Sept. 8, 1914. Rehearing Denied by Supreme Court Nov. 7, 1914.)

1. Waters and Water Courses (§ 201*) — Municipal Waterworks—Discrimination.

Where a city maintains a water system for the purpose of supplying its inhabitants, it acts, not in its sovereign capacity, but as a private corporation, and like a private corporation is bound to furnish water without discrimination.

2. Waters and Water Courses (§ 203*) — Municipal Waterworks—Regulations.

Where the ordinance fixing the rules for supplying inhabitants of a city with water from the city water system authorized the collection of all rates except meter rates in advance, and required a deposit to cover meter rates, a further provision that all water rates shall be charged against the property on which it was furnished and against the owner, and that no change of ownership or occupation shall have any effect, is unreasonable, and a second occupant of property, not personally in arrears for any water rates can demand that he be furnished water without payment of arrears incurred by his predecessor.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Petition by Charles O. Nourse for a writ of mandate against the City of Los Angeles. From a judgment denying the writ, petitioner appeals. Reversed and remanded, with directions to issue writ.

Paul Nourse, of Los Angeles (John Beman, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant. Albert Lee Stephens, City Atty., and Charles S. Burnell, Asst. City Atty., both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of the trial court denying an application for a peremptory writ of mandate commanding the board of public service commissioners of the city of Los Angeles to furnish petitioner a supply of water for use at the premises designated as No. 147 West Avenue 31 in the city of Los Angeles.

*For other cases see same topic and section NUMBER in Dec. Dig. & Am. Dig. Key-No. Series & Rep'r Indexes

At all the times in question the city of Los Angeles owned and operated a water system, by means of which water was supplied to said city and its inhabitants, and with the pipes and mains of which system the said premises of petitioner were connected. Among other rules and regulations established by ordinance for the supplying of water to the inhabitants of the city, was a provision as follows:

> "All water rates shall be charged against the property on which it is furnished, and against the owner thereof, and if for any cause any sums owing therefor become delinquent, the water shall be cut off, and in no case shall it be turned on to the same property until all such delinquencies shall have been paid in full. No change of ownership or occupation shall affect the application of this section."

On October 27, 1913, petitioner made demand upon respondents for a supply of water for use upon said premises, to be delivered through the pipes connecting same with the said water system, and in making the demand he complied with all the rules and regulations established therefor, save and except that he refused to pay respondents the sum of $1.50, conceded to be due for water theretofore supplied for use upon said premises by a former occupant thereof. The sole question here involved is the validity of the provision above set forth, by reason of which respondents seek to exact payment of this arrearage due for water used upon the premises by the former occupant thereof as a condition of furnishing petitioner the supply of water so demanded.
